The Indians of the plains, who subsist chiefly on buffalo, follow them on their migration toward the north in the early part of the summer, and return in autumn, spreading over the western part of the State of Kansas and the Territories of Nebraska, Dakota, Montana, and Colorado. Influenced by the unfriendly Indians of the Southwest, and probably incited by rebel emissaries, they maintained active and vigorous hostilities. Our defenseless frontier settlements were harassed; the communication between the Mississippi valley and our possessions on the Pacific seriously interrupted; emigrant and Government trains assailed; property of great value destroyed, and men, women, and children barbarously murdered. It became the imperative duty of the Government to send military expeditions against these savages, which checked the commission of further outrages, and induced them to sue for peace. On the recommendations of the generals in command of our forces a commission, composed of officers of the Army and civilians, was sent to the upper Arkansas and the upper Missouri. Satisfactory treaties have been negotiated with a large number of these tribes. Some of them could not be reached on account of the lateness of the season, but it is believed that similar arrangements can be made with them during the early part of the approaching spring.

It is difficult to maintain peaceful relations with the Indians in Minnesota. The terrible massacre of the white inhabitants in the year 1862 is fresh in the memory of the country. The intense exasperation which followed led in that State to a policy, which has also prevailed to some extent in several of our organized Territories, inducing a personal predatory warfare between the frontier citizens, emigrants, and miners, and isolated bands of Indians belonging, in many instances, to tribes at peace with the Government. This awakens a spirit of retaliation, inciting atrocious acts of violence, which, oft repeated, result in irreparable disasters to both races.

The policy of the total destruction of the Indians has been openly advocated by gentlemen of high position, intelligence, and personal character; but no enlightened nation can adopt or sanction it without a forfeiture of its self-respect and the respect of the civilized nations of the earth.

Financial considerations forbid the inauguration of such a policy. The attempted destruction of three hundred thousand of these people, accustomed to a nomadic life, subsisting upon the spontaneous productions of the earth, and familiar with the fastnesses of the mountains and the swamps of the plains, would involve an appalling sacrifice of the lives of our soldiers and frontier settlers, and the expenditure of untold treasure. It is estimated that the maintenance of each regiment of troops engaged against the Indians of the plains costs the Government $2,000,000 per annum. All the military operations of last summer have not occasioned the immediate destruction of more than a few hundred Indian warriors. Such a policy is manifestly as impracticable as it is in violation of every dictate of humanity and Christian duty.

It is therefore recommended that stringent legislation be adopted for the punishment of violations of the rights of persons and property of members of Indian tribes who are at peace with the Government.

Sufficient appropriations should be made to supply the pressing wants of these wards of the Government, resulting from the encroaching settlements springing up in every organized Territory. The occupation of their hunting grounds and fisheries by agriculturists, and even of their mountain fastnesses by miners, has necessarily deprived the Indians of their accustomed means of support, and reduced them to extreme want. If the deficiency so occasioned should not be supplied, it is not to be expected that a savage people can be restrained from seeking, by violence, redress of what they conceive to be a grievous wrong.

That their growing wants thus caused may not become a perpetual burden, every reasonable effort should be made to induce the Indians to adopt agricultural and pastoral pursuits. It is recommended that Congress provide a civilization and educational fund, to be disbursed in such mode as to secure the coöperation and assistance of benevolent organizations, affording an opportunity for private citizens to dispense their charities to these impoverished children of the forest through the usual channels. It is believed that all the Christian churches would gladly occupy this missionary field, supplying a large per cent. of the means necessary for their instruction, and thus bring into contact with the Indian tribes a class of men and women whose lives conform to a higher standard of morals than that which is recognized as obligatory by too many of the present employés of the Government.

On taking charge of this Department on the 15th day of May last, the relations of officers respectively engaged in the military and civil departments in the Indian country were in an unsatisfactory condition. A supposed conflict of jurisdiction and a want of confidence in each other led to mutual criminations, whereby the success of military operations against hostile tribes and the execution of the policy of this Department were seriously impeded. Upon conferring with the War Department, it was informally agreed that the agents and officers under the control of the Secretary of the Interior should hold no intercourse, except through the military authorities, with tribes of Indians against whom hostile measures were in progress; and that the military authorities should refrain from interference with such agents and officers in their relations with all other tribes, except to afford the necessary aid for the enforcement of the regulations of this Department. This informal arrangement has been executed in good faith, producing, it is believed, a salutary effect on the bearing of the hostile tribes, and securing the desired harmony and efficient coöperation of those charged with this branch of the public service.

It is earnestly recommended that the superintendents, and also agents of a suitable grade, be empowered to act as civil magistrates within the limits of reservations where the tribal relations are maintained, and also on the plains remote from the jurisdiction of the civil authorities. The want of an acceptable and efficient provision for the administration of justice has been sensibly felt in cases arising between members of the tribes, or between Indians and the white men who have been permitted to reside among them. The extent of the jurisdiction and the mode of its exercise should be clearly defined by congressional enactment.

The Secretary of the Treasury holds certain stocks in trust for the Chickasaw national fund, which amount, as appears by his report of the 6th of December last, to the sum of $1,316,281 31. Public securities and certificates of stock of the par value of $3,053,592 15, constituting the trust fund of other Indian tribes, are deposited with the Secretary of the Interior. I am not aware of any good reason for a divided custody of these funds. It is suggested that Congress designate a depository for all the securities held by the United States in trust for the Indians.

Copious details in regard to each branch of the Indian service are furnished in the voluminous and well-considered report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. I respectfully refer to it for further information, and commend the various suggestions it contains to the favorable consideration of Congress.

PATENTS.

During the year ending September 30, 1865, there were received at the Patent Office 11,860 applications for patents, and 70 applications for an extension of patents. Six thousand two hundred and ninety-two patents (including reissues and designs) were issued, and 61 extensions granted. One thousand five hundred and thirty-eight caveats were filed. Seven hundred and forty-one applications allowed, but no patents issued thereon by reason of the non-payment of the final fee.

On the 1st day of October, 1864, there was a balance to the credit of the fund of $56,117 39. The fees received for the succeeding twelve months amounted to $316,987 27. The expenditures during the same period were $262,445 47. Leaving a balance on the 1st day of October, 1865, of $110,659 19.

The law provides that in interference cases, or where letters patent have been refused, an appeal lies from the decision of the primary examiner to the examiners in chief, and from their decision to the Commissioner of Patents. According to a judicial construction of existing laws, an appeal may be taken from the decision of the Commissioner to the chief justice, or one of the associate judges of the supreme court of this District. This procedure is unnecessarily circuitous and protracted, and should be abridged by an amendment of the law so as to allow an appeal from the decision of the primary examiner or the examiners in chief directly to the supreme court of the District of Columbia, if the party against whom it is rendered so elects.

The Commissioner of Patents is clothed with unrestrained discretionary power in all cases of application for the extension of patents. His decision, whether favorable or unfavorable, is final, and frequently involves private and public interests of enormous value. It is submitted for the consideration of Congress whether it is wise to lodge so large a power with a subordinate officer, without subjecting its exercise to the supervisory control of the head of the Department.

CENSUS.

Immediately after entering on the discharge of my official duties, my attention was directed to the condition of the work relating to the returns of the eighth census. Two quarto volumes had been published; one in March, 1864, entitled "Population," the other in March, 1865, entitled "Agriculture;" and materials had been compiled for a portion of the third volume. A preliminary report, purporting to present "a synopsis of the results" established by the census, had also been transmitted to Congress on the 21st day of May, 1862.

The entire appropriation of $1,642,000 was exhausted, and liabilities, amounting to a considerable sum, had not been discharged. The liberal appropriation justified the general expectation that an authentic and faithful record of our population, condition, and resources, at the commencement of the decade, would be published at an early period after the completion of the census returns. The value of statistical matter derived from such records is materially impaired for practical uses by procrastinating its publication. This is especially true in a country rapidly increasing in the elements of material wealth, where all industrial pursuits are prosecuted with unexampled vigor and success.

The work on the census of 1860 had been unreasonably delayed, and the Department deemed the immediate and energetic prosecution of it of vital importance; but there was no fund specifically applicable to the purpose. The diminished business of the General Land Office, resulting from the condition of affairs in the southern States, had not required the appointment of the full number of clerks authorized by law; and some of those engaged upon the census were, with your approbation, transferred to that bureau. This placed them under the supervision of its efficient head, and rendered the services of the former superintending clerk of the census no longer necessary. I expressed to the Commissioner an anxious desire that the remaining volumes should be prepared for the press with all the promptitude consistent with a scrupulous regard to accuracy, and I am happy to say that it has been fully realized. The returns have been arranged and classified in the most careful and thorough manner, and the work has been advanced with a dispatch in striking contrast with its former tardy progress. The third volume, entitled "Manufactures," has been completed and printed. The fourth and last volume, embracing mortality, educational, and miscellaneous statistics, has been prepared for the public printer, and will be ready for distribution at an early day. The clerks were transferred to positions inferior in grade and remuneration to those they had previously held, as there were no other vacancies. I submit to Congress the propriety of making their pay equivalent to that which they formerly received, and of providing additional compensation for the Commissioner and the chief clerk of the General Land Office, in consideration of the increased duties and responsibilities which devolved upon them.

The expediency of providing means to enable this Department to lay before Congress annually a report on population, and the manufacturing and other material interests of the United States, is, in my opinion, worthy of the consideration of Congress.

UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD.

The act approved July 1, 1862, to aid in the construction of a railroad from the Missouri river to the navigable waters of the Pacific, and subsequent legislation on this subject, with its hearty approval by the people, furnish a striking proof of the unconquerable determination of the nation and an unflinching faith in its ability to preserve its territorial integrity. Had it been deemed possible that our country could fall a prey to rebellion, and its dismembered parts become subjected to the control of separate and alien governments, the construction of such a work would never have been undertaken, and its execution would have been impracticable. Although, at the date of the enactment of these several laws, the resources of the nation were severely taxed, measures were adopted deemed adequate to induce capitalists to engage in the construction of this great thoroughfare, in the conviction that it would forever remain the property of a united people. The energy displayed in its prosecution for two or three years did not, however, equal public expectation and the wishes of the Government. But during the past year, as will be seen from the report of Lieutenant Colonel Simpson, of the Engineer corps of the Army, detailed by your order to serve, under the instructions of the Secretary of the Interior, in supervising this and other kindred works, it has been progressing in a satisfactory manner, from Omaha, Kansas City, and Atchison, westward, and from Sacramento, California, eastward.

The amount of private capital already invested, the high personal character of the gentlemen connected with its prosecution, and the munificent subsidy of the Government, combine to give assurance that the whole will be completed within the period fixed by law, thus furnishing a continuous line of railway from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

Its effects, in promoting immigration, opening vast and rich regions of the continent to settlement, developing our inexhaustible national resources, and perpetuating the unity of the American people, will be more and more appreciated as it approaches completion.

The Union Pacific Railroad Company, incorporated under the congressional act above cited, reports by its president, under date of the 5th ultimo, that on the 19th of October last sixteen miles of track had been laid west from Omaha, and that arrangements had been made to prosecute the work at the rate of one half mile per day. The company has five locomotives and seventy cars on the road. Machine shops and station buildings of the most permanent character are in progress of construction, and will be finished in the course of the present month. The grading of the first hundred miles was, at that date, nearly ready for the superstructure, and that of the second hundred miles had been commenced. The first sixty miles of the track will be ready by the end of next month, and no doubt is entertained that the first hundred miles will be in operation by the 1st day of July next, in compliance with the requirements of law. The directors express the belief that an additional hundred miles will be in operation by the 1st day of July, 1867, and they are not without hope that they will, at that date, have constructed two hundred and fifty miles of road, and reached the one hundredth meridian, where the line of the eastern division, commonly called the Kansas branch, is to unite with it.

Several parties of engineers have been actively engaged; one in surveying the Spanish fork and the country west from Salt Lake to the valley of the Humboldt; another up the Cache de la Poudre to the Laramie river; and a third from the one hundredth meridian west. A fourth has been occupied in locating the second hundred miles of the road. Strenuous efforts have been made by the directors to press on the work with a dispatch commensurate with its acknowledged importance. The expenditures already amount to $3,500,000, wholly derived from private contributions.

In this connection it may not be amiss to state that on the 12th of May last the company made application to substitute a new line for that adopted between Omaha and the crossing of the Elkhorn. It was deemed advisable, before determining which line offered the most "direct and practicable route," to order a thorough personal examination of both by a competent engineer, who was instructed to report on their relative advantages. The officer detailed by the Secretary of War at my request, as above mentioned, discharged this duty with fidelity and success. His report embraces the instructions of the Department, as well as the result of his careful examination, and the correspondence to which it gave rise.

The contemplated new location received your approval. Some time was in this way unavoidably consumed, and the company deemed it expedient to suspend active operations on that part of the road until the result of your final action upon the application was officially communicated.

The Union Pacific Railroad Company, eastern division, has completed forty miles of the railway and telegraph line, extending from the mouth of the Kansas river to a point near Lawrence; and it had in October last four locomotives on the road, and was then expecting the arrival of another at Wyandotte. There were on the track three first-class passenger, forty-four freight, twenty-one box, one baggage, twelve hand cars, and two iron truck cars. The company has also contracted for four additional first-class passenger, two express and mail, and ten box freight cars, all to be delivered within a short period. The company reported on the 11th ultimo that an additional section of twenty miles had been completed, which is now in process of examination by commissioners, in the mode required by law. Surveys have been extended to the one hundredth meridian, a distance of about three hundred and eighty-one miles. There is also a party in the field making surveys of the Smoky Hill route, who are to extend their surveys to Denver City, about five hundred and eighty-one miles from the eastern terminus of the road.

The president of the Atchison branch of the Union Pacific railroad submitted a report bearing date the 15th ultimo. It represents that the bridges and masonry on the first section of twenty miles of the road are all completed, cross-ties prepared, the track being laid, and that this portion of the road is under contract, and will be finished by the 1st day of January next. It further represents that the bridges are constructed of the best materials, and that the buildings now in process of erection are of stone, roofed with corrugated iron; that the second section of twenty miles is also under contract, and will be completed on the 1st day of May next.

The commissioners appointed by your predecessor, under date September 8, 1864, reported upon thirty-one miles of the railway and telegraph line constructed by the Central Pacific Railroad Company of California. This part of the road, extending eastward from Sacramento city to a point near Newcastle, in Placer county, California, is completed and in daily use. Under date of the 17th July last, twelve additional miles of the road were reported to be in running order. On the 16th day of September last, the president of the company filed in the office of the surveyor general of California his affidavit, setting forth that the company had completed the grading and all the work required to prepare the railroad for the superstructure on the section of twenty miles lying next eastward of the town of Newcastle, at an expense of $1,098,000. Five thousand laborers, it is alleged, are employed, and the company manifest the greatest vigor and activity in carrying on their operations.

On the 24th day of December last, the Sioux City and Pacific Railroad Company, a corporation organized under the laws of Iowa, was designated by the President of the United States for the purpose of constructing and operating a line of railroad and telegraph from Sioux City to such point on, and so as to connect with, the Iowa branch of the Union Pacific railroad, from Omaha, or the Union Pacific railroad, as the company might select. The president of the company, on the 15th of June last, submitted a map designating the general route of said road, but the Department is not advised that its construction has been commenced.

I cordially concur in the views expressed by my predecessor, in his last annual report, as to the propriety of securing, if practicable, the appointment of Government directors in each of the companies engaged in the construction of a branch or any part of the main line of this road. Such directors are now appointed for the company organized under the act of Congress, and with evident advantage to the public interests. The concurrent action of the States from which the companies derive their corporate power, and the consent of the latter, may be necessary to accomplish the object; but Congress might with propriety initiate the requisite legislation on the part of the General Government.

The patents for land and the bonds provided for in the fourth and fifth sections of the original act are not to be issued on the completion of a section of the road, until the fact of its construction and equipment as a first-class railroad shall have been ascertained and declared in the mode prescribed. The words "first-class railroad" are, perhaps, as precise and definite as any other; but some difficulty may arise in the practical enforcement of the provision in which they occur. With a view to obviate the difficulty, and secure uniformity, I have invited the directors on the part of the Government, and the several boards of commissioners, to meet in this city on the 10th proximo, for the purpose of establishing a standard of excellence, to which the companies, in the construction and equipment of their respective roads, shall be required to conform.

The Northern Pacific Railroad Company, on the 11th of December, 1864, filed their acceptance of the provisions of the act of Congress entitled "An act granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from Lake Superior to Puget sound, on the Pacific coast, by the northern route;" and under date of the 6th March last submitted their map designating the general direction of their road from a point on Lake Superior, in the State of Wisconsin, to a point on Puget sound, in Washington Territory. The records of the Department do not, however, show any further action by the company in the premises.

WAGON ROADS.

By an act approved March 3, 1865, Congress made appropriations for the construction of certain wagon roads in Montana, Dakota, Idaho, and Nebraska. I refer you to the report of Colonel Simpson for information as to the manner in which the appropriations have been expended, and the progress made in the construction of these highways.

WASHINGTON AQUEDUCT.

Congress, at its last session, made no provision for the Washington aqueduct. As the appropriation for the last fiscal year was nearly exhausted, I dispensed with the services of such of the employés as were not indispensable, and reserved the small balance for such repairs as might be required for the preservation of the work until the meeting of Congress. The engineer in charge is of opinion that the dam of solid stone masonry already commenced across the Maryland channel of the Potomac river, at the head of the conduit, is absolutely necessary to secure "an abundant and needful supply of good and wholesome water" during certain seasons of the year, and that it should be completed with the least possible delay. The temporary dams erected from time to time have repeatedly been carried away. Nothing, in his opinion, will effectually serve the purpose but a dam of the character indicated, and he urges its construction upon the grounds of economy as well as of necessity. He reports in favor of the completion of the connecting conduit at the receiving reservoir, the further excavation and deepening of the distributing reservoir; and also the construction of a sloped rubble wall, to prevent the washing of its interior slopes or water faces.

His suggestions are respectfully submitted for the consideration of Congress.

Lieutenant Colonel Simpson has been permanently assigned to duty in this Department. His services have been advantageously employed on the work connected with the construction of the Union Pacific railroad and branches, the Northern Pacific railroad, land-grant railroads, wagon roads, the aqueduct, and Capitol extension; all of which require the supervision of a competent and practical engineer. His report embraces a connected history of the inception and progress of the Union Pacific railroad, compiled from public records and other authentic sources, and other valuable matter, with practical suggestions proper for the consideration of Congress.

Provision should be made for the clerical force rendered necessary by the increasing correspondence and duties relating to these important works, and other incidental expenses that must unavoidably be incurred, for which an estimate has been submitted.

CAPITOL AND LIBRARY EXTENSION, AND GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE.

The report of the architect of the Capitol extension furnishes full information concerning the condition and progress of the work. Since the report of his predecessor, the eastern portico of the south wing, including the steps and carriage ways to the same, has been completed, with the exception of the caps of the cheek blocks, delayed for the want of marble of the requisite dimensions. One of these has been finished, and eleven pieces of marble for the others are now on the grounds.

The greater part of the marble work for the north portico has been prepared during the present season, and this portion of the work is now completed. Seventy-three blocks for cornice, architraves, &c., and nine monolithic columns have been prepared for the unfinished porticoes. Some years since the Government acceded to an interpretation of the contract, insisted on by the contractors, which allowed them to furnish marble of such dimensions as to require two pieces in the construction of each column. There is on hand material for eight columns of that description. The architect recommends that they be placed alternately with monolithic columns in the western porticoes.

Congress, at its last session, made no appropriation for this work, and the architect estimates that $175,000 will be required to continue it during the present fiscal year, and $200,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1867.

Attention is invited to that part of the report which relates to the necessity of extending the central building and portico to the line of the porticoes of the wings, and of enlarging the Capitol grounds. The architect recommends that the plans prepared for these purposes by his predecessor be adopted and carried into effect.

The arrangements for lighting the new dome, by Gardner's electro-magnetic apparatus, are in progress. A further appropriation is necessary for the completion of the dome, which is now nearly finished, and to discharge existing liabilities for work already done upon it.

An act of last session authorized "an enlargement of the Library of Congress, so as to include in two wings, built fire-proof, the space at either end of the present Library." The then architect of the Capitol extension prepared the requisite plans and specifications for the work. Competition was invited by newspaper publication in several of the large cities of the Union, and a contract for the labor and materials awarded to a responsible party for the sum of $146,000, being $14,000 less than that appropriated by Congress. The work, although delayed by unforeseen causes, has been faithfully and successfully prosecuted, and its completion will not be long deferred. Additional expenditure must be incurred for the introduction of water into the Library, the cutting off and replacing the gas mains which supplied the building and passed through the wings which will be occupied by the Library, and other incidental alterations which were not anticipated and specified by the architect, but which, as the work progresses, are found to be necessary.

After a suspension of nearly four years, the work on the north portico of the Interior Department has been resumed under a contract made in the year 1857. The price of labor and materials during the intervening period had so largely increased as, in the opinion of the architect, to render the contract entirely unremunerative. I therefore gave the contractors the option of abandoning the contract, or prosecuting the work at the rate it prescribes. An estimate has been submitted of the amount requisite to finish the portico, iron fence, and pavement.

The saloon of the north front of the Department has been appropriated for the use of the Patent Office, and fitted up with cases. They are designed for the exhibition and safe-keeping of models, and are of the most approved materials and workmanship. An appropriation is necessary to meet outstanding accounts and to complete the saloon.

The Government Printing Office has been enlarged and extended agreeably to an act of the last Congress making provision for that purpose, and for capacity and convenience is believed to be now unsurpassed by any similar establishment in the country.

DISTRICT AFFAIRS.

The power conferred on Congress of exclusive legislation for the District of Columbia, imposes the corresponding duty of making just and adequate provision for its welfare. Its local interests, so liable to be overlooked in the midst of subjects of more general and engrossing concern, fall to some extent within the province of this Department, and require a special allusion.

The annual report of the Commissioner of Public Buildings gives a detailed account of the expenditures authorized by Congress within this District. I have also received a communication from the mayor of the city of Washington, which I have directed to be printed. These papers present important facts and considerations which merit the attention of the legislative department.

The controlling object in the original design of this city was the accommodation of the public interests which it was anticipated would cluster about the capital of a great nation. Accordingly, only three thousand and sixteen of the seven thousand one hundred and thirty-four acres composing its entire area were surveyed into lots for sale to individuals. The remainder embraces streets, avenues of inordinate width, squares, circles, and public reservations. By the adoption of this design, it is manifest that it was not intended that the sparse population thus provided for should bear the burden of the entire cost of the local improvements, required more for the national convenience than for that of the permanent residents. At the last assessment the national Government owned real estate within the city limits to the value of $28,121,631 45; a sum nearly equal to the estimated worth of all individual property in the city. At the usual rate of taxation this property would yield a revenue of $210,912 23. The mayor suggests that such a tax, in connection with the present resources, would yield a revenue amply sufficient to support the municipal government, improve the streets and avenues, make proper provision for the indigent, and maintain a complete system of public schools.

In the year 1820 Congress provided that from the proceeds of the sale of public lots reimbursement should be made to the city of Washington of an equitable proportion of the expenses thereafter incurred in laying open, paving, and otherwise improving the streets and avenues adjacent to the public squares and reservations. I am informed that, since the passage of this act, 3,725 lots of this class have been sold, and the proceeds paid into the Treasury of the United States, while no reimbursement has been made to the city for the sum of $37,410 61 paid for improvements properly chargeable to this fund. An appropriation should be made for refunding this amount and the interest which has accrued thereon. During the past summer and fall the improvement of streets adjacent to public property has rendered the Government liable to a considerable amount, and an additional sum will be needed to meet similar expenses which will probably be incurred during the next fiscal year. It is hoped that Congress will at an early date make provision to meet these liabilities.

SENATE &amp; HO. OF REPS.

Report of the Secretary of the Interior.

Several of the streets of Washington have been paved in a neat and substantial manner since the adjournment of Congress, and the municipal authorities are making like improvements upon other streets, which will add greatly both to their beauty and their utility as public thoroughfares. It is submitted that Congress should encourage this spirit by corresponding improvements upon the avenues. The Commissioner of Public Buildings refers to the dilapidated condition of the pavement on Pennsylvania avenue, and recommends that an appropriation be made by Congress for the substitution of either the Belgian or the Nicholson pavement throughout its length, and also for the opening and grading of such of the remaining avenues leading to the Capitol as remain closed. These avenues are under the exclusive control of Congress, and justice seems imperatively to require that the national Government should defray the expense of paving and keeping them in repair. If the burden of paving the avenues, as well as the streets, is to be thrown upon the owners of contiguous property, the mayor suggests that the law be so amended as to reduce the width of the carriage-ways, and that the intervening space between them and the pavement be flanked with a line of curbstones, sodded, and planted with ornamental shade trees.

I recommend that the law authorizing a local tax for sewerage be so amended as to enable the city to levy the same equitably upon all property benefited by such improvement. A general system of sewerage should at once be adopted by the city, the expense of which should be borne in part by the Government.

I invite the attention of Congress to the views of the mayor touching the locality occupied by the Center market. For a long time this space has been disfigured by dilapidated and unsightly sheds and stalls, called a "Market House." The city, in the belief that it was authorized to appropriate the ground, made efforts to replace these by a commodious building of correct architectural proportions, properly furnished for the public accommodation. Its erection had been commenced, but the work was suspended in compliance with the supposed requirements of a joint resolution, approved June 30, 1864, authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to reclaim and preserve certain property of the United States. I commend the subject to your consideration, with a view to such legislation as the convenience of the city and the interests of the public require.

The mayor's communication also calls attention to the fact that the youths of the District are largely in excess of the accommodation which can be furnished them in the public schools. No doubt many of them are receiving education in private institutions; but it is feared that many are absolutely destitute of the means of instruction. All experience demonstrates that virtue and thrift are the natural results of education, while pauperism, vice, and crime are the legitimate fruits of ignorance; and that it is more economical to maintain schools as a preventive, than to support the pauperism and punish the crime that ignorance engenders. From the establishment of the national capital in the District of Columbia, the expenses incident to such support and punishment have been paid by the Government of the United States. It is worthy of serious consideration, therefore, whether a just proportion of the expense of the public schools in this District should not be provided for from the same source; and it is believed that Congress will thus be able to diminish the expenditures from the judiciary fund far more than they will be expected to augment the educational fund of this District. The propriety of this provision is still further shown by the consideration of the fact that a large proportion of the people of this District are in the service of the United States, on small salaries, and regard themselves as transient inhabitants. If possessed of property, it is generally located elsewhere, and the taxes levied upon it are applied to the support of the institutions of those localities, while their children live in this District, and, if educated in the public schools, swell the tax to be levied on the property of permanent citizens. The number of transient and non-tax-paying persons has been largely increased during the war by the ingress of multitudes of both white and colored people who have fled from its perils and desolations. Justice as well as economy demands that provision be made from the national Treasury for the education of the children of these classes.

The canal leading from the Potomac river, through the heart of the capital, to the Eastern branch, has been made the receptacle of the filth and offal from all the sewerage of the city. It has thus become a loathsome cess-pool, fruitful of disease, and inviting pestilence. The city authorities can exercise no legal control over it, as it is bordered almost exclusively by Government reservations. These are deteriorating in value on account of this constantly increasing and most insufferable nuisance. It is nearly useless for navigation, by reason of accumulations within it; and it should either be deepened and improved for the passage of shipping or at once abandoned as a canal. In the latter alternative, it should be diminished in width to suitable dimensions, arched over, and used exclusively as a main sewer. The proceeds of the land thus reclaimed, if brought into market, would defray a large proportion of the expense occasioned by the change. This nuisance lies almost at the threshold of the Capitol, the Executive Mansion, and other costly public edifices. If Congress should refuse to provide the requisite means for its improvement in the mode which I have suggested, exclusive authority over it should be conferred upon the city of Washington.

The report of the Commissioner of Public Buildings refers to the neglected condition of many of the triangular and circular public reservations. Instead of being abandoned to the public, they should be neatly and substantially inclosed, and planted with trees and shrubbery. The reservation on East Capitol street, between Eleventh and Thirteenth streets east, should be thus improved.

By the act approved May 25, 1832, the Commissioner of Public Buildings was authorized to purchase a tract of land surrounding a large and never-failing spring of the purest water, including the rights of individuals to its use, and to bring it in pipes, a distance of about two miles, to the Capitol, at a cost of $40,000. From that spring comes the flow of water which fills the fountains directly east and west of the Capitol building, and also the flow of the hydrant in front of the arched entrance to the basement of the west front; and from it is supplied all the drinking-water used in the Capitol. If the use of this water is to be continued, so much of the land on which the spring is situated as belongs to the United States should be properly secured by a substantial fence.

METROPOLITAN POLICE.

The board of police for this District, constituted by an act approved August 6, 1861, employed during the last fiscal year, as a permanent force, one superintendent, six detectives, ten sergeants, and one hundred and fifty patrolmen.

The detectives made seven hundred and seventeen arrests. Seven hundred and seven robberies were reported at the detective office. Property to the value of $170,659 09 was reported as stolen; of which $122,800 06 was recovered by the officers. Property valued at $6,894 22 was turned over to the property clerk, while the value of that delivered to claimants was $115,905 84, and that taken from prisoners and returned to them, $4,942 15. These results indicate but a portion of the actual work performed. The services of detectives are often of great value in the prevention of crime by known offenders, who, on their arrival, are placed under a strict surveillance, or are taken into custody before they have an opportunity to accomplish their evil designs.

The members of the police constituting the sanitary company have been efficiently employed in the abatement of nuisances, and in the discharge of other duties specially assigned to them.

The whole number of arrests during the year was 26,478. Of the parties arrested, 18,567 were charged with offenses against the person, and the remainder with offenses against property. The following disposition was made of them, so far as the cases are reported: 1,377 committed to jail; 706 discharged on bail; 1,452 turned over to the military authorities; 7,984 dismissed; 1,932 committed to the work-house, and 828 released on security to keep the peace. Fines were imposed in 11,487 cases, amounting to $61,943 92, and in 531 cases light punishments were inflicted. No report was received in 131 cases. Two thousand three hundred and twenty-one destitute persons were furnished with lodging, 114 lost children restored to their parents, and 154 sick or disabled persons assisted or taken to the hospital. The number of arrests during the year exceeds by 3,000 those made during any previous year; and the increase in the amount of fines imposed is nearly one hundred per cent. The actual expense to the cities of Washington and Georgetown, and to Washington county, of the present police system is about $45,000. For further details I refer to the report of the board.

The utility of the police telegraph has been fully demonstrated during the past year. By its agency a large force can be speedily concentrated at any given point where an emergency requires its presence. Seven thousand eight hundred and thirty-three messages have been transmitted through the central office, and a large amount of correspondence conducted between the precinct stations. An appropriation sufficient to discharge the cost of its construction is respectfully recommended to Congress.

The force has been maintained, as far as practicable, at the maximum authorized by Congress; but it is believed to be unequal to the public necessities. Since its organization the population of the District has nearly doubled, and the increase of crime has been in still greater proportion. The board present facts and arguments which are, in my opinion, conclusive in favor of such an increase as will enable the police force to discharge with vigor and promptitude the duties required of them. It is hoped that Congress will adopt such measures in this regard as will insure within the District the maintenance of public order, the due execution of police regulations, and the adequate protection of the rights of person and property.

JAIL, HOUSE OF REFUGE, AND PENITENTIARY.

It appears from the report of the warden that there were 227 prisoners in the jail of this District on the 1st day of November, embracing persons of each sex and of various ages. Some of them were convicted of minor offenses, punishable by fine and imprisonment; others were committed in default of bail, or were awaiting sentence in the criminal court. The inmates are occasionally more numerous. The building, although designed for one hundred prisoners, does not furnish accommodation for even that limited number, without neglecting the precautions which a due regard to their health and secure custody demands. The crowded state of the building and its very imperfect ventilation have a most injurious influence upon the sanitary condition of its inmates. This evil is enhanced by the want of a hospital department, to which the sick may be transferred from the impure atmosphere of the jail, and receive the benefit of fresh air, and the treatment which their situation imperatively demands. The building is so insecure that constant and vigilant attention, with the aid of a military force detailed by the War Department, is requisite to prevent the escape of prisoners, many of whom are desperate outlaws, charged with the commission of the most aggravated crimes. For want of a workshop connected with the building, such of the inmates as have been convicted of petit misdemeanors are huddled together, without needful employment, a prey to the vices born of idleness. The tedious hours are beguiled by frivolous pastimes, or frittered away in reckless or profane conversation, so that it is to be feared that many, on being discharged, are prepared for a bolder career of crime.

During the past summer the cells have been increased in strength, and such an addition made to their number as the available space would permit. The sewerage and ventilation have been improved, and light introduced. Nevertheless the building remains a reproach to the Government, and a nuisance. Humanity and policy alike require that a suitable jail should be erected, and I cannot too earnestly invoke the early and favorable action of Congress on the subject. The propriety of increasing the salary of the warden is also respectfully submitted for consideration.

Congress, by the act approved March 3, 1865, made provision for the confinement of juveniles under the age of sixteen years thereafter convicted, by any court of the United States, of a crime whose penalty is imprisonment. Authority was given to the Secretary of the Interior to contract with the managers of houses of refuge for the imprisonment, subsistence, and proper employment of such convicted offenders. Soon after the passage of this act the Department entered into correspondence with the marshals of the United States, and other parties, on the subject. A contract was made with one such institution, and it could admit but an inconsiderable number of convicts, and declined to receive into custody any colored persons.

It was ascertained that an offender could not be received by some of these institutions if the term to which he had been sentenced expired during his minority, and that the regulations provide that he may be discharged at any time upon the order of the directors. The convict is sentenced by the Federal court for a specific term, and the act requires that he "shall be confined during the term of sentence." This is incompatible with the exercise of the discretionary authority conferred on nearly all of these institutions, by State legislation, to discharge him at an earlier period and to bind him by indentures of apprenticeship, or to prolong his detention until he gives satisfactory evidence of reformation. And doubts were entertained by the officers in charge of others, whether they were not prohibited by the terms of their organic laws from receiving offenders other than those convicted by the tribunals of the State in which they were located. From the best consideration I have been able to bestow on the subject, I am of opinion that State as well as Federal legislation is necessary to give full practical effect to the humane intentions evinced by Congress in the enactment of the law.

The motives which induced the action of Congress, appeal with equal force in favor of the erection of a house of refuge in this District. The confinement of the youthful convict in the penitentiary, where he is in communion with inveterate transgressors, has a most corrupting effect upon his modes of thought and principles of action, and, after suffering the penalty which the law imposes upon convicted guilt, he rarely returns to the path of virtue. Beneficent results attest the wisdom and humanity of providing an asylum for such convicts. In many instances they have been led astray by evil parental influences, or left in destitute orphanage, assailed on every side by temptation, and without a friend to encourage them by precept and virtuous example. A large discretion should be given to the managers of such an institution. They should be authorized to detain the offender until he attains his majority; or, should they deem it expedient, provide him, at an earlier period, with a home far removed from his old associations.

During his confinement he should be taught a useful trade, habits of industry, the rudiments of an education, and the lessons of morality and religion. Under the benignant influences which would thus surround them, many would doubtless be rescued from the ways of guilt and sorrow, and rendered, in after life, useful members of that society of which they once threatened to become the scourge and opprobrium.

Influenced by these considerations, I have encouraged an incorporated society of benevolent gentlemen to take the preliminary steps for the establishment of such an institution on the aqueduct farm, in this District. It is hoped that Congress may afford them the necessary assistance to secure this result.

The War Department has not yet surrendered the building in this city formerly used as a penitentiary. It is ill adapted to the purposes for which it was employed. This Department has heretofore invited the attention of Congress to the propriety of erecting a new building. The subject is again presented for such action as may be deemed expedient.

GOVERNMENT HOSPITAL FOR THE INSANE.

I invite the attention of Congress to the tenth annual report of the Board of Visitors, and the thirteenth annual report of the superintendent of construction, of the Government hospital for the insane.

These papers exhibit the condition of the institution during the past fiscal year, and present, in addition to statistical information, many valuable and highly instructive suggestions. The number of patients under treatment at the commencement of the year was 351, including 191 from the Army, 18 from the Navy, 2 from the Soldiers' Home, and 4 rebel prisoners. The number admitted during the year was 515, of whom 426 were from the Army, 10 from the Navy, 72 from civil life, 3 from the quartermaster's and subsistence departments, and 4 were rebel prisoners. The whole number under treatment during the year was 866, of whom 645 belonged to the military or naval service; 147 died; there were discharged as recovered, 348; as improved, 101; and as unimproved, 9.

Congress failed at its last session to make the required appropriation for the support of the hospital, and with your approbation I negotiated, for that purpose, a temporary loan. Attention is invited to the subject, as the money was obtained on most favorable terms from the First National Bank, to whose officers assurances were given that Congress would provide for its repayment at an early period of the approaching session.

The hospital was established for the treatment of the insane of this District, as well as of the Army, the Navy, and the revenue cutter service. It has, from its origin, been conducted in such manner as to merit and receive the uninterrupted confidence and patronage of Congress. Its success and usefulness are due in a great degree to the superintendent, who has been identified with its history, and who brings to its service professional attainments of the highest order, long experience, and unsurpassed fidelity in the discharge of his arduous and delicate duties. He has received the active coöperation of the Board of Visitors and of his subordinate officers. His salary was originally fixed at its present rate. The propriety of increasing it is presented for the consideration of Congress.

COLUMBIA INSTITUTE FOR THE DEAF AND DUMB.

The Columbia Institution for the Instruction of the Deaf and Dumb has furnished instruction to 85 deaf mutes since the 1st day of July, 1864. Pursuant to the provisions of an act of Congress approved February 23, 1865, the blind pupils, 7 in number, were transferred to the Maryland Institution for the Blind. The books, maps, and papers, especially designed for the instruction of such pupils, were delivered to that institution, for the use of the beneficiaries of the United States.

Indigent deaf and dumb persons of "teachable age" properly belonging to this District, and the deaf and dumb children of all persons in the naval or military service of the United States, while such persons are actually in such service, are received into the institution upon the order of the Secretary of the Interior. The annual charge of $150 for each pupil so received has been paid, as provided by law. In addition to this outlay, appropriations have been made for salaries and contingent expenses, the purchase of grounds, the erection of buildings, the introduction of Potomac water, and other improvements. The directors, in their report, propose to relinquish the per capita charge for the Government pupils, and include the estimated amount thereof in the item for salaries and contingent expenses, which they desire may be increased to $20,700. This sum, with the other items embraced in their estimate, will require for the next fiscal year an appropriation of $71,940. During the current fiscal year the institution has received no aid from Congress, other than the sums paid for the maintenance of the pupils admitted by order of this Department, and the board ask that a clause appropriating $55,445 87 be inserted in the deficiency bill.

Congress, by the act of April 8, 1864, authorized the Columbia Institution to confer degrees in the liberal arts and sciences on pupils of the institution, or others, who, by proficiency in learning, or other meritorious distinction, may be thereunto entitled. Pursuant to the presumed authority conferred by this act, the board has organized an advanced department, in addition to the primary school, where the elementary branches and the mechanic arts have been successfully taught. They designate it as "The National Deaf Mute College." A preparatory or intermediate class has also been formed, with a range of studies more thorough and efficient than in any other similar school in this country. It is designed to furnish their own pupils, and the graduates of the State institutions, with an opportunity of attaining the standard of proficiency requisite to an admission into the freshman class of the college.

Five students have entered upon their collegiate course. Eight are in the preparatory class, four of whom are residents of the District of Columbia. Attention is invited to the views of the directors on the subject. They propose to make the course of study in the college the full equivalent of that adopted in other colleges, and, as the number of their classes increases, to add to the number of professors, taking care that the corps of instructors shall come fully up to the average of college faculties in number, ability, and fitness.

The institution is authorized, by the fifth section of the organic act, to receive and instruct deaf and dumb persons from the States and Territories of the United States, upon such terms as may be agreed upon by themselves, their parents, guardians, or trustees, and the proper authorities of the institution. It is proposed to receive and instruct those who desire to enter the advanced classes and prosecute the preliminary studies which will fit them for a collegiate course, but who have been unable to make adequate preparation in consequence of the limited educational advantages in State institutions. It is suggested that cases have arisen, and will, doubtless, continue to present themselves, of worthy deaf mutes unable to pay the usual charges; and the directors conceive that they are authorized to remit, in whole or in part, such charges as circumstances seem to require. It was obviously not the intention of Congress to provide, at the national expense, for the instruction of this description of persons residing in the different States. The benefits of the institution, gratuitously conferred, are confined to the two classes first mentioned; and no portion of the fund appropriated by Congress for the salaries and incidental expenses should be diverted from its legitimate purposes and applied to the support of pupils belonging to neither of those classes. The expenses of all such, if not properly chargeable upon the fund furnished by voluntary private contributions, should be defrayed by themselves, or by the State or community to which they belong. The board disclaim the intention of competing or interfering with State institutions; but as the range of instruction in them is confined within narrow limits, an opinion is advanced in the report that "funds should be drawn from the national resources" for the support of an institution which will extend to these unfortunates facilities for cultivating the higher branches of learning. The appropriations asked for imply a conviction on the part of the directors that this opinion will be sanctioned and made effectual by appropriate legislation. It will be for Congress to determine whether an institution shall be maintained at the national metropolis, where the deaf mutes of the country may enjoy the opportunity of pursuing the classic and scientific studies which enter into the course of collegiate instruction.

The act of February 23, 1865, declares the corporate name of the institution. I have serious doubts whether it, or any department thereof, can rightfully assume the name of "The National Deaf Mute College" without authority from Congress.

It affords me pleasure to bear witness to the disinterested zeal with which the directors have labored to render the institution as useful in its practical workings as it is humane and generous in its conception. The vacancies in the board, occasioned by the lamented death of Mr. Edes, and of Mr. Mitchell, have been filled by the appointment of Mr. Chief Justice Chase and Benjamin B. French, Esq.

The board has been fortunate in securing the services of those charged with the academic and domestic departments. They have performed their duties with an intelligence and fidelity worthy of all praise.

COURT-HOUSES.

This Department, on repeated occasions, has referred to the limited and precarious accommodations for holding the courts of the southern district of New York. The Government had a term of years in the property which those courts continue to occupy, but is liable to be soon dispossessed under the present temporary arrangement, and no other could be made after the expiration of the lease. It appears from the report made by this Department to the Senate of the United States on the 6th of December last, that on the 1st day of January of that year more cases were pending, and more had been instituted within the preceding twelve months, in that than in any other judicial district. The duty of the Government to furnish all proper facilities for the prompt transaction of the business of the courts, and the preservation of their archives and records, will not be questioned. The courts at Baltimore, Philadelphia, Boston, Cincinnati, Louisville, New Orleans, and various other points, are now held in buildings belonging to the Government, and no just reason exists why this policy should not be extended, and its benefits secured to the judges, officers, and litigating parties at the leading commercial city of the Union. There was a clause in the lease reserving to the United States the right of purchasing the property, at a stipulated sum, within a specified period, which has since elapsed, and I am not advised whether the proprietors are now willing to dispose of it on the same terms. I recommend that this Department be authorized to make, by purchase, permanent arrangements for the Federal courts in the city of New York, and that an appropriation be placed under its control for the purpose.

The eastern judicial district of New York was created at the last session of Congress. The Department has encountered serious difficulty in its attempts to secure suitable apartments in the city of Brooklyn for the accommodation of the courts. I strongly urge upon Congress the consideration of the propriety of providing for the erection of a suitable building, portions of which may be appropriated to the district and circuit courts and their respective officers, and the remainder to the city post office and other needful public uses.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JAMES HARLAN,
Secretary of the Interior.

To the PRESIDENT.

Report of the Secretary of the Treasury.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON, December 4, 1865.

In conformity with law, the Secretary of the Treasury has the honor to submit to Congress his annual report.

Next in importance to the great questions involved in the restoration of the Federal authority over the southern States, and the re-establishment of civil government therein under the Constitution, are the financial questions embracing—

The Currency;
The Public Debt; and The Revenue;

all of which demand the early and careful attention of Congress.

In presenting these important subjects, with their various connections, the Secretary is painfully conscious of his own inability properly to discuss them, difficult as they are, and involving as they do the national honor and the pecuniary interests of thirty millions of people. He will, however, offer as clearly and definitely as he can his own views in relation to them, not doubting that Congress will sustain and carry out, by appropriate legislation, those that are approved by their superior wisdom, and reject those which are regarded as either impracticable or unsound.

The fact that means have been raised, without foreign loans, to meet the expenses of a protracted and very costly war, is evidence, not only of the great resources of the country, but of the wisdom of Congress in passing the necessary laws, and of the distinguished ability of the immediate predecessors of the present Secretary in administering them. It is hardly necessary to suggest, however, that the legislation which was proper and wise during the progress of hostilities may not be appropriate or even justifiable in a time of peace.

The right of Congress, at all times, to borrow money and to issue obligations for loans in such form as may be convenient, is unquestionable; but their authority to issue obligations for a circulating medium as money, and to make these obligations a legal tender, can only be found in the unwritten law which sanctions whatever the representatives of the people, whose duty it is to maintain the Government against its enemies, may consider in a great emergency necessary to be done. The present legal-tender acts were war measures, and while the repeal of those provisions which made the United States notes lawful money is not now recommended, the Secretary is of the opinion that they ought not to remain in force one day longer than shall be necessary to enable the people to prepare for a return to the constitutional currency. It is not supposed that it was the intention of Congress, by these acts, to introduce a standard of value, in times of peace, lower than the coin standard, much less to perpetuate the discredit which must attach to a great nation which dishonors its own obligations by unnecessarily keeping in circulation an irredeemable paper currency. It has not, in past times, been regarded as the province of Congress to furnish the people directly with money in any form. Their authority is "to coin money and fix the value thereof;" and, inasmuch as a mixed currency, consisting of paper and specie, has been found to be a commercial necessity, it would seem also to be their duty to provide, as has been done by the national currency act, that this paper currency should be secured beyond any reasonable contingency. To go beyond this, however, and issue Government obligations, making them by statute a legal tender for all debts, public and private, is not believed to be, under ordinary circumstances, within the scope of their duties or constitutional powers.

The reasons which are sometimes urged in favor of United States notes as a permanent currency are, the saving of interest and their perfect safety and uniform value.

The objections to such a policy are, that the paper circulation of the country should be flexible, increasing and decreasing according to the requirements of legitimate business, while, if furnished by the Government, it would be quite likely to be governed by the necessities of the Treasury or the interests of parties, rather than the demands of commerce and trade. Besides, a permanent Government currency would be greatly in the way of public economy, and would give to the party in possession of the Government a power which it might be under strong temptations to use for other purposes than the public good—keeping the question of the currency constantly before the people as a political question, than which few things would be more injurious to business.

But the great and insuperable objection, as already stated, to the direct issue of notes by the Government, as a policy, is the fact that the Government of the United States is one of limited and defined powers, and that the authority to issue notes as money is neither expressly given to Congress by the Constitution, nor fairly to be inferred, except as a measure of necessity in a great national exigency. No consideration of a mere pecuniary character should induce an exercise by Congress of powers not clearly contemplated by the instrument upon which our political fabric was established. The Government, in the great contest which has been recently closed, has not sought to increase its own powers, nor to interfere with the rightful powers of the States. The questions decided by the war are, that the Union is indissoluble; that whatever is essentially opposed to it must be removed; that the Federal authority, within its proper sphere, is supreme; and that the validity of acts of Congress is not to be determined by the States, but by that tribunal which the complex character of the Government made a necessity. It is the crowning glory of the Constitution that this great war has been waged and closed without the powers of the Government being enlarged or its relations to the States being changed.

The issue of United States notes as lawful money was a measure expedient, doubtless, and necessary in the great emergency in which it was adopted, but this emergency no longer exists, and however desirable may be the saving of interest, and however satisfactory these notes may be as a circulating medium, these considerations will not, it is respectfully submitted, justify a departure from that strict construction of the Constitution given to it previous to the war by patriotic men of all parties, and which is essential to the equal and harmonious working of our peculiar institutions. The strength of the Government has been proved by the manner in which it has carried on the greatest war of modern times; it only remains, for the vindication of its excellence and the perfection of its triumphs, that all powers exercised for its preservation, but not expressly granted by the Constitution, be relinquished with the return of peace. While, therefore, the Secretary is of the opinion that the immediate repeal of the legal-tender provisions of the acts referred to would be unwise, as being likely to affect injuriously the legitimate business of the country, upon the prosperity of which depend the welfare of the people and the revenues which are necessary for the maintenance of the national credit, and unjust to the holders of the notes, he is of the opinion that not only these provisions, but the acts also, should be regarded as only temporary, and that the work of retiring the notes which have been issued under them should be commenced without delay, and carefully and persistently continued until all are retired.

In speaking of the legal-tender acts, reference has only been made to those which authorized the issue of the United States notes. The interest-bearing notes which are a legal tender for their face value were intended to be a security rather than a circulating medium; and it would be neither injurious to the public, nor an act of bad faith to the holders, for Congress to declare that, after their maturity, they shall cease to be a legal tender, while such a declaration would aid the Government in its efforts to retire them, and is therefore recommended.

The rapidity with which the Government notes can be withdrawn will depend upon the ability of the Secretary to dispose of securities. The influence of funding upon the money market will sufficiently prevent their too rapid withdrawal. The Secretary, however, believes that a decided movement toward a contraction of the currency is not only a public necessity, but that it will speedily dissipate the apprehension which very generally exists, that the effect of such a policy must necessarily be to make money scarce and to diminish the prosperity of the country.

It is a well-established fact, which has not escaped the attention of all intelligent observers, that the demand for money increases (by reason of an advance of prices) with the supply, and that this demand is not unfrequently most pressing when the volume of currency is the largest and inflation has reached the culminating point. Money being an unprofitable article to hold, very little is withheld from active use, and in proportion to its increase prices advance; on the other hand, a reduction of it reduces prices, and as prices are reduced the demand for it falls off; so that, paradoxical as it may seem, a diminution of the currency may in fact increase the supply of it.

Nor need there be any apprehension that a reduction of the currency—unless it be a violent one—will injuriously affect real prosperity. Labor is the great source of national wealth, and industry invariably declines on an inflated currency. The value of money depends upon the manner in which it is used. If it stimulates productive industry, it is a benefit, and to the extent only to which it does this it is a benefit. If, on the other hand, it diminishes industry, and to the extent to which it diminishes it, it is an evil. Even in the form of the precious metals it may not prove to be wealth to a nation. The idea that a country is necessarily rich in proportion to the amount of gold or silver which it possesses, is a common and natural, but an erroneous one; while the opinion that real prosperity is advanced by an increase of paper money beyond what is absolutely needed as a medium for exchanges of real values, is so totally fallacious, that few sane men entertain it whose judgment is not clouded by the peculiar financial atmosphere which an inflation is so apt to produce.

An irredeemable paper currency may be a necessity, but it can scarcely fail, if long continued, to be a calamity to any people. Gold and silver are the only proper measure of value. They have been made so by the tacit agreement of nations, and are the necessary regulator of trade, the medium by which balances are settled between different countries and between sections of the same country. As a universal measure of value, they are a commercial necessity. The trade between different nations and between sections of the same country is carried on by an exchange of commodities, but is never equally balanced by them; and unless credits are being established, the movements of coin unerringly indicate on which side the balance exists.

If the United States buy of other nations—as they now and too generally do—more than they sell to them, it is evident that a balance is thus created which must either be settled in coin or continued as a debt.

That balances between nations should be promptly paid is the dictate of wisdom, because by prompt payment the adverse current is checked before the debtor nation becomes seriously involved; while, on the other hand, if they are permitted to accumulate, they may, when the day of payment can no longer be deferred, prove not only disastrous to the debtor, but greatly disturb the business of the creditor nation. Even with the vast increase of gold and silver which has taken place within the last quarter of a century, the specie which is possessed by commercial nations is a very inconsiderable sum in comparison with their foreign and domestic property exchanges; and no nation can afford to continue a traffic which leaves it with a heavy debt to be paid in the precious metals, unless these metals are a part of its productions, and then only to the extent that they are productions. When there are no artificial obstacles in the way, and balances between nations are promptly settled, the flow of coin from one to the other produces but little embarrassment to the debtor nation. The nation that loses coin either diminishes its purchases, or, by a reduction of the prices of its commodities which the loss occasions, becomes a more inviting market than before, and by attracting purchasers, reverses the current and draws again to itself the coin of which it had been deprived.

All this is well understood, and if trade between nations were carried on by an exchange of products and a prompt payment of balances in specie, no nation would ever become indebted to another to an extent seriously to affect its prosperity.

All serious embarrassment growing out of commercial intercourse between the people of different nations results from failure in the prompt payment of balances, and the carrying forward of these balances by extensions of credits.

The trade between the different sections of the United States is subject to the same laws. If one section, in the course of trade, becomes a debtor to another, the balances must be carried in the form of debt, always expensive and generally dangerous to the debtor section, or settled with money. If the measure of value is a convertible currency, and trade and exchanges are left to the natural laws that govern them, settlements take place promptly and without embarrassment to business. The banks of the debtor section are drawn upon by their depositors and note-holders for coin or exchange. This return of notes and withdrawal of deposits, if considerable in amount, produce a contraction of discounts; and this contraction either checks overtrading or so reduces the price of products as to increase the demand for them until the current changes and the equilibrium is restored.

This brief statement of the well-known laws of trade not only illustrates the necessity of prompt payment of balances between the United States and foreign nations and between the different sections of the United States, but the necessity of having everywhere the same standard of value.

It is admitted that on a coin basis there will be periods of expansion. Times of the greatest expansion and speculation in the United States have been, indeed, when the banks were nominally paying specie. This was the case prior to the revulsions of 1837 and 1857, the expansion of credits having, in both instances, preceded suspension; but this does not militate against the theory just stated.

The great expansion of 1835 and 1836, ending with the terrible financial collapse of 1837, from the effects of which the country did not rally for years, was the consequence of excessive bank circulation and discounts, and an abuse of the credit system, stimulated in the first place by Government deposits with the State banks, and swelled by currency and credits until, under the wild spirit of speculation which pervaded the country, labor and production decreased to such an extent that the country which should have been the great food-producing country of the world became an importer of bread-stuffs.

The balance of trade had been for a long time favorable to Europe and against the United States, and also in favor of the commercial cities of the sea-board and against the interior, but a vicious system of credits prevented the prompt settlement of balances. The importers established large credits abroad, by means of which they were enabled to give favorable terms to the jobbers. The jobbers, in turn, were thus, and by liberal accommodations from the banks, able to give "their own time" to country merchants, who, in turn, sold to their customers on an indefinite credit. It then seemed to be more reputable to borrow money than to earn it, and pleasanter, and apparently more profitable, to speculate than to work; and so the people ran headlong into debt, labor decreased, production fell off, and ruin followed.

The financial crisis of 1857 was the result of a similar cause, namely, the unhealthy extension of the various forms of credit. But, as in this case the evil had not been long at work, and productive industry had not been seriously diminished, the reaction, though sharp and destructive, was not general, nor were the embarrassments resulting from it protracted.

Now, in both these instances the expansions occurred while the business of the country was upon a specie basis, but it was only nominally so. A false system of credits had intervened, under which payments were deferred, and specie as a measure of value and a regulator of trade was practically ignored. Everything moved smoothly and apparently prosperously as long as credits could be established and continued, but as soon as payments were demanded and specie was in requisition, distrust commenced, and collapse ensued. In these instances the expansions preceded and contractions followed the suspensions, but it will be recollected that while the waves were rising specie ceased to be a regulator, by reason of a credit system which prevented the use of it.

The present inflation following the suspension of 1861, is the result of heavy expenditures by the Government in the prosecution of the war and the introduction of a new measure of value in the form of United States and Treasury notes as lawful money. The country, as a whole, notwithstanding the ravages of the war, and the draft which has been made upon labor, is, by its greatly developed resources, far in advance in real wealth of what it was in 1857, when the last severe financial crisis occurred. The people are now comparatively free from debt; the banks, with their secured circulation and large investments in Government securities, although not in an easy condition, and doubtless too much extended, are, it is believed, generally solvent; but the same causes are at work that produced the evils referred to. There is an immense volume of paper money in circulation—under the influence of which prices, already enormously high, are steadily advancing, and speculation is increasing—which must be contracted if similar disasters would be avoided.

If the war could have been prosecuted on a specie basis, there would doubtless have been a considerable advance in the prices of those articles which were in demand by the Government; but, inasmuch as in the condition of our political affairs extensive credits could not have been established in Europe, the tendency in this direction would have been kept within reasonable check by the outflow of coin to other nations, which would have been the natural result of the advancing prices in the United States. On a basis of paper money, for which there was no outlet, all articles needed for immediate use, of which it became the measure of value, felt and responded to the daily increase of the currency; so that rents and the prices of most articles for which there has been a demand, have been, with slight fluctuations, constantly advancing from the commencement of the war, and are higher now, with gold at forty-seven per cent. premium, than they were when it was at one hundred and eighty-five. Even those which were affected by the fall of gold upon the surrender of the confederate armies, or by the increased supply or diminished demand, are advancing again to former if not higher rates. The expansion has now reached such a point as to be absolutely oppressive to a large portion of the people, while at the same time it is diminishing labor, and is becoming subversive of good morals.

There are no indications of real and permanent prosperity in our large importations of foreign fabrics; in the heavy operations at our commercial marts; in the splendid fortunes reported to be made by skillful manipulations at the gold room or the stock board; no evidences of increasing wealth in the facts that railroads and steamboats are crowded with passengers, and hotels with guests; that cities are full to overflowing, and rents and the prices of the necessities of life, as well as luxuries, are daily advancing. All these things prove rather that a foreign debt is being created, that the number of non-producers is increasing, and that productive industry is being diminished. There is no fact more manifest than that the plethora of paper money is not only undermining the morals of the people by encouraging waste and extravagance, but is striking at the root of our material prosperity by diminishing labor. The evil is not at present beyond the control of legislation, but it is daily increasing, and, if not speedily checked, will, at no distant day, culminate in wide-spread disaster. The remedy, and the only remedy within the control of Congress is, in the opinion of the Secretary, to be found in the reduction of the currency.

The paper circulation of the United States, on the 31st of October last, was substantially as follows:

1. United States notes and fractional currency.....	$454,218,038 20
2. Notes of the national banks.....	185,000,000 00
3. Notes of State banks, including outstanding issues of State banks converted into national banks.....	65,000,000 00
	$704,218,038 20

The amount of notes furnished to the national banks up to and including the 31st of October, was a little over $205,000,000, but it is estimated that $20,000,000 of these had not then been put into circulation.

In addition to the United States notes, there were also outstanding $82,536,900 five per cent. Treasury notes, and $173,012,140 compound-interest notes, of which it would, doubtless, be safe to estimate that $30,000,000 were in circulation as currency.

From this statement it appears that, without including seven and three-tenths notes, many of the small denominations of which were in circulation as money, and all of which tend in some measure to swell the inflation, the paper money of the country amounted, on the 31st of October, to the sum of $734,218,038 20, which has been daily increased by the notes since furnished to the national banks, and is likely to be still further increased by those to which they are entitled, until the amount authorized by law ($300,000,000) shall have been reached, subject to such reduction as may be made by the withdrawal of the notes of the State banks.

The following is a statement of the bank-note circulation of the country at various periods of highest and lowest issues prior to the war:

January, 1830.....	$61,324,000
January, 1835.....	103,692,495
January, 1836.....	140,301,038
January, 1837.....	149,185,890
January, 1843.....	55,564,000
January, 1856.....	196,747,950
January, 1857.....	214,778,822
January, 1860.....	207,102,000

It will be noticed by this statement that the bank-note circulation of the United States increased from $61,324,000 to $149,185,890 between the 1st of January, 1830, and the 1st of January, 1837, in which latter year the great financial collapse took place; fell from $149,185,890 in 1837, to $58,564,000 in 1843, and rose to $214,778,822 on the 1st of January, 1857, in which year the next severe crisis occurred; falling during that year to $155,208,344, and rising to $207,102,000 on the 1st of January, 1860.

The following is a statement of bank deposits and loans in the same years:

Years.	Deposits.	Loans.
January 1, 1830.....	$55,560,000	$200,451,000
January 1, 1835.....	83,081,000	365,163,000
January 1, 1836.....	115,104,000	457,506,000
January 1, 1837.....	127,397,000	525,115,000
January 1, 1843.....	56,108,000	254,544,000
January 1, 1856.....	212,706,000	634,183,000
January 1, 1857.....	230,351,000	684,456,000
January 1, 1858.....	185,932,000	585,165,000
January 1, 1860.....	253,902,000	691,915,000

On the 30th of September, the date of their last quarterly reports, the deposits and loans of the national banks (the Secretary has no reliable returns of these items from the few remaining State banks) were as follows:

Deposits, individual and Government.....	$544,160,194
Loans.....	$485,514,029

To which should be added—

Investments in United States bonds and other United States securities.....	427,731,600

These figures are a history in themselves, exhibiting not only the past and present condition of the country, in matters of exceeding interest, but indicating unerringly the dangerous direction in which the financial current is sweeping.

On the 1st of January of the memorable year 1837, the bank-note circulation of the United States was $149,185,890, the deposits were $127,397,000, the loans $525,115,000. In January, 1857, the year of the next great crisis, the circulation was $214,778,822, the deposits were $230,351,000, the loans $684,456,000. There are no statistics to exhibit the amount of specie actually in circulation in those periods, but it would be a liberal estimate to put it at $30,000,000 for 1837, and $50,000,000 for 1857.

These were years of great inflation, the effects of which have been already referred to—the revulsion of 1837 not only producing great immediate embarrassment, but a prostration which continued until 1843, at the commencement of which year the bank-note circulation amounted only to $58,564,000, deposits to $56,108,000, loans $254,544,000—flour having declined in New York from $10 25 per barrel on the 1st of January, 1837, to $4 69 on the 1st of January, 1843, and other articles in about the same proportion.

The reaction in 1857 was severe, but, for the reason before stated, less disastrous and protracted.

On the 30th of September last, the deposits of the national banks alone amounted to $544,160,194; their loans—estimating their national securities as a loan to the Government—to $913,045,629; both of which items must have been increased during the month of October; while on the 31st of that month the circulation, bank and national, had reached the startling amount of upward of $700,000,000. Nothing beyond this statement is required to exhibit the present inflation or to explain the causes of the current and the advancing prices. If disaster followed the expansions of 1837 and 1857, what must be the consequences of the present expansion unless speedily checked and reduced!

It is undoubtedly true that trade is carried on much more largely for cash than was ever the case previous to 1861, and that there is a much greater proper demand for money than there would be if sales were made, as heretofore, on credit. It is also true that there is a larger demand than formerly for money on the part of manufacturers for the payment of operatives. But, making the most liberal allowances for the increased wholesome demand arising from these causes and from the advance of the country in business and population, it is apparent from the foregoing statements, if the advance in prices did not establish the fact, that the circulating medium of the country is altogether excessive.

Before concluding his remarks upon this subject, it may be proper for the Secretary, even at the expense of repetition, to notice briefly some of the popular and plausible objections to a reduction of the currency:

First. That by reducing prices it would operate injuriously, if not disastrously, upon trade, and be quite likely to precipitate a financial crisis.

To this it may be replied, that prices of articles of indispensable necessity are already so high as to be severely oppressive to consumers, especially to persons of fixed and moderate incomes and to the poorer classes. Not only do the interests, but the absolute necessities of the masses require that the prices of articles needed for their use should decline.

Nor is there any reason to apprehend, by any policy that Congress may adopt, so rapid a reduction of prices as to produce very serious embarrassment to trade. The Government currency can only, to any considerable extent, be withdrawn by a sale of bonds, and the demand for bonds will be so affected by the state of the market that a rapid contraction will be difficult, if not impossible, even if it were desirable. There is more danger to be apprehended from the inability of the Government to reduce its circulation rapidly enough, than from a too rapid reduction of it. It is, in part, to prevent a financial crisis, that is certain to come without it, that the Secretary recommends contraction. Prices are daily advancing. The longer contraction is deferred, the greater must the fall eventually be, and the more serious will be its consequences. It is not expected that a return to specie payments will bring prices back to the standards of former years. The great increase of the precious metals and high taxes will prevent this; but this consideration makes it the more important that all improper and unnecessary influences in this direction should be removed.

Again, it is urged that a contraction of the currency would reduce the public revenues.

It is possible that this might be the immediate effect, but it would be temporary only. The public revenues depend upon the development of our national resources, upon our surplus productions; in other words, upon labor. The revenues derived from transactions based upon a false standard of value, or from interests that can only flourish in speculative times, are not those upon which reliance can be placed for maintaining the public credit. What a healthy and reliable business requires is a stable basis. This it cannot have as long as the country is afflicted with an inconvertible currency, the value of which, as well as the value of the vast property which is measured by it, is fluctuating and unreliable, and may be in no small degree controlled by speculative combinations.

It is also urged that the proposed policy would endanger the public credit, by preventing funding; and that it would compel the Government and the people, who are in debt, to pay in a dearer currency than that in which their debts were contracted.

The Secretary is unable to perceive any substantial ground for this objection. He cannot understand how the process of funding is likely to be aided by the continuance of prices on their present high level, or how the credit of the Government is to be restored by the perpetuation of an irredeemable currency, especially as that currency consists largely of its own notes. While it is hoped that early provision will be made for the commencement of the reduction of the national debt, an early payment of it is not anticipated. Nor is it understood that those who are apprehensive of the effects of contraction entertain the opinion that the present condition of things should be continued until any considerable portion of this debt shall be paid.

So far as individual indebtedness is regarded, it may be remarked; that the people of the United States, if not as free from debt as they were six months ago, are much less in debt than they have been in previous years, and altogether less than they will be when the inevitable day of payment comes around, if the volume of paper money is not curtailed. A financial policy which would prevent the creation of debts and stimulate the payment of those already existing, so far from being injurious, would be in the highest degree beneficial.

It is further urged that a reduction of the Government notes would embarrass the national banks, if it did not force many of them into liquidation.

To which it may be said, that it is better that the banks should be embarrassed now than bankrupted hereafter. Their business and their customers are now under their control. What will be their condition in these respects if the expansion continues and swells a year or two longer, it is not difficult to predict. While there has been no unhealthy expansion of credits in the United States for which the banks have not been largely responsible, there has been none by which they have not been ultimately the losers. Unless their sentiments are misunderstood by the Secretary, the conservative bankers of the country are quite unanimously in favor of a curtailment of the currency, with a view to an early return to specie payments.

Again, it is said that the excessive bank deposits have as much influence in creating and sustaining high prices as a superabundant currency. This is unquestionably true; but it is also true that excessive deposits are the effect of excessive currency, and that whenever the currency is reduced there will be, at least, a corresponding, if not a greater, reduction of deposits.

The last objection which will be noticed to the measure recommended is, that it would, by reducing the rate of foreign exchanges, reduce exports and increase imports.

It is doubtless true that a high rate of exchange did for a time increase the exportations of our productions, and diminish the importation of foreign articles, but this advantage was much more than counterbalanced by the largely increased expenses of the Government and of the people resulting from the very cause that produced the high rate of exchange. Besides, this apparent advantage no longer exists. The advance of prices in the United States, notwithstanding the continued high rate of European exchange, is now checking exports and inviting imports, and is creating a balance in favor of Europe that is likely to be the greatest obstacle in the way of an early resumption of specie payments. Nor must it be forgotten, that while the export of our productions was stimulated by the high rate of exchange, this very high rate of exchange enabled Europe to purchase them at exceedingly low prices.

Unless an unusual demand for our products is created in Europe by extraordinary causes, it will be ascertained, by reference to the proper tables, that our imports increase, and our exports diminish, under the influence of a redundant currency. But reference to figures is hardly necessary to substantiate this proposition. It is substantiated by the statement of it. A country in which high prices prevail is an inviting one for sellers, but an uninviting one for purchasers. Such a country is, unfortunately, the United States at the present time. In order, however, that there may be no misapprehension on this point, the attention of Congress is respectfully called to a clear and interesting paper from Dr. Elder, Statistician of this Department, accompanying this report.

Every consideration, therefore, that has been brought to the mind of the Secretary, confirms the correctness of the views he has presented. If the business of the country rested upon a stable basis, or if credits could be kept from being still further increased, there would be less occasion for solicitude on this subject. But such is not the fact. Business is not in a healthy condition; it is speculative, feverish, uncertain. Every day that contraction is deferred increases the difficulty of preventing a financial collapse. Prices and credits will not remain as they are. The tide will either recede or advance; and it will not recede without the exercise of the controlling power of Congress.

The Secretary, therefore, respectfully but earnestly recommends—

First. That Congress declare that the compound-interest notes shall cease to be a legal tender from the day of their maturity.

Second. That the Secretary be authorized, in his discretion, to sell bonds of the United States, bearing interest at a rate not exceeding six per cent, and redeemable and payable at such periods as may be conducive to the interests of the Government, for the purpose of retiring not only compound-interest notes, but the United States notes.

It is the opinion of the Secretary, as has been already stated, that the process of contraction cannot be injuriously rapid; and that it will not be necessary to retire more than one hundred, or at most two hundred millions of United States notes, in addition to the compound notes, before the desired result will be attained. But neither the amount of reduction, nor the time that will be required to bring up the currency to the specie standard, can now be estimated with any degree of accuracy. The first thing to be done is to establish the policy of contraction. When this is effected, the Secretary believes that the business of the country will readily accommodate itself to the proposed change in the action of Government, and that specie payments may be restored without a shock to trade, and without a diminution of the public revenues or of productive industry.

At the close of a great war, which has been waged on both sides with a vigor and energy, and with an expenditure of money, without a precedent in history, the people of the United States are incumbered with a debt which requires the immediate and careful consideration of their representatives.

Since the commencement of the special session of 1861, the most important subject which has demanded and received the attention of Congress has been that of providing the means to prosecute the war; and the success of the Government in raising money is evidence of the wisdom of the measures devised for this purpose, as well as of the loyalty of the people and the resources of the country. No nation within the same period ever borrowed so largely, or with so much facility. It is now to be demonstrated that a republican Government can not only carry on a war on the most gigantic scale, and create a debt of immense magnitude, but can place this debt on a satisfactory basis, and meet every engagement with fidelity. The same wisdom which has been exhibited by the national councils in providing the means for preserving the national unity, will not be wanting in devising measures for establishing the national credit.

The maintenance of public faith is a national necessity. Nations do not and cannot safely accumulate moneys to be used at a future day, and exigencies are constantly occurring in which the richest and most powerful are under the necessity of borrowing. The millennial days, when nations shall beat their swords into plowshares, and their spears into pruning-hooks, and learn war no more, are yet, according to all existing indications, far in the future. Weak and defaulting nations may maintain a nominally independent existence, but it will be by reason of the jealousies, rather than the forbearance of stronger Powers. No nation is absolutely safe which is not in a condition to defend itself; nor can it be in this condition, no matter how strong in other respects, without a well-established financial credit. Nations cannot, therefore, afford to be unfaithful to their pecuniary obligations. Credit to them, as to individuals, is money; and money is the war power of the age. But for the unfaltering confidence of the people of the loyal States in the good faith of the Government, the late rebellion would have been a success, and this great nation, so rapidly becoming again united and harmonious, would have been broken into weak and belligerent fragments.

But the public faith of the United States has higher considerations than these for its support. It rests not only upon the interests of the people, but upon their integrity and virtue. The debt of the United States has been created by the people in their successful struggle for undivided and indivisible nationality. It is not a debt imposed upon unwilling subjects by despotic authority, but one incurred by the people themselves for the preservation of their Government—by the preservation of which, those who have been leagued together for its overthrow are to be as really benefited as those who have been battling for its maintenance. As it is a debt voluntarily incurred for the common good, its burdens will be cheerfully borne by the people, who will not permit them to be permanent.

The public debt of the United States represents a portion of the accumulated wealth of the country. While it is a debt of the nation, it becomes the capital of the citizen. The means of the merchant, the manufacturer, and farmer, and also those of the workingman and the soldier, have been liberally invested in it; and it is an interesting fact—a practical evidence of the great resources of the country—that so large an amount of their wealth could be loaned by the people to the Government without embarrassing industrial pursuits. Notwithstanding more than two thousand million dollars of the means of the people of the United States have been thus loaned, no branch of useful industry has suffered by the investment. It is undoubtedly true that if the wealth which has been invested in United States securities could have been employed in agriculture, in commerce, in mining and manufactures; in opening farms and the better improvement of those already under cultivation, in building railroads and ships, in working the mines, and in increasing the variety and amount of our manufactures, the nation would have been far in advance of what it now is in material prosperity. But it is also true, that, notwithstanding the large investments by the people of the United States in the securities of their Government; notwithstanding, also, more than two million men, in the northern States alone, were, for longer or shorter periods, in the military service, and at least seven hundred thousand for a good part of the time the war continued were constantly under arms; and notwithstanding the immense waste of life, consequent upon operations so extensive and battles so sanguinary as characterized this memorable struggle, the larger part of the country has still, since 1860, progressed both in wealth and population. The loyal States have advanced in material prosperity in spite of the great drain that has been made upon them; and now that the war is closed, the Union is no longer in peril, and the men that made the armies on both sides so effective and formidable are to be again employed in profitable pursuits, the onward march of the country—even if a temporary reaction, as the result of the war and the redundancy of the currency, shall be experienced—will be decided and resistless.

The debt is large, but if kept at home, as it is desirable it should be, with a judicious systom of taxation it need not be oppressive. It is, however, a debt. While it is capital to the holders of the securities, it is still a national debt, and an incumbrance upon the national estate. Neither its advantages nor its burdens are or can be shared or borne equally by the people. Its influences are anti-republican. It adds to the power of the Executive by increasing Federal patronage. It must be distasteful to the people because it fills the country with informers and tax-gatherers. It is dangerous to the public virtue, because it involves the collection and disbursement of vast sums of money, and renders rigid national economy almost impracticable. It is, in a word, a national burden, and the work of removing it—no matter how desirable it may be for individual investment—should not be long postponed.

As all true men desire to leave to their heirs unincumbered estates, so should it be the ambition of the people of the United States to relieve their descendants of this national mortgage. We need not be anxious that future generations shall share the burden with us. Wars are not at an end, and posterity will have enough to do to take care of the debts of their own creation.

Various plans have been suggested for the payment of the debt, but the Secretary sees no way of accomplishing it but by an increase of the national income beyond the national expenditures. In a matter of so great importance as this, experiments are out of place. The plain beaten path of experience is the only safe one to tread.

The first step to be taken is, to institute measures for funding the obligations that are soon to mature. The next is, to provide for raising, in a manner the least odious and oppressive to tax-payers, the revenues necessary to pay the interest on the debt, and a certain definite amount annually for the reduction of the principal. The Secretary respectfully suggests that on this subject the expression of Congress should be decided and emphatic. It is of the greatest importance, in the management of a matter of so surpassing interest, that the right start should be made. Nothing but revenue will sustain the national credit, and nothing less than a fixed policy for the reduction of the public debt will be likely to prevent its increase.

On the 31st day of October, 1865, since which time no material change has taken place, the public debt, without deducting funds in the Treasury, amounted to $2,808,549,437 55, consisting of the following items:

Bonds, 10-40's, 5 per cent., due in 1904.....	$172,770,100 00

In the report of the Secretary for the year 1864, there was excluded from the public debt the sum of $77,897,347 02, which amount had been paid out of the Treasury, but had not been reimbursed to the Treasurer by warrants, and was not reimbursed until after the commencement of the next fiscal year. This explains the difference between $18,842,558 71, assumed in that report as the balance in the Treasury July 1, 1864, and $96,739,905 73, the balance according to the warrant account, as above stated.

The following is a statement of the receipts and expenditures for the quarter ending September 30, 1865:

The debt of the United States was increased during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1865, $941,902,537 04, and during the first quarter of the present fiscal year $138,773,097 22. The Secretary has, however, the satisfaction of being able to state that during the months of September and October the public debt was diminished to the amount of about $13,000,000.

If the expenditures for the remaining three quarters of the present fiscal year shall equal the estimates, there will be a deficiency, to be provided for by loans, of $112,194,947 20, to which must be added $32,586,901 for the five per cent. Treasury notes, (part of the public debt,) which become due the present month, and are now being paid out of moneys in the Treasury, and all other payments which may be made on the public debt.

The heavy expenditures of the last fiscal year, and of the months of July and August of the present fiscal year, are the result of the gigantic scale on which the war was prosecuted during a portion of this period, and the payment of the officers and men mustered out of the service. The large estimates of the War Department for the rest of the year are for the payment of troops which are to remain in the service, and of those which are to be discharged, and for closing up existing balances.

The statement of the probable receipts and expenditures for the next fiscal year is, in the highest degree, satisfactory. According to estimates which are believed to be reliable, the receipts of that year will be sufficient to pay all current expenses of the Government, the interest on the public debt, and leave the handsome balance of $111,682,818 12 to be applied toward the payment of the debt itself.

By the statement of the public debt on the 31st of October, it appears that, beside the compound-interest, the United States, and the fractional notes, the past-due debt amounted to $1,873,920 09; the debt due in 1865 and 1866 to $187,649,646 46; the debt due in 1867 and 1868 to $848,323,591 80.

During the month of October about $50,000,000 of the compound-interest notes were funded in 5-20 six per cent. bonds under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1865.

The Secretary would be gratified if the Treasury could at once be put in a condition to obviate the necessity of issuing any more certificates of indebtedness, or raising money by any kind of temporary loans; but he may, for a short period, be obliged to avail himself of any means now authorized by law for meeting current expenses and other proper demands upon the Treasury.

Of the debt falling due in 1867 and 1868, \$830,000,000 consist of 7 $\frac{1}{2}$  notes. It may be regarded as premature to fund any considerable amount of these notes within the next year; but in view of the fact that they are convertible into bonds only at the pleasure of the holders, it will be evidently prudent for Congress to authorize the Secretary, whenever it can be advantageously done, to fund them in advance of their maturity.

The Secretary has already recommended that he be authorized to sell bonds of the United States, bearing interest at a rate not exceeding six per cent., for the purpose of retiring Treasury notes and United States notes. He further recommends that he be authorized to sell, in his discretion, bonds of a similar character to meet any deficiency for the present fiscal year, to reduce the temporary loan by such an amount as he may deem advisable, to pay the certificates of indebtedness as they mature, and also to take up any portion of the debt maturing prior to 1869 that can be advantageously retired. It is not probable that it will be advisable, even if it could be done without pressing them upon the market, to sell a much larger amount of bonds within the present or the next fiscal year than will be necessary to meet any deficiency of the Treasury, to pay the past-due and maturing obligations of the Government, and a part of the temporary loan, and to retire an amount of the compound-interest notes and United States notes sufficient to bring back the business of the country to a healthier condition. But no harm can result from investing the Secretary with authority to dispose of bonds, if the condition of the market will justify it, in order to anticipate the payment of those obligations that must soon be provided for.

When the whole debt shall be put in such a form that the interest only can be demanded, until the Government shall be in a condition to pay the principal it can be easily managed. It is undeniably large, but the resources of the country are even now ample to carry and gradually to reduce it; and with the labor question at the South settled on terms just to the employer and to the laborer, and with entire harmony between the different sections, it will be rapidly diminished, in burden and amount, by the growth of the country, without an increase of taxation.

The following estimate of the time which would be required to pay the national debt (if funded at five per cent. and at five and one half per cent.) by the payment of $200,000,000 annually on the interest and principal, and also of the diminution of the burden of the debt by the increase of productions, may not be without interest to Congress and to tax-payers.

The national debt, deducting moneys in the Treasury, was, on the 31st of October, 1865, $2,740,854,750. Without attempting a nice calculation of the amount it may reach when all our liabilities shall be accurately ascertained, it seems safe to estimate it, on the 1st of July, 1866, at $3,000,000,000. The exact amount of existing indebtedness yet unsettled, and the further amount that may accrue in the interval, are not now capable of exact estimation, and the revenue of the same period can be only approximately calculated, but it will be safe to assume that the debt will not exceed the sum named.

The annual interest upon $3,000,000,000, if funded at five and a half per cent. per annum, would be $165,000,000, but if funded at five per cent. it would be $150,000,000.

Now, if $200,000,000 per annum should be applied, in half-yearly installments of $100,000,000 each, in payment of the accruing interest and in reduction of the principal funded at the higher rate of five and a half per cent., the debt would be entirely paid in thirty-two and one eighth years. At five per cent. per annum, it would be extinguished, by the like application of $100,000,000 every six months, in a little over twenty-eight years.

At the higher rate, the sum applied in the first year in reduction of the principal of the debt would be $35,000,000; in the last or thirty-second year, when the interest would be diminished to a little over $9,000,000, about $191,000,000 of the uniform annual payment would go to the reduction of the principal.

On the assumption that the debt may be funded at five per cent., $50,000,000 would be applicable to the reduction of the principal in the first year, and in the twenty-eighth or last year of the period—the interest falling to less than $3,000,000—$192,000,000 of the annual payment would go to the principal.

The annual interest accruing upon $1,725,000,000 of the debt on the 31st of October last averages 6.62 per cent. A part of this sum is now due, another portion will be payable next year, and the balance will be due or payable, at the option of the Government, in 1867 and 1868. If these $1,725,000,000 shall be funded or converted into five per cents by the year 1869, the average interest of the whole debt will be 5.195 per cent. In the year 1871, if the debt then maturing should be funded at the same rate, the average interest would be reduced to 5.15, and in 1881 to five per cent., excepting the bonds for $50,000,000 to be advanced in aid of the Pacific railroad at six per cent., which will have thirty years to run from their respective dates. The interest of these bonds, added to the supposed five per cents, would, in 1881, make the average rate of the entire debt 5.03 per cent. until the whole should be discharged.

In these calculations of the average rate of interest upon the funded debt, the outstanding United States notes and fractional currency are not embraced. Whatever amount of these $454,000,000 may eventually be funded at five per cent. per annum, will proportionally reduce the average rates of interest upon the whole debt.

By the terms and conditions of some portion of the debt, the interest on the whole cannot be reduced to exactly five per cent., unless money may be borrowed, at some stage of the process, at a trifle below five per cent. A bonus of one tenth of one per cent., paid by the bidders for five per cent. loans, would more than cover the excess, the probability of which fully warrants the calculation submitted as to the payment of the total debt at this rate.

It must be observed, also, that the assumed principal of the debt in July, 1866, must undergo some diminution before the funding in 1867, 1868, and 1869 begins. If only $100,000,000 shall be paid off in these three years, the principal, thus reduced to $2,900,000,000, would be extinguished, by the process already stated, in twenty-nine years if funded at five and a half per cent.; and if at five per cent., in something less than twenty-seven years. And it is well worthy of attention that $100,000,000 less principal, at the commencement of the process of payment, will save $400,000,000, in round numbers, in the end, if the rate is five and a half per cent., and $300,000,000 if five per cent.

The burden of a national debt is, of course, relative to the national resources, and these resources are not, strictly speaking, capital, but the current product of the capital and industry of the country. The annual product, however, is found to bear a certain ratio to capital, and this ratio may be conveniently and safely used in computing the probable resources which must in the future meet the national requirement for the payment of interest and extinguishment of the debt.

It has been estimated by one who has made this subject a study, that the products of agriculture, manufactures, mining, mechanic arts, commerce, fisheries, and forests, in the year 1850 were at 28.9 per cent. of the value of the real and personal property of the United States. A similar calculation makes the products of 1860 26.8 per cent. of the wealth of the country in that year, as fixed by the census returns. In the calculation submitted, the annual products of capital and industry are taken, for convenience, at twenty-five per cent. of the capital wealth of the country, and the capital of each decennial year of the thirty that our national debt may run before its extinguishment by the application of $200,000,000 per annum to the payment of its principal and interest, is here estimated upon the basis of its amount and increase as given by the census of 1860. In the year 1860 the real and personal property of the Union was valued (slaves excluded) at $14,183,000,000. Of this amount the States lately in insurrection held $3,467,000,000, being an increase upon the like property in 1850 of 139.7 per cent. The property of the loyal States was valued at $10,716,000,000, an increase of 126.6 per cent. over 1850; together averaging a decennial increase of 129.7 per cent.

Now, taking the increase of wealth in the loyal States in the ten years from 1850 to 1870 at 125 per cent., we have as their capital in 1870, $24,111,000,000; and if we put the wealth of the other States at the same figure as in 1860, without allowing anything for increase, we have a capital, for 1870, of $27,578,000,000. This sum gives us the product of the year at $6,894,500,000, upon which a payment on the debt of $200,000,000 is 2.9 per cent. If we add but 25 per cent. to the wealth of 1860 for the States lately in insurrection as their probable valuation in 1870, the charge of $200,000,000 upon the products of that year will be 2.81 per cent. But allowing all that can be claimed in this respect, and taking the lowest estimate for 1870 as the basis for calculating the wealth and products of the year 1880, 125 per cent. increase in this period gives a capital of $62,050,000,000, and a product of $15,512,000,000, upon which sum a charge of $200,000,000 falls to 1.29 per cent. In 1890, the wealth, estimated at an increase of only 100 per cent. upon that of 1880, gives the year's products at $31,025,000,000, upon which $200,000,000 amounts to only 0.644 per cent., or less than two thirds of one per cent., and in the year 1900, the tax upon the products of the year would fall to 0.322 per cent., or less than one third of one per cent.

To this charge upon the resources of the country, if there be added $140,000,000 in 1870 for all other expenditures, $150,000,000 in 1880, $160,000,000 in 1890, and $170,000,000 in 1900, the estimated total expenditure will be 4.93 per cent. of the products of capital and industry in 1870, 2.26 per cent. in 1880, 1.17 per cent. in 1890, and barely seven tenths of one per cent. in 1900. Or, in general statement, the total estimated charges of the national Government for the payment of the debt in thirty years, and all other ordinary expenses, begin at less than five per cent. of the resources of the country, and end in seven tenths of one per cent.

These estimates, and the basis upon which they rest, are sustained by the result of English experience under a debt one third larger than ours, with ordinary and extraordinary expenses at least one half larger than ours are likely to reach, and borne through a period of much less wealth-producing power. The Government charges for all expenditures fifty years ago took one pound in six of the products of Great Britain, but these charges have now fallen to one pound in nine. We commence our national burdens with resources that, in the very first year, will be required to bear an aggregate of less than five per cent., or one dollar in twenty.

It is true that many circumstances may occur to prevent the accomplishment of these anticipated results; but the estimates have been made upon what are regarded as reliable data, and are well calculated to encourage Congress in levying taxes and the people in paying them.

After careful reflection, the Secretary concludes that no act of Congress (except for raising the necessary revenue) would be more acceptable to the people, or better calculated to strengthen the national credit, than one which should provide that $200,000,000, commencing with the next fiscal year, shall be annually applied to the payment of the interest and principal of the national debt. The estimates for the next fiscal year indicate that a very much larger amount could be so applied without an increase of taxes.

Before concluding his remarks upon the national debt, the Secretary would suggest that the credit of the five-twenty bonds issued under the acts of February 25, 1862, and June 30, 1864, would be improved in Europe, and, consequently, their market value advanced at home, if Congress should declare that the principal, as well as the interest, of these bonds is to be paid in coin. The policy of the Government in regard to its funded debts is well understood in the United States, but the absence of a provision in these acts that the principal of the bonds issued under them should be paid in coin, while such a provision is contained in the act under which the ten-forties were issued, has created some apprehension in Europe that the five-twenty bonds might be called in at the expiration of five years, and paid in United States notes. Although it is not desirable that our securities should be held out of the United States, it is desirable that they should be of good credit in foreign markets on account of the influence which these markets exert upon our own. It is, therefore, important that all misapprehensions on these points should be removed by an explicit declaration of Congress that these bonds are to be paid in coin.

In view of the fact that the exemption of Government securities from State taxation is, by many persons, considered an unjust discrimination in their favor, efforts may be made to induce Congress to legislate upon the subject of their taxation. Of course, the existing exemption from State and municipal taxation of bonds and securities now outstanding will be scrupulously regarded. That exemption is a part of the contract under which the securities have been issued and the money loaned thereon to the Government, and it would not only be unconstitutional, but a breach of the public faith of the nation, to disregard it. It would also, in the judgment of the Secretary, be unwise for Congress to grant to the States the power, which they will not possess unless conferred by express congressional enactment, of imposing local taxes upon securities of the United States which may be hereafter issued. Such taxation, in any form, would result in serious, if not fatal, embarrassment to the Government, and, instead of relieving, would eventually injure the great mass of the people, who are to bear their full proportion of the burden of the public debt. This is a subject in relation to which there should be no difference of opinion. Every taxpayer is personally interested in having the public debt placed at home, and at a low rate of interest, which cannot be done if the public securities are to be subject to local taxation. Taxes vary largely in different States, and in different counties and cities of the same State, and are everywhere so high that, unless protected against them, the bonds into which the present debt must be funded cannot be distributed among the people, except in some favored localities, unless they bear a rate of interest so high as to make the debt severely oppressive, and to render the prospect of its extinguishment well-nigh hopeless. Exempted from local taxation, the debt can, it is expected, be funded at an early day at five per cent.; if local taxation is allowed, no considerable portion of the debt which falls due within the next four years can be funded at home at less than eight per cent. The tax-payers of the United States cannot afford to have their burdens thus increased. It is also evident that the relief which local tax-payers would obtain from Government taxation, as the result of a low rate of interest on the national securities, would, at least, be as great as the increase of local taxes to which they would be subjected on account of the exemption of Government securities; while, if those securities should bear a rate of interest sufficient to secure their sale when subject to local taxes, few, if any of them, would long remain where those taxes could reach them. They would be rapidly transferred to other countries, into the hands of foreign capitalists, and thus at last the burden of paying a high rate of interest would be left upon the people of this country without compensation or alleviation.

The present system of internal revenue is one of the results of the war. It was framed under circumstances of pressing necessity, affording little opportunity for careful and accurate investigation of the sources of revenue. Its success, however, has exceeded the anticipations of its authors, and is a most honorable testimonial to their wisdom, and to the patriotism of the people who have so cheerfully submitted to its burdens.

With the restoration of peace, industry is returning again to its former channels, and a revision of the system now becomes important to accommodate it to the changed and changing condition of the country.

Every complicated system of taxation opens the way to mistakes, abuses, and deceptions. Temptations to dishonesty and fraud are placed before the revenue officers and the tax-payers, and both are often thereby demoralized. Honest men, who pay their taxes in full, are injured, if not ruined, by the ingenuity of those who successfully evade their share of the public burdens.

The multiplicity of objects at present subject to taxation is one of the most serious objections to the present system. Many of these yield little revenue, while its collection is troublesome to the collector, and irritating and offensive to the tax-payers. This multiplicity also involves as many temptations to fraud, and as many difficult questions for decision, as the objects from which large revenue is derived.

To impose taxes judiciously, so as to obtain revenue without repressing industry, is one of the highest and most difficult duties devolved upon Congress. Taxation which in one year may be scarcely felt, may the next year be oppressive; and that which may not be burdensome to those who are well established in business may be fatal to those just commencing. Every branch of industry has its infancy, and ought to be encouraged by liberal legislation. Whatever of industry or enterprise is destroyed, by injudicious taxation or otherwise, is a damage to the national welfare.

Heavy taxation may drive capital from our shores, or prevent its employment in the manner most advantageous to the country, and thus prevent that demand for labor which is the best security for its proper reward.

The taxation which is now extremely productive may in a few years become unproductive, or engender a spirit of opposition and discontent which may endanger the national credit.

It is important, therefore, that our revenue system should be frequently and carefully revised, in order that it may be accommodated to the habits and character of the people, to the industry of the country, to labor and capital, to wages at home and wages abroad. It is also of the highest importance that there should be a careful adjustment of our internal to our external revenue system.

That views somewhat similar to these were entertained by Congress is indicated by the provision in the amendatory act of March 3, 1865, by which the Secretary of the Treasury was authorized to "appoint a commission, consisting of three persons, to inquire and report, at the earliest practicable moment, upon the subject of raising by taxation such revenue as may be necessary in order to supply the wants of the Government, having regard to and including the sources from which such revenue should be drawn, and the best and most efficient mode of raising the same."

This subject received the early attention of the Secretary, and under the authority of the act, after careful deliberation, a commission was organized, consisting of Messrs. David A. Wells, Stephen Colwell, and S. S. Hayes, representing, to a certain extent, different sections and interests, and also different political sentiments. The commission was fully organized in June, and has since then been actively engaged in the prosecution of its labors.

An investigation of the character of the revenue, contemplated by the act authorizing this commission, necessarily involves a careful and comprehensive inquiry into the condition of every industry, trade, or occupation in the country likely to be affected by the national revenue system, and, in the absence of nearly all previously compared and exact data, must necessarily be protracted and laborious. From a preliminary report made to the Secretary by the commission, he has reason to infer that enough has already been accomplished by them to indicate the value of an investigation like that in which they are now engaged, and to demonstrate the necessity of the accumulation of a correct and accurate knowledge, properly digested and presented, as a basis for our future revenue legislation.

The plan pursued by the commission has been, to take up, specifically, those sources of revenue which our own experience, and the experience of other countries, have indicated as likely to be most productive under taxation and most capable of sustaining its burdens. In pursuance of this plan, a large number of witnesses have been examined, and much valuable testimony put upon record.

It is understood to be the opinion of the commissioners that it would be inexpedient at once to make any radical and violent changes in the nature and working of the present revenue system, and that we should rather seek, through experience and study, to perfect the present system by degrees, so as to gradually adapt it to the industrial habits and fiscal capacity of the people. The Secretary is also informed by the commissioners that it seems certain to them that, without any increase in the rate of taxation, but by the enactment of some modifications and amendments of the present law, coupled, possibly, even with some reduction in the rates, an increase of revenue from comparatively few sources to the extent of some fifty or sixty million dollars per annum over and above that now obtained, may be confidently relied on. If this should be the case, an early repeal of a multitude of small taxes which, from the inquisitorial character of their method of collection, have become extremely odious and objectionable, will be advisable.

Although the work of the commission has been thus far mainly directed to the sources likely to be most productive of revenue, the consideration of the subject of the administration of the law has not been omitted by them; and in this department it is believed that some valuable recommendations will be submitted for the consideration of Congress.

As a gratifying feature of their work, the commission report a most cheerful and prompt coöperation on the part of nearly all the representatives of the industrial interests of the country in the procurement of exact information, and a universal expression of ready acquiescence in any demands upon them which the future necessities of the Government may require, united, at the same time, with a request that the Government should, on its part, seek to equalize, so far as practicable, and fairly distribute, the apportionment of its requirements.

In view of the fact that the revision of the whole revenue system has been committed to this commission, the Secretary does not consider it proper for him to present his views upon this important subject in advance of their final report, which, it is hoped, will be made early in the session.

There are some subjects, however, presented in the report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue which require the attention of Congress before the report of the commission is received, and in relation to which there should be early action.

In putting into operation the system of internal revenue in the recently rebellious States, it became necessary for the Secretary to decide whether or not an effort should be made to collect the taxes which accrued prior to the establishment of revenue offices therein. After giving the subject due consideration, the Secretary, in view of the facts that there were no Federal revenue officers to whom payment of taxes could be made, that the people (many of them involuntarily) had been subjected to heavy taxation by the government which was attempted to be established in opposition to that of the United States, and had been greatly exhausted by the ravages of war, issued a circular, under date of the 21st of June, declaring—

"That, without waiving in any degree the right of the Government in respect to taxes which had before that time accrued in the States and Territories in insurrection, or assuming to exonerate the tax-payer from his legal responsibility for such taxes, the Department did not deem it advisable to insist, at present, on their payment, so far as they were payable prior to the establishment of a collection district embracing a territory in which the tax-payer resided."

For substantially the same reasons that induced the Secretary to issue this circular, he deemed it to be his duty to suspend all further sales under the direct tax law. Tax commissioners, however, have been appointed for each State, and collections have been made, as far as it has been practicable to make them without sales of property. Some sales had, however, been previously made in many of the States, and large amounts of property had been purchased for the Government. In South Carolina, a portion of the lands thus purchased have since been sold under the eleventh section of the act of August, 1863.

During the war the laws in regard to stamps have been, of course, in the insurrectionary States, entirely disregarded; and, as a consequence, immense interests are thereby imperiled.

In view, therefore, of the recent and present condition of the southern States, the Secretary recommends—

First. That the collection of internal revenue taxes which accrued before the establishment of revenue offices in the States recently in rebellion be indefinitely postponed.

Second. That the sales of property in those States, under the direct tax law, be suspended until the States shall have an opportunity of assuming (as was done by the loyal States) the payment of the tax assessed upon them.

Third. That all transactions in such States, which may be invalid by the non-use of stamps, be legalized as far as it is in the power of Congress to legalize them.

What action, if any, should be taken for the relief of persons in those States, whose property has been sold under the direct tax law, and is now held by the Government, it will be for Congress to determine. The Secretary is decidedly of the opinion that liberal legislation in regard to the taxes which accrued prior to the suppression of the rebellion will tend to promote harmony between the Government and the people of those States, will ultimately increase the public revenues, and vindicate the humane policy of the Government.

The Secretary is happy in being able to state that the affairs of the Bureau of Internal Revenue are being satisfactorily administered, and the working of the system throughout the country is being gradually improved.

For want of proper accommodations in the Treasury building the bureau has been removed to the large and commodious building on Fifteenth street, which has been secured, for such time as the Government may require its use, at an annual rent of $23,000.

The reciprocity treaty with Great Britain will expire on the 17th of March next, and due notice of this fact has been given, by circulars, to the officers of customs on the northern frontiers.

There are grave doubts whether treaties of this character do not interfere with the legislative power of Congress, and especially with the constitutional power of the House of Representatives to originate revenue bills; and whether such treaties, if they yield anything not granted by our general revenue laws, are not in conflict with the spirit of the usual clause contained in most of our commercial treaties, to treat each nation on the same footing as the most favored nation, and not to grant, without an equivalent, any particular favor to one nation not conceded to another in respect to commerce and navigation.

It appears to be well established that the advantages of this treaty have not been mutual, but have been in favor of the Canadas. Our markets have been strong, extensive, and valuable; theirs have been weak, limited, and generally far less profitable to our citizens. The people of the Canadas and Provinces have been sellers and we buyers of the same productions for which we are often forced to seek a foreign market. It is questionable, in fact, whether any actual reciprocity, embracing many of the articles now in the treaty, can be maintained between the two countries. Even in regard to the fisheries, it is by no means certain that, instead of equivalents having been acquired under the treaty, more than equal advantages were not surrendered by it. But, whatever the facts may be, this subject, as well as that of intercommunication through rivers and lakes, and possibly canals and railroads, are proper subjects of negotiation, and their importance should secure early consideration.

It is certain that, in the arrangement of our complex system of revenue through the tariff and internal duties, the treaty has been the cause of no little embarrassment. The subject of the revenue should not be embarrassed by treaty stipulations, but Congress should be left to act upon it freely and independently. Any arrangement between the United States and the Canadas and Provinces, that may be considered mutually beneficial, can as readily be perfected and carried out by reciprocal legislation as by any other means. No complaint would then arise as to subsequent changes of laws, for each party would be free to act at all times according to its discretion.

However desirable stability may be, an irrepealable revenue law, even in ordinary times, is open to grave objections, and in any extraordinary crisis is likely to be pernicious. The people of the United States cannot consent to be taxed as producers while those outside of our boundaries, exempt from our burdens, shall be permitted, as competitors, to have free access to our markets. It is desirable to diminish the temptations now existing for smuggling, and if the course suggested, of mutual legislation, should be adopted, a revenue system, both internal and external, more in harmony with our own, might justly be anticipated from the action of our neighbors, by which this result would be most likely to be obtained.

The attention of Congress is again called to the importance of early and definite action upon the subject of our mineral lands, in which subject are involved questions not only of revenue, but social questions of a most interesting character.

Copartnership relations between the Government and miners will hardly be proposed, and a system of leasehold, (if it were within the constitutional authority of Congress to adopt it, and if it were consistent with the character and genius of our people,) after the lessons which have been taught of its practical results in the lead and copper districts, cannot, of course, be recommended.

After giving the subject as much examination as the constant pressure of official duties would permit, the Secretary has come to the conclusion that the best policy to be pursued with regard to these lands is the one which shall substitute an absolute title in fee for the indefinite possessory rights or claims now asserted by miners.

The right to obtain a "fee simple in the soil" would invite to the mineral districts men of character and enterprise; by creating homes, (which will not be found where title to property cannot be secured,) it would give permanency to the settlements, and, by the stimulus which ownership always produces, it would result in a thorough and regular development of the mines.

A bill for the subdivision and sale of the gold and silver lands of the United States was under consideration by the last Congress, to which attention is respectfully called. If the enactment of this bill should not be deemed expedient, and no satisfactory substitute can be reported for the sale of these lands to the highest bidder, on account of the possessory claims of miners, it will then be important that the policy of extending the principle of preemption to the mineral districts be considered. It is not material, perhaps, how the end shall be attained, but there can be no question that it is of the highest importance, in a financial and social point of view, that ownership of these lands, in limited quantities to each purchaser, should be within the reach of the people of the United States who may desire to explore and develop them.

In this connection, it may be advisable for Congress to consider whether the prosperity of the treasure-producing districts would not be increased, and the convenience of miners greatly promoted, by the establishment of an assay office in every mining district from which an annual production of gold and silver amounting to $10,000,000 is actually obtained.

The attempts at smuggling, stimulated by the high rates of duties on imports, have engaged the attention of the Department, and such arrangements have been made for its detection and prevention as seemed to be required by the circumstances, and available for that purpose.

It is quite apparent, however, that, with our extensive sea-coasts and inland frontier, it is impracticable entirely to prevent illicit traffic, though checks at the most exposed points have, doubtless, been put to such practices.

In this connection, it may be remarked, that the revenue cutters are diligently and usefully employed in the preventive service, within cruising limits so defined as to leave no point of sea and Gulf coasts unvisited by an adequate force.

A similar arrangement will be extended to the lakes on the reopening of navigation, the cutters built for that destination not having been completed in time to be put in commission before its close.

The cutters are an important auxiliary to the regular customs authorities, in the collection and protection of the public revenue, by the examination of incoming vessels and their manifests of cargo; affording succor to vessels in distress; aiding in the enforcement of the regulations of harbor police, and otherwise preventing or detecting violations or evasions of law. A service of this description is unquestionably useful, if not indispensable, to the administration of the revenue system of a maritime and commercial country with such extensive sea, lake, and Gulf coasts as our own.

There are now in the service 27 steamers and 9 sailing vessels. Of the steamers, 7 are of the average tonnage of 850 tons, and draw nine feet of water. These large vessels were constructed during the progress of the late rebellion, and were designed for the combined purpose of a naval force and a revenue coast-guard. Their heavy armaments, large tonnage, and crews, however well fitted for such purposes, are not adapted for the revenue service in a time of peace. In consequence of their great draft of water, they must be used mainly as sea-going vessels, and are incapable of navigating the shallow waters of the coasts, and their tributaries, which afford the most favorable opportunities for contraband trade. Independently of these considerations, they are so constructed as to be unable to carry a supply of fuel for more than three, or possibly four days at the farthest.

It is recommended, therefore, that this Department be vested with authority to sell the vessels of this description, and expend the proceeds in the purchase of others of a different character and lighter draft, and, on that account, better fitted to accomplish the purposes of a preventive service, and which can be kept in commission at a cost more than one third less than those of the former class.

For example, the difference in the cost of running for twelve months the Mahoning, one of the first-named class, and the Nansemond, one of the latter class, is $27,606. The Mahoning, with twelve tons of coal per diem, can make but eight knots per hour; while the Nansemond, with eight tons of coal per diem, will make twelve knots per hour. The Nansemond, drawing but six feet nine inches, is enabled to cruise in waters entirely inaccessible to the Mahoning.

To render the service effective and economical, cutters should be of light draft, manned by a small crew, and able to navigate the shoal waters and penetrate the inland bays, rivers, and creeks, with which our sea, lake, and Gulf coasts abound, but of sufficient tonnage to enable them to perform efficiently and safely the duties of a coast-guard at sea, and to furnish succor to vessels in distress; and at the same time to navigate the interior waters for the prevention of smuggling, and reach readily a port of refuge in the tempestuous weather prevailing at times along our coast, should they be forced to do so.

The working of the marine hospital system, as at present constituted, is not altogether satisfactory. The erection and repair of numerous expensive buildings, and the support of the establishments necessarily connected with their operations, have entailed upon the Government a yearly expense far beyond the amount contributed by the seamen, which has been met by large annual appropriations by Congress.

The act of July 16, 1798, by which the system was created, and the rate of contribution fixed at twenty cents per month, confined the action of the Government to the simple expenditure, for the benefit of the seamen, of the amounts thus contributed by themselves, and contemplated laying no burden on the public Treasury. If it is deemed advisable to continue any system of relief, under control of the Government, it is respectfully suggested that the original intent of the law should be carried into effect, and the fund made self-sustaining. With this view, it will be necessary to increase the fund, and to make a material reduction in the expenses.

Experience has shown, and former Secretaries have at various times and with entire unanimity represented to Congress, that the system of public marine hospitals, maintained and managed by the Government, is the least economical method that has been devised for the administration of this fund, and affords the least comparative benefit to the seamen. The expenses of these establishments are large, independently of the number of seamen received in them. When the patients are numerous, the average rate of expense per man is not unreasonable; but where they are few, as at most of the public institutions, the expense per capita is very largely in excess of the cost of maintaining them under contract at private, State, or municipal institutions, where they would be better accommodated, at an expense exactly proportioned to the services rendered.

Mention may be made, in illustration, of one of these public hospitals, which is maintained at an annual expense of upward of $4,000, and which accommodates an average of less than a single patient, at a daily cost per capita of more than $14 50; while quite as satisfactory relief can be had under contract for about $1 per day.

There are, moreover, several hospital buildings, erected at great cost, now lying idle, out of repair, and not available for their intended use. Some of these have never been occupied, and one, at least, is situated at a point remote from any port, and where relief is never demanded. Others now occupied are in a condition requiring large and immediate outlay to preserve them.

In view of these facts, it is strongly recommended that authority be conferred by law upon this Department to sell such hospitals as experience has shown are not needed, retaining only those situated at important ports where, by the course of commerce, demands for relief are likely to be most frequent and pressing, and where contracts on favorable terms cannot be procured with private or municipal institutions. The proceeds should either be returned into the Treasury in repayment of their cost, or invested for the benefit of the hospital fund.

In favor of the contract system it may be remarked, that it is in operation, most successfully, at New York, where demands for relief are far the heaviest; at Baltimore, Philadelphia, St. Louis, Louisville, and Cincinnati; and it is believed that quite as advantageous and satisfactory arrangements might be made at other ports where Government hospitals are now located. Even at ports where it may be deemed best to retain the ownership of the hospital buildings, it might be advisable to lease them to private or municipal hospitals, which would gladly receive the seamen on favorable terms. Such an arrangement was formerly in force at Charleston, South Carolina; much to the advantage of the patients and the fund.

Should these suggestions be adopted, and, at the same time, the rate of contribution fixed at thirty cents a month, instead of twenty as at present, the proceeds of the tax, thoroughly collected and economically administered, would be ample to meet every demand which a judicious discrimination in affording relief would make upon them; and the seamen would receive far more substantial and efficient benefit than under the present system.

As to the increased rate of contribution it may be said that the existing rate has stood unchanged, through all the fluctuations of prices and wages, since 1798; that it is quite disproportioned to the benefit derived by the seamen from the marine hospital system; and that persons of this class arc, as a general thing, otherwise free from Federal legislation. In this view, there can be no hardship or injustice in making the moderate increase suggested.

By the report of the Comptroller of the Currency, it appears that sixteen hundred and one banks had been, on the 31st of October last, organized under the national banking act. Of these, six hundred and seventy-nine were original organizations, and nine hundred and twenty-two conversions from State institutions.

The Comptroller recommends several amendments to the acts, which will arrest the attention of Congress.

The recommendation that the banks shall be compelled to redeem their notes at one of the three cities named is heartily indorsed. At some future day it may be advisable that redemptions shall be authorized at western and southern cities; but as long as exchange continues to be in favor of the sea-board, it is not expedient to permit banks to redeem at interior points. There are very few country banks or banks in the interior cities that do not keep their chief balances in either Boston, New York, or Philadelphia, there being a regular demand for exchange on these cities. Where the current of trade requires the bank to keep accounts for their own accommodation and that of their customers and the public, there should their redemptions be made. Notes that are par in either of these cities will very rarely be at a discount in any part of the United States, and will be as nearly of uniform value as is, perhaps, ever to be expected in a paper currency.

The Secretary is hopeful that the time is not far distant when redemptions will be something more than nominal. Experience and observation have taught him that frequent redemptions are essential to the solvency of banks of circulation. Nothing so well teaches a bank the necessity of keeping its loans in the hands of prompt customers, and its means under its own control, as the certainty of being frequently called upon to meet its own obligations. It is quite important that inexperienced bankers, under the national banking system, should learn that their notes are not money, but promises to pay it; and the sooner and the more effectively this lesson is impressed upon them, the better it will be for their stockholders and the system.

The national banking system was designed not only to furnish the people with a sound circulation, but one of uniform value; and this is not likely to be fully accomplished until the banks, by compulsion or their own voluntary act, keep their notes at par in the principal money markets of the country.

The establishment of the national banking system is one of the great compensations of the war; one of the great achievements of this remarkable period. In about two years and a half from the organization of the first national bank, the whole system of banking under State laws has been superseded, and the people of the United States have been furnished with a circulation bearing upon it the seal of the Treasury Department as a guarantee of its solvency. It only remains that this circulation shall be a redeemable circulation—redeemable not only at the counters of the banks, but at the commercial cities—to make the national banking system of almost inconceivable benefit to the country.

The present law limits the circulation of the national banks to $300,000,000; and it is not probable, when the business of the country returns to a healthy basis, that a larger paper circulation than this will be required. Indeed, it is doubtful whether a larger bank-note circulation can be maintained on a specie basis. Should an increase, however, be necessary, it can be provided for hereafter. It is, perhaps, unfortunate that a greater restriction had not been placed upon the circulation of the large banks already organized, in view of the wants of the southern States. It is quite likely, however, that the anticipated withdrawal of a portion of the United States notes (not to speak of the effect of the restoration of specie payments) will so reduce the circulation of the northern banks as to afford to the South, under the present limitation of the law, all the paper currency which will be required in that quarter.

The act of March 3, 1865, authorized the Secretary to borrow any sums not exceeding $600,000,000, and to issue therefor bonds or Treasury notes of the United States in such form as he might prescribe.

Under this act there was issued during the month of March $70,000,000 of notes payable three years after date, and bearing an interest payable semi-annually in currency at the rate of seven and three tenths per cent. per annum, and convertible at maturity, at the pleasure of the holders, into five-twenty gold-bearing bonds.

Upon the capture of Richmond and the surrender of the confederate armies, it became apparent that there would be an early disbanding of the forces of the United States, consequently heavy requisitions from the War Department for transportation and payment of the Army, including bounties. As it was important that these requisitions should be promptly met, and especially important that not a soldier should remain in the service a single day for want of means to pay him, the Secretary perceived the necessity of realizing as speedily as possible the amount—$580,000,000—still authorized to be borrowed under this act. The seven and three-tenths notes had proved to be a popular loan, and although a security on longer time and lower interest would have been more advantageous to the Government, the Secretary considered it advisable, under the circumstances, to continue to offer these notes to the public, and to avail himself, as his immediate predecessor had done, of the service of Jay Cooke, Esq., in the sale of them. The result was in the highest degree satisfactory. By the admirable skill and energy of the agent, and the hearty coöperation of the national banks, these notes were distributed in every part of the northern, and some parts of the southern States, and placed within the reach of every person desiring to invest in them. No loan ever offered in the United States, notwithstanding the large amount of Government securities previously taken by the people, was so promptly subscribed for as this. Before the 1st of August the entire amount of $580,000,000 had been taken, and the Secretary had the unexpected satisfaction of being able, with the receipts from customs and internal revenue and a small increase of the temporary loan, to meet all the requisitions upon the Treasury.

On $230,000,000 of these notes the Government has the option of paying the interest at the rate of six per cent., in coin, instead of seven and three tenths in currency. The Secretary thought it advisable to reserve this option, because he indulged the hope that before their maturity specie payments would be restored, and because six per cent. in coin is as high a rate of interest as the Government should pay on any of its obligations.

The receipts of coin have been, for some months past, so large that there have been constant accumulations beyond what has been required for the payment of the interest on the public debt. The Secretary has, therefore, deemed it to be his duty to sell, from time to time, a portion of the surplus for the purpose of supplying the wants of importers, and furnishing the means for meeting the demands upon the Treasury for currency. The sales have been conducted by the Assistant Treasurer in New York, in a manner entirely satisfactory to the Department, and, it is believed, to the public. The sales, up to the 1st of November, amounted to $27,993,216 11, and the premium to $12,310,459 76, thus placing in the Treasury, for current use, the sum of $40,303,675 87, without which there would have been a necessity for the further issue of interest-bearing notes.

The necessities of the Treasury have been such that a compliance with the requirements of the act of February 25, 1862, for the creation of a sinking fund has been impracticable. As long as it is necessary for the Government to borrow money, and to put its obligations upon the market for sale, the purchase of these obligations for the purpose of creating a sinking fund would hardly be judicious. After the expiration of the present year, the income of the Government will exceed its expenses; and it will then be practicable to carry into effect the provisions of the law. The Secretary is, however, of the opinion that the safe and simple way of sinking the national debt is to apply directly to its payment the excess of receipts over expenditures. He therefore respectfully recommends that so much of the act of February 25, 1862, as requires the application of coin to the purchase or payment of one per cent. of the entire debt of the United States, to be set apart as a sinking fund, be repealed.

By virtue of the authority conferred by the fifth section of the act of March 3, 1863, the Treasurer of the United States and the Assistant Treasurer in New York, have been instructed to receive deposits of coin and bullion, and to issue certificates therefor in denominations of not less than $20.

Instructions were given for the issue of these certificates to promote the convenience of officers of customs, and of the Treasurer and Assistant Treasurers, and for the accommodation of the public. Other considerations also prompted the Secretary to avail himself of the authority referred to. It is expected that the credit of the Government will be strengthened by the coin which will be thus brought into the Treasury, and that the effect of the measure will be to facilitate to some extent a return to specie payments. If the experiment should be satisfactory in New York, it will be extended to other commercial cities.

For a full explanation of the condition of the mints and their operations during the past year, attention is requested to the report of the Director of the Mint at Philadelphia.

The total value of bullion deposited at the Mint and branches during the last fiscal year was $32,248,754 97; of which $31,065,349 74 was in gold, and $1,183,405 23 in silver. Deducting the redeposits, there remain the actual deposits, amounting to $27,982,849 00.

The coinage for the year was, in gold coin, $25,107,217 50; gold bars, $5,578,482 45; silver coin, $636,308; silver bars, $318,910 69; cents, including the two and three cent pieces, $1,183,330; total coinage, $32,819,248 64.

Of the bullion deposited, $5,570,371 27 was received at the assay office in New York. Of the gold bars, $4,947,809 21, and of silver bars, $165,003 45 in value, were stamped at the same office.

At the branch mint in San Francisco the gold deposits were $18,808,318 49, and the silver deposits and purchases $540,299 20 in value. The value of the gold coined was $18,670,840; of silver coined $320,800; and of silver bars $145,235 58. Total coinage $19,144,875 58.

At the branch mint in Denver the total deposits were $548,609 85, of which $541,559 04 was in gold, and $7,050 81 was in silver.

The survey of the coast, which is under the administrative direction of this Department, has been for the past year prosecuted with vigor. Under special assignments most of the field assistants have coöperated with the naval and military forces of the Government, and in that way important service was rendered quite up to the close of the war. Since the termination of hostilities the regular operations of the survey have been pushed forward as rapidly as the available means would permit.

The national importance of this work was clearly evinced during the war, and now seems to be generally appreciated. It is therefore recommended that the necessary appropriations be made for the efficient continuance of the work.

The attention of Congress is called to the report of the Solicitor of the Treasury, which exhibits the satisfactory results of the litigation under his supervision; and also the condition of the measures adopted by him and the officers of the customs for the suppression of frauds upon the revenue.

Attention is also specially called to so much of his report as relates to the administration of the fund appropriated to defray the expenses of detecting and bringing to punishment counterfeiters of the securities and coin of the United States. The measures which have been adopted have been attended with important results, and such as to indicate the wisdom of Congress in creating the fund, and the expediency of continuing appropriations. The Solicitor has been requested to cause a thorough revision of the laws relating to counterfeiting to be made, and a bill to be prepared for the consideration of Congress, with a view to remedying defects in existing statutes.

Operations, under the several acts of Congress concerning commercial intercourse with the States declared to be in insurrection, the execution of which was confided to this Department, have been nearly brought to a close, partly by the restoration of peace and partly by executive proclamations. The provisions of those acts were carried out, as far as it was possible in the disturbed condition of the country, under the rules and regulations adopted by the Department, with the approval of the Executive, not only without cost to the Government, but in such manner as to add considerably to its revenues.

The regulations adopted in conformity with the requirements of the second section of the act of July 2, 1864, relative to abandoned lands, houses, and tenements, and freedmen, were, at the request of the military authorities, and from considerations of public policy, suspended by orders of August 11, 1864. Since then, from time to time, as it was ready to assume the charge of them, the duties appertaining to these subjects have been transferred to the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands, according to the provisions of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1865.

By executive orders, all operations under sections eight and nine of the act approved July 2, 1864, authorizing the purchase, by agents of this Department, of the products of the insurrectionary districts, were closed, on the east of the Mississippi river on the 13th of June last, and west of it on the 24th of the same month. The accounts of the different purchasing agents have not been settled, but it is thought that the net profits of the Government, by these purchases, will amount to $1,500,000.

Since the suspension of purchases by the Government the duties of the agents of this Department have been confined to securing the property (chiefly cotton) captured by our military forces in pursuance of the acts of March 12, 1862, and July 2, 1864, relative to captured and abandoned property. Up to the 31st of March last, there had been received at New York, Cincinnati, and St. Louis, the places designated for sales—including 38,319 bales obtained at Savannah, 4,151 bales at Charleston, and 2,331 at Mobile—about 30,000 bales.

The general rule under which agents have been acting since the surrender of the forces which had been waging war against the Government of the United States, is to collect and forward, as captured property, all cotton described upon the books and lists of the pretended confederate government, or which there was sufficient reason to believe was owned or controlled by it, and that which belonged to companies formed for the purpose of running the blockade, in support of, if not in direct cooperation with, the league which had been formed to overthrow the Government of the United States, leaving individual claimants of the property to their recourse before the Court of Claims, as provided by the third section of the act approved March 12, 1863. In the performance of their duties, the agents have had great difficulties to encounter, from the unwillingness of the planters to surrender the captured property in their possession, from extensive depredations upon it after it was collected, and from powerful combinations formed to prevent, under various pretexts, the property fairly captured from coming into the possession of the United States. In spite of all these obstacles, however, it is estimated, from the accounts already received, and from data furnished by the agents, that there will be secured to the Government not less than 125,000 bales of cotton, including the 80,000 bales already referred to. What part of the proceeds of this property will ultimately be retained by the Government will depend upon the success of the claimants before Congress and the courts. In collecting this cotton, there have been doubtless some instances of injustice to individuals, who may be entitled to the consideration of the Government; but the Secretary believes that the cotton which has been taken by the agents was rightfully seized, and that no equitable claims for the return of any considerable portion of it or the proceeds thereof can be presented.

It may be proper to add, in this connection, that many and grave charges of corruption and improper practices have been made against agents employed in this branch of the public service. These charges, however, have been mostly vague in their character, and after such investigation as the Secretary has been able to make, he has concluded that they have been generally instigated by malice or disappointed cupidity, and usually without substantial foundation.

A copy of the several rules and regulations alluded to, which have been put in force since the last session of Congress, is appended hereto as a part of this report.

The various public buildings under the control and management of the Treasury Department are in a favorable condition; and it is to be hoped that only limited appropriations will be necessary for the coming year. On account of the difficulty of providing accommodations for the State Department, it has not been deemed advisable to proceed with the construction of the north wing of the Treasury building during the present year. The granite for the extension has, however, been contracted for and is being prepared, so that during the next season the work can be vigorously prosecuted. The grounds between the Treasury Department and the Executive Mansion are being graded and arranged with as great a regard to convenience and beauty as is practicable, considering the unfavorable location of the edifice, and it cannot be doubted that the Treasury building, when fully completed, will compare favorably, in the simplicity, solidity, and beauty of its architectural appearance and proportions, with any structure in this country or in Europe.

The southern custom-houses are reported to be in a damaged and dilapidated condition, and an officer of the Department has been sent to inspect them, and report what expenditures are necessary to fit them for the transaction of the public business. The appropriations which will be necessary for the purpose of making the repairs needed will be duly indicated.

By the terms of the lease of the premises occupied as a custom-house in New York, the Government had the right, by giving three months' previous notice, to purchase the same at the expiration of the lease for $1,000,000. As the property was regarded as being worth a much larger amount, and was needed for custom-house purposes, it was thought advisable that the Government should avail itself of the right to purchase. The property was therefore purchased for the sum named, and conveyed by proper deed to the United States.

The attention of Congress is earnestly called to the necessity of providing for the more adequate compensation of some of the officers connected with the Treasury Department. The salaries of those who are required to furnish bonds with heavy penalties, and who are custodians of large amounts of money, and of others occupying very important positions, are altogether inadequate to the responsibilities which they incur and the services which they render.

For example, the Treasurer, who received and disbursed last year about $4,000,000,000, is paid a salary of $5,000 per annum. The Assistant Treasurer in New York, who has in his custody from $20,000,000 to $40,000,000 in coin, and frequently as large an amount in currency, receiving and paying out in the course of the year more than $2,000,000,000, receives $6,000. The Assistant Treasurer in San Francisco receives $4,500 in currency, which is an entirely inadequate salary in that State for an officer of character and ability, holding a position of so great responsibility. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, holding an office which requires in its administration as much executive ability, and as high an order of talent, as any connected with the Treasury Department, receives only $4,000; the Deputy Commissioner $2,500. The custody of the vast amounts of Government securities printed and issued from the Treasury Department is imposed upon the chief of the first division of the Currency Bureau, who receives an annual compensation of only $3,000. The Comptrollers of the Treasury, whose functions are of supreme importance in the safe transaction of the business of the Department, receive salaries which are no just compensation for that business ability and those legal attainments which are indispensable in the places they occupy. Many other officers might also be named whose compensation is entirely inadequate to their talent and services.

The Secretary is aware of the necessity of economy in the expenditure of the public moneys at the present time, but the Government, in order to secure the services of competent and faithful officers, must pay salaries equal to those which are paid by private corporations and individuals; and if such salaries are not paid, the result will inevitably be highly injurious to the public service, because incompetent, unfaithful, and irresponsible men will be allowed to fill offices requiring the highest capacity and most reliable integrity.

The duties devolved upon the officers named are too important to be intrusted to persons less able and reliable than those who now hold them; and it is very questionable if the services of such men can be retained without an increase of compensation. Expensive as living is in Washington and the other cities named at present, and is likely to be for some time to come, there is scarcely one of these officers who can support his family in a manner corresponding to his position, or even comfortably, on the salary which he receives.

It is not asked that there shall be an indiscriminate raising of salaries, but that provision be made for the payment of such salaries as may be necessary to secure the permanent services of the right men in the most important positions in this Department. Unless this shall be done, the Department will labor under serious embarrassment in the transaction of its vast business during the coming year.

In this connection the Secretary desires to advert to the disposition that has been made, by the appropriation of the last Congress, of the $250,000 for compensation to temporary clerks and additional compensation to those permanently employed. Congress having declined to make any general and indiscriminate increase of the salaries of clerks, it was inferred that it was intended that such portion of the appropriation in question as might not be required to pay salaries of temporary clerks, should be used carefully in increasing the compensation of those who were performing difficult and important duties, and whose services could not be dispensed with without injury to the Government. Upon making the examination necessary to a proper decision as to the use to be made of the fund, it was ascertained that there was no lack of clerks in the lower grades, but that there was a scarcity of those of the higher grades competent to perform important and responsible duties. It appeared that many clerks receiving the highest salary allowed by law, had resigned because they could obtain greater compensation elsewhere. The Treasurer's office had suffered largely in this manner, many of his most valuable clerks having left, to accept situations in banks and commercial establishments where they could obtain permanent employment and higher pay. There were indications, also, that many others would do the same unless additional compensation should be made to them.

Under these circumstances it was decided to use a part of the fund in slightly increasing the salaries of clerks of this description until the intention of Congress in relation to its disposition should be more clearly indicated. The amount of the fund already expended in this way is about $25,000. If the disposition which has been thus made of it is not in accordance with the intention of Congress, it is, of course, competent for them to provide a different expenditure of it. The Secretary, however, deems it to be his duty to say that the interests of the service imperatively require that the salaries of clerks who are acting as heads of divisions, or are employed in duties requiring in their performance a high order of ability, as well as the salaries of the officers referred to, should be considerably increased. It would doubtless be a true economy to diminish the number of clerks, and to increase the compensation of those who may be retained.

For information in regard to the condition and operations of the various bureaus of this Department, reference is made to the accompanying reports of the proper officers, all of whom, with the Assistant Secretaries, merit the thanks of the country for the efficient manner in which they are discharging their onerous and responsible duties.

HUGH McCULLOCH,

Secretary of the Treasury.

HON. SCHUYLER COLFAX,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Report of the Postmaster General.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,

November 15, 1865.

SIR: The revenues of this Department for the year ended June 30, 1865, were $14,556,158 70, and the expenditures $13,694,728 28, leaving a surplus of $861,430 42.

The ratio of increase of revenue was seven-tenths per cent., and of the expenditure eight per cent., compared with previous year.

The portion of the revenues accumulated in depository and draft offices, under the supervision of the Finance office of this Department, was $7,136,024 46; collected by the Auditor, $2,329,855 08; and retained by postmasters for salaries and office expenses, $5,090,279 16.

The estimated expenditures for the year ending June 30, 1867, are.....	$18,678,000
The revenue estimated at 10 per cent. increase over last year.....	$16,011,773
Add amount equal to 50 per cent. of the receipts of 1860 from States lately in rebellion.....	758,770
Appropriation for free matter.....	700,000

Leaving a deficiency of..... $1,207,457

For this deficiency no special appropriation will be required, as the standing appropriations for the last three years, under acts of March 3, 1847, and March 3, 1851, amounting to $2,100,000, are unexpended. It will be necessary, however, to make special appropriations from the Treasury—

For steamship service between San Francisco, Japan, and China, for six months, from January 1 to June 30, 1867.....$250,000

Also for steamship service between the United States and Brazil for eight months of the current year, commencing November 1..... 100,000
And the whole of next year..... 150,000

The number of postage stamps issued during the year was 387,419,455, representing.....$12,099,787 50
Stamped envelopes, 25,040,425, representing..... 724,135 00
Stamped wrappers, 1,165,750, representing..... 23,315 00

Making in all.....$12,847,437 50

An increase of $1,873,108 over the previous year. The amount sold was $12,899,727 85, being $1,623,138 27 more than the previous year.

The introduction of stamped envelopes bearing a request for the return to the writers of unclaimed letters has considerably increased the sale of envelopes, and is believed to have diminished the returns to the dead letter office.

Business cards are printed on envelopes without additional cost when ordered in quantities not less than one thousand for the same parties.

To encourage the purchase of request envelopes, the law should be changed so as to allow the return of such letters to the writers free of postage.

As stamped envelopes are canceled by use, and therefore safer against fraud than those with stamps attached, it is submitted whether the Postmaster General should not be authorized in his discretion to furnish them, as the separate stamps are now, without reference to the cost of manufacture.

New stamps have been adopted of the denominations of 5, 10, and 25 cents, for prepaying postage on packages of newspapers forwarded by publishers or news-dealers under the authority of law, whereby a revenue will be secured hitherto lost to the Department.

Under the act for the relief of postmasters who have been robbed by bodies of armed men, seventy-seven cases have been decided, and allowances made to the amount of $4,207 75.

Appended hereto is a tabular statement, exhibiting the annual receipts and expenditures of this Department from January 1, 1831, to June 30, 1865. The results are as follows:

Aggregate receipts.....$200,311,894 47
Aggregate expenditures..... 244,748,881 59

Deficit.....$44,436,987 12

Averaging as follows: receipts, $5,806, 141 87 per annum; expenditures, $7,094,170 48 per annum; deficit, $1,288,028 61 per annum.

CONTRACTS.

The mail service in operation on 30th June, 1865, embraced 6,012 routes, of the aggregate length of 142,340 miles, costing $6,246,884, (exclusive of compensation to route and other agents, amounting to $556,602 75.)

Railroad, 23,401 miles, costing.....$2,707,421
Steamboat, 13,088 miles, costing..... 359,598
Celerity, &c., 105,851 miles, costing..... 3,179,865

The aggregate miles of transportation were 57,993,494.

Railroad.....24,097,568
Steamboat..... 2,444,696
Celerity, &c..... 31,461,430

The cost, per mile, for transportation by railroad was 11½ cents; steamboat, 14½ cents; celerity, &c., 10 cents.

The increased length of routes was 3,163 miles; of transportation, 1,678,137 miles; and of cost, $423,415. For other details of the contract service see appendix.

Until September 15, 1864, the service on the Lincoln and Portland route was performed by the California Stage Company, at the rate of $90,000 per annum. Under proposals for continuing the service until 1866 and 1868 the only bidder was the same company, at $250,000 per annum, which, being regarded as excessive, was accepted only to June 30, 1865, for the purpose of again inviting competition. This was done by advertisement, dated October 12, 1864, under which the California Stage Company was again the only bidder, at $300,000 per annum, which was declined. The service was, however, offered to the contractor for another year at the compensation of $200,000 per annum, which was refused. Arrangements were then made with responsible parties to convey the mail at $225,000 per annum to June 30, 1866; after which it is hoped the service will be performed at more reasonable rates.

The overland mail service from the Missouri river to California is performed under two contracts, one from Atchison to Salt Lake City, and the other from the latter place to Folsom City. On the western division the service has been performed with reasonable regularity, while on the eastern portion it has been more or less irregular, owing, as alleged by the contractors, to high water, bad roads, and hostilities of the Indians, disappointing the expectations of the Department as to the value of the service.

Railway post offices have been established on several leading railroads, and arrangements are in progress for their introduction on other lines. The result, so far, encourages the hope that the system, by accelerating the transmission of correspondence, and lessening the number of distributing offices, will be of permanent advantage to the postal interests of the country.

The work of preparing post-route maps, under the appropriation of the last Congress, is progressing favorably.

The net amount of fines imposed on contractors, and deductions made from their pay during the year, was $56,443 37.

The number, description, and cost of mail bags, mail locks, and keys purchased, appear in a tabular statement annexed. The increased expenditure for bags, compared with previous years, was owing to the wants of the Army and the increase of free and printed matter.

The number of routes ordered into operation in States lately in rebellion is 241; their length 18,640 miles; and compensation $721,940; a reduction, compared with former cost of service in these States, of $881,109 per annum. This, however, results in part from the reduced service, which, if increased to the standard of frequency previous to the war, on the present rates of pay, the cost would be—

For railroad service $550,053, instead of $989,365 per annum.

For "star" service $266,848, instead of $320,025 per annum.

For steamboat service, which having been increased, estimated at former number of trips, is $63,501, instead of $293,668 per annum, making the aggregate pay pro rata for all the service $880,402, instead of $1,603,058 per annum; showing an aggregate decrease pro rata of $722,056 per annum.

Proposals have been invited by advertisement for carrying mails in Virginia, West Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Florida, from January 1, 1866, to June 30, 1867.

Number of routes advertised..... 852
Number for which proposals were received..... 517
Number for which no proposals were received..... 335
Number of proposals accepted 232, at an aggregate of..... $102,714

Number of offers made by Department 235, at an aggregate of..... 123,250

Number of proposals suspended 50, being those of certain railroads and routes of doubtful utility.

Advertisements have been issued for carrying mails in Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, Arkansas, Louisiana, and Texas, from July 1, 1866, to June 30, 1867.

Details explanatory of this branch of the service will be found in the appendix.

FOREIGN MAIL SERVICE.

The general results of the foreign service are as follows:

The aggregate postages, sea, inland, and foreign, upon the correspondence exchanged with foreign countries, amounted to $1,819,928 56; of which amount $1,449,530 76 accrued on the mails exchanged with Great Britain, France, Prussia, Bremen, Hamburg, and Belgium; $275,197 06 on the mails exchanged with the British North American Provinces; and $95,200 74 on the mails transmitted to and from the West Indies, Central and South America.

The amounts of United States postage, sea and inland, were:

On the correspondence exchanged with Great Britain and the continent of Europe.....$570,156 81
The British North American Provinces..... 162,485 28
And on West Indies, Central and South American mails..... 95,200 74

The cost of the United States transatlantic service performed by steamships receiving the sea postage only was $406,479 56. Of this amount $213,330 23 was earned by the New York, Queenstown, and Liverpool (Dale) line; $71,106 70 by the Canadian line; $78,273 11 by the New York, Southampton, and Bremen; and $47,769 52 by the New York, Southampton, and Hamburg lines, respectively.

The cost of the ocean transportation of mails to and from West India ports by United States steamers, receiving different rates of compensation within the limit of the postages, was $50,863 90, being $22,178 95 less than the total postages on the mails conveyed. And $14,691 62 was paid for the sea and isthmus conveyance of the correspondence with Central and South America.

The excess of collections in this country over the postages collected abroad, upon the correspondence exchanged with Great Britain and the continent of Europe, was $411,582 32, causing balances against this Department, on settlements of the quarterly accounts with the respective post departments, amounting to $232,439 55.

Full particulars of the foreign service are stated in the appendix.

No progress has been made in the negotiations of postal conventions with European countries on the basis of the resolutions adopted at the Paris international postal conference, and referred to in the last report.

A convention with Venezuela, which adopts the principal recommendations of the Paris conference, and dispenses with postage accounts between the respective Departments, has been agreed upon, and executed on the part of the United States, and only awaits execution on the part of Venezuela.

The details of a convention with the United States of Colombia have been agreed upon, which, it is expected, will be concluded at an early day.

Additional articles to the United States and British postal convention have been executed, constituting Baltimore a new office of exchange on the side of the United States. A copy of these articles is annexed.

The service to Brazil, authorized by act of May 28, 1864, has been put into operation, the first steamship of the line having left New York with mails for Brazil on the 30th of October last.

The contract for the mail steamship service to Japan and China was awarded, on the 28th of August last, to the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, whose bid for the required service at the sum of $500,000 for twelve round trips per annum, between San Francisco and Hong Kong, touching, on the outward and homeward passages, to land and receive mails, at the port of Honolulu, in the Sandwich Islands, and the port of Kanagawa, in Japan, was the only one received under the advertisement of this Department inviting proposals for the service. The company are to build four first-class sea-going steamships, of from three thousand five hundred to four thousand tons burden each, Government measurement, and commence the service on or before the 1st of January, 1867.

By existing law no provision is made for compensating sailing vessels conveying the mails to foreign ports. It is recommended that authority be given to the Postmaster General to allow such vessels so employed compensation not to exceed the sea postage.

Prior to June 1, 1857, three lines of American steamships were employed in transporting the mails to and from Europe, receiving subsidies under special acts of Congress amounting to $1,208,000 per annum. The New York and Liverpool (Collins) line received an annual subsidy of $858,000 for twenty-six round trips, the New York, Southampton, and Bremen line $200,000, and the New York, Cowes, and Havre line $150,000, for twelve round trips each per annum.

The contracts with the Bremen and Havre lines expired on the 1st of June, 1857, and were not renewed; but temporary contracts were made with the proprietors to continue the service on both routes for the United States postages on the mails conveyed, thus inaugurating a system of self-sustaining ocean mail service, subsequently adopted as the policy of the Government, by act of June 14, 1858, limiting the compensation to the sea and United States inland postage when the conveyance is by an American, and to the sea postage only when by a foreign vessel.

The service of the New York and Liverpool (Collins) line ceased in the month of February, 1858, since which time the mails have been carried between those ports for the postages.

In 1858 the average earnings per round trip of American steamships, receiving sea and inland postages, was $7,125 between New York and Liverpool, $8,621 between New York, Southampton, and Bremen, and $7,491 between New York, Southampton, and Havre.

In 1859 American steamers received $199,261, averaging $7,663; and foreign steamers, employed as United States mail packets, $125,349, averaging $4,730 17 per trip.

In 1860 American steamers received $228,149, averaging $7,604; and foreign steamers $147,085, averaging $2,828 per trip.

In 1861 American steamers received $157,174, averaging $6,833; and foreign steamers $235,713, averaging $2,740 per trip.

In 1862 American steamers received $33,509, averaging $5,584; and foreign steamers $285,884, averaging $2,094 per trip.

In 1863 the entire transatlantic service was performed by foreign steamers, at the sea postages only, receiving $332,184, an average of $2,516 per trip.

In 1864 the earnings of foreign steamers were $371,740, an average of $2,795; and in 1865 $405,479, an average of $2,970 per trip.

During the rebellion American steamers engaged in the carrying trade between this country and Europe were withdrawn from service, resulting to the advantage of foreign lines which continued their regular voyages; and while the subsidies granted by Great Britain to the Cunard line, and by France to the line recently established between Havre and New York, materially aided those lines, it does not follow that they would not have been self-supporting, and even remunerative, without such aid; neither has this Department information warranting the conclusion that American lines would not have been sustained during the same period under the provisions of the existing law allowing the United States postage as compensation for the service.

The subject of subsidizing American lines to British ports may be presented to Congress at its approaching session. Although in the last report the policy was commended of granting incidental aid to certain classes of new routes, as of those to Brazil and China, no modification of the system, based upon the postage earnings, was proposed in favor of established routes.

The results of this system in regard to the service on new as well as old routes are encouraging. As to the new, several lines have been established since the close of the war, to which less than the postages have been allowed. As to the old, application has been made to resume service by American steamers between New York, Southampton, and Havre, for the sea and inland postage, as heretofore. Other lines to Great Britain are projected; one of which, between Baltimore and Liverpool, is in operation; and it is believed that our citizens directly interested in ocean steam navigation will establish lines at no distant time to all the important commercial ports of Europe.

It is urged, however, that there is no sufficient assurance of the permanency of such lines in view of the competing heavily-subsidized mail packets of Great Britain and France, unless like subsidies are given by this Government. While it would gratify our national pride to encourage the commercial enterprise of the country, through the agency of subsidies, in the establishment of steamship lines of the highest grade to all ports where foreign lines are or may be in operation, and which it cannot be doubted would contribute to the earlier development of the commercial interests of the particular routes covered by such lines, this Department is not prepared to recommend any departure from the established policy, not only because of the financial wants of the Government, but as well from the absence of any necessity for special legislation on behalf of the postal service.

During the past year $405,479 was paid to foreign lines conveying the mails to and from Great Britain. If to this sum be added the United States inland postage, amounting (approximately) to $166,677, the amount which would have been available as compensation to American steamers for the same service was $570,156.

The argument in support of heavy subsidies as necessary to enable American lines to compete successfully with British steamers loses much of its force when it is remembered that the postage earnings of the British contract packets on the mails which they convey are retained by the Government and form a part of the revenues of the British post office. The British portion of the postage—sea and inland—upon the mails exchanged with this country alone by means of the Cunard line during the past year amounted (approximately) to $456,000; if to this sum be added the postage on the mails conveyed to and from the North American colonies, of which this Department has no official data, but which must have been quite large, it will be found that the actual bonus paid to that line in excess of the postage earnings was small, although the nominal subsidy is £176,300.

It is also to be observed that Great Britain grants a subsidy to but a single line of steamships to the United States. If it was advisable for this Government to grant a like monopoly to any single line of American steamers, it could be paid, under the provisions of the existing law, a liberal mail compensation equal to any subsidy that Congress would be likely to grant. But were it practicable to satisfy the conflicting claims of our principal Atlantic cities by granting a monopoly to a single line of steamers sailing from any one port, the effect of such a measure would be to retard rather than advance the general commercial prosperity of the country; and as it would be injudicious to subsidize separate lines from each of our Atlantic ports because of the large expenditure it would involve, it is submitted whether our commercial interests are not best advanced by the present mode of encouraging competition in ocean steam navigation. At least, the wiser course will be to postpone additional grants, in aid of ocean steam lines, until the system based upon postage earnings has had a fair trial in time of peace and of greatly-increased activity in commercial affairs.

APPOINTMENTS.

The number of post offices established on 30th June, 1865, including suspended offices in southern States, was 28,882; number subject to appointment by the President, 712; by the Postmaster General, 28,170.

New offices established during the year, 586; offices discontinued, 582; changes of names and sites, 200.

Appointments made to fill vacancies caused by—

Resignations.....	3,575
Removals.....	925
Deaths.....	220
Changes of names and sites.....	132
Establishment of new offices.....	586

Total appointments..... 5,447

Number of cases acted upon, 6,097.

The number of offices in the late disloyal States is 8,902, of which 1,061 were reopened on November 15, 1865.

Number of route agents, 387; aggregate compensation, $229,522. Number of local agents, 51; aggregate compensation, $30,949. Number of special agents, 33; aggregate compensation, $82,790. Number of baggage-masters, 110; aggregate compensation, $6,600. Number of postal railway clerks, 64; aggregate compensation, $75,000.

The free-delivery system has been discontinued at 22 of the smaller offices, and is now in operation in 45 of the principal cities. The number of carriers employed was 757, at an aggregate compensation of $448,664 51.

Full particulars of the operations of the Appointment office are shown in the appendix.

The attention of this Department has been again called to the subject of erecting a new post office building in the city of New York. The Chamber of Commerce of that city have recently adopted a series of resolutions recommending the measure, in which it is urged that the present building, as regards its dimensions, accessibility by the public, and accommodations in general, is inadequate for the proper management of the large and constantly increasing postal business centering at New York. The sanitary condition of the building and post office employes is also reported by the medical officer as bad, owing to the want of sufficient room to accommodate the clerical force employed, and the impossibility of obtaining proper ventilation. If the proposed improvement can be made upon terms just to the Government and the citizens of New York, this Department has no hesitation in commending the measure to the favor of Congress.

DEAD LETTERS.

The number of dead letters received, examined, and disposed of, was 4,368,087, an increase of 859,262 over the previous year.

The number containing money, and remailed to owners, was 42,154, with inclosures amounting to $244,373 97. Of these, 35,268, containing $210,954 90, were delivered, leaving 6,886 undelivered, with inclosures of the value of $33,419 07. The number containing sums less than one dollar was 16,709, amounting to $4,647 23, of which 12,698, containing $3,577 62, were delivered to the writers.

The number of registered letters and packages was 3,966.

The number of letters containing checks, bills of exchange, deeds, and other papers of value, was 15,304, with a nominal value of $3,329,888, of which 13,746, containing $3,246,149, were delivered, leaving unclaimed 1,558, of the value of $83,739.

The number containing photographs, jewelry, and miscellaneous articles was 69,902. Of these, 41,600 were delivered, and 28,302 remain for disposal, or, being worthless, have been destroyed. The number of valuable letters sent out was 107,979; an increase of 38,792 over previous year.

There were returned to public offices, including franked letters, 28,677.

39TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Report of the Postmaster General.

SENATE &amp; HO. OF REPS.

The number containing stamps and articles of small value was 8,289; and of unpaid and misdirected letters 166,215.

The number of ordinary dead letters returned to the writers was 1,188,599, and the number not delivered was 297,304, being about twenty-three per cent. of the whole. Of those not delivered, less than four per cent. were refused by the writers.

The number of foreign letters returned was 167,449, and the number received from foreign countries was 88,861. For additional particulars see appendix.

In the last report the attention of Congress was called to the expediency of restoring pre-paid letters to the owners free of postage. The measure, is again commended, with the additional suggestion that letters be forwarded, at the request of the party addressed, from one post office to another without extra charge.

The number of letters conveyed in the mails during 1865 is estimated at 467,591,600. Of these, 4,368,087 were returned to the dead letter office, including 566,097 Army and Navy letters, the non-delivery of which was not chargeable to the postal service, they having passed beyond its control into the custody of the military and naval authorities. Deducting 1,156,401 letters returned to writers, or held as valuable, the total number lost or destroyed was 2,352,424, or one in every two hundred mailed for transmission and delivery. Fully three fourths of the letters returned as dead fail to reach the parties addressed through faults of the writers, so that the actual losses from irregularities of service and casualties, ordinary and incidental to the war, did not exceed one in every eight hundred of the estimated number intrusted to the mails.

The returns of dead letters from cities are largely in excess of proportions based upon population. To them special efforts have been directed to secure the most efficient service, and it is believed improvements in operation, chiefly that of free delivery, will diminish the number of undelivered letters at offices in densely populated districts.

The number of applications for missing letters was 8,664, an increase of 3,552 over previous year. A misapprehension prevails in regarding the dead letter office as a depository for the safe-keeping of undelivered letters, and not as the agent for their final disposal; to correct which the regulations are appended.

The amounts deposited in the Treasury under act of 3d of March last were—

On account of sales of waste paper.....	$9,420 67
Unclaimed dead-letter money.....	7,722 70
	$17,143 37

Less than twenty-five per cent. of advertised letters are delivered. In some of the larger offices the proportion does not exceed fifteen per cent. The payment of two cents for each letter advertised involves a yearly expenditure of about $60,000 for letters returned as dead to the Department. Measures have been adopted to reduce the expense, and the advertising is now secured at one half the rate allowed by law. An obstacle to this economy is found in the law requiring the list of letters to be published in newspapers of largest circulation, which should be repealed, and the mode of advertising left to the discretion of the Postmaster General.

POSTAL MONEY-ORDER SYSTEM.

The number of offices is 419, including those in the Pacific States and Territories, and some of the principal offices in the southern States. Orders have been issued for putting into operation fifty-five additional offices.

The number of money orders issued during the year was 74,277, of the value of.....	$1,360,122 52
The number paid was 70,573, of the value of.....	$1,291,792 22
Add amount repaid to purchasers.....	21,781 86
	1,313,577 08

Amount outstanding..... $46,545 44

The number of duplicate orders was 422. Of these, 355 were issued to replace originals lost in the mails; 63 invalidated by age; and 3 by illegal indorsements.

The receipts were:

Fees on original orders.....	$11,462 95
Fees on duplicate orders.....	71 95
Premium on exchange.....	1 50
	11,536 40

The expenditures were:

Commissions to postmasters.....	$2,226 27
Clerk-hire.....	8,350 72
Books and stationery.....	5,225 00
Premiums on drafts.....	71 70
Miscellaneous, including furniture and fixtures.....	2,690 68
	18,564 37

Excess of expenditures..... $7,047 97

This deficiency has been provided for by the appropriation of $100,000 of May last, leaving unexpended $92,952 03 applicable to any deficiency of the current year; and as the proceeds of the system will hardly equal the expenditures until it is more generally established, it is recommended that any balance remaining at the close of the present may be applied to the deficiency of the next fiscal year.

The maximum amount of money orders is $30, which may be judiciously increased to $50, and the restriction to sums not less than one dollar removed, retaining the present minimum fee.

Under the law, the owner of a lost certificate, to obtain a duplicate, must furnish a statement, under oath or affirmation, of its loss or destruction, and procure from the postmaster by whom it was payable a certificate that the order has not and will not be paid. These requirements work a hardship to the party, in that they compel him to pay the customary fee to the officer administering the oath, the cost of a revenue stamp affixed to that oath, and the payment of a second fee for the duplicate order. The loss of orders is seldom chargeable to any neglect of the owners, and postmasters should be authorized to administer oaths in cases of loss, and issue duplicate orders without charge.

The law would be further improved by extending the time within which the order may be paid to six months, the period now allowed, of ninety days, being too limited for the necessary correspondence between distant points.

Losses have occurred to the amount of $645 by reason of the carelessness of remitters, the burning of steamers, and other causes, not chargeable to the system.

MISCELLANEOUS.

It will be seen by reference to the accompanying report of the Auditor of the Treasury for this Department, to which the special attention of Congress is invited, that the estimated amount of claims of contractors and others residing in the southern States, chiefly those lately in insurrection, for services rendered previous to the rebellion, is not less than one million dollars. Many of these claims have been presented, but none paid, under a rule adopted early in the war, of not paying claims to parties known to be engaged in aiding the rebellion. The questions connected with this subject, applying alike to this and other executive branches of the Government, they are respectfully referred to the determination of Congress.

Balances were due from southern postmasters at the outbreak of the rebellion amounting to $369,027 87, few of which have been paid. Means are being employed, through courts and other agencies, to collect the amounts due to the Government.

The closing of the war brought with it the necessity of restoring the postal service in the southern States. No time was lost in offering to the citizens of those States all the facilities which they were in condition to accept. Special agents were appointed to assist in the work of restoration. The provisional governors were notified of the readiness of the Department to appoint postmasters upon their recommendation. They were also advised of its desire to put the mails on all the railroads within their respective States as soon as informed by them that the roads were ready to carry them, and the companies proper parties to intrust with their transportation. All applications for carrying the mails on land and water routes have been considered, and the service ordered at such rates of compensation as could be agreed upon.

Anticipating that the revenues from mail service in the South would be for some time considerably less than they were previous to the war, the necessity of reduced rates of compensation, and in many instances of reduced service, was obvious. This required new classifications of rates of payment to rail and water, and modifications of pay and service on land routes. Considerable reductions have been made in the maximum compensation to the first two classes of service, as the tables hereto appended exhibit. The reasonableness of these reductions has generally been appreciated by the contractors, and the mails are being transported by rail under contract till the expiration of the current fiscal year, and by water till the 30th of June, 1869.

Greater difficulties have been encountered on the land routes, although the maximum rates adjusted by the amount of service to be performed are equal to the average of compensation allowed previous to the rebellion, except on certain routes where the former pay was excessive, and has been reduced.

Although the service has been restored in each of the southern States, it is not so general as the Department has desired and the wants of the citizens require, because of the difficulty of procuring contractors and postmasters who can take the oath prescribed by the acts of July 2, 1862, and March 3, 1863, requiring uniform loyalty to the Government during the rebellion as the condition of holding office and for the conveying of the mails.

Appended hereto is a circular letter, addressed to the special agents of the Department, embodying the principles on which the postal service is being restored in the South.

The Post Office Department was established on the principle of defraying its expenses out of its revenues. Its financial history shows that its annual receipts have rarely equaled its expenditures. During the last year there was a surplus of revenue, a result the more gratifying because no part of the appropriation for franked matter has been drawn upon. But so favorable a result cannot be anticipated for the current year, in consequence of the expenditures incident to restoring the service in the southern States, which promise proportionately small receipts because of the confused condition of the commercial and industrial interests within those States. It is hoped, however, that this unhappy condition will be but temporary, and that under their improved auspices as free communities, their contributions to the postal revenue will soon exceed any in their past history.

Although, in view of the financial wants of the Government and the large demand for postal expenditures in the southern States, this Department could but deem unwise any present reduction of domestic postage, it appreciates the duty of the Government to lessen all postage rates to the minimum of not preventing the Department to support itself from its revenues, and it perceives no reason why, in a few years, with our rapidly increasing prosperity, aided by judicious legislation, a reduction may not be made to the maximum letter rate adopted by Great Britain with such beneficent results. Moreover, the hope is indulged that the experience of European Governments will concur with that of this, in favor of an early reduction of the present high rates of international postage, which are greatly disproportioned to the necessary cost of the intermediate land and ocean transportation, and serious obstacles to postal intercourse; commercial and social, between this country and all parts of Europe.

Among the many remarkable facts illustrating the progress of the people of the loyal States during the rebellion, in almost every department of material development and social advancement, having no precedent in history, and confounding the predictions of all having little faith in the vitality of free institutions and the resources of a free people, that of the increase of postal correspondence, as shown by the postal revenues, is not the least interesting and suggestive. The maximum annual receipts of this Department previous to the rebellion from all the States, was $8,518,067 40, which was exceeded in the sum of $6,938,091 30 by the receipts of the last year from the loyal States alone. The revenues during the past four years amounted to $46,458,022 97, an average of $11,614,505 74 per annum. Compared with the receipts of the four years immediately preceding, which amounted to $32,322,640 73, the annual average increase of revenue was $3,533,845 56, which has not resulted from any considerable additions to the service, the ratio of receipts to expenditures having been larger than, with a few exceptions, at any previous period.

A proper regard to economy in administration, aided by larger contributions from all the States of the Union, will enable the Department to increase its usefulness from year to year in all of its legitimate functions. But it must not be overlooked that the ability to fully perform its mission as the postal agent of the Government is greatly impaired by the burdens imposed by the franking privilege, and expensive service upon routes established for other than postal purposes, the receipts from which are largely unremunerative. However much the establishment of these routes is to be commended for national objects, in which regard they command the approval of the country, it is not possible to see upon what principle they are wholly chargeable to the postal fund, which belongs to those by whom it has been contributed, and is pledged to meet the wants of the postal service.

The subjoined table illustrates the misapplication of the postal fund:

Routes.	Pay.	Receipts.	Excess of pay.
Salt Lake City to Folsom.....	$385,000	$23,934 44	$726,605 56
Atholton to Salt Lake.....	365,000
Kansas City to Santa Fe.....	35,743	6,536 57	29,206 43
Lincoln to Portland..	225,000	24,791 67	200,208 33
The Dalles to Salt Lake.....	186,000	5,660 77	180,339 23
Total.....	$1,196,743	$60,923 45	$1,135,819 55

These are instructive facts, showing how largely the revenues of this Department are drawn upon for general objects of administration not properly chargeable to the postal fund. If to this be added the revenue which would accrue upon "free matter," charged with existing rates of postage, less the sum annually appropriated therefor, it is estimated that not less than $2,000,000 per annum are lost to the Department, preventing an enlargement of mail accommodations to that extent in those States from which the postal revenues are mainly derived.

Respectfully submitted,

WILLIAM DENNISON,
Postmaster General.

The PRESIDENT.

SPEECH OF HON. G. CLAY SMITH,

OF KENTUCKY,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 19, 1866.

The House being in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. SMITH said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I am apprised of the interest felt by the American people upon the subject of what is known as the "reconstruction of the States lately in rebellion." It is well that so much interest is felt, and that the country is fully alive to a proper settlement of those great questions upon which so much of our future peace and prosperity depends. "The price of liberty is eternal vigilance," was the wise and instructive sentiment of a great and good man of the Republic; and our liberties have been so nearly destroyed of late, requiring so much blood and treasure to maintain them, it well becomes us to act with caution, great deliberation, and "make haste slowly." We must, without crimination and recrimination, reason with one another, come to wise and just conclusions, if we can, that the greatest amount of happiness, freedom, and peace may be secured in all time to come to the greatest number of our people. The war is over; no more are armed forces marshaling the fields, contending in mortal combat, and increasing in blacker shades the sorrow and mourning of our homes; no more are we called upon to make heavy drafts upon the country to fill the armies of the nation; no more to make heavy appropriations of millions upon millions of dollars to carry on war. While it lasted, our countrymen rallied around the flag, and were willing to give all that the Republic might give; and future history will record in beautiful and everlasting words the sublime conduct of our citizen soldiers and our loyal men and women in that great struggle for liberty and human freedom. It was awful, severe, and sublimely terrific; the blood was made to grow cold in the veins as the lightning brought us tidings of the bloody and continuous battles of forty days and forty nights in the Wilderness; of Spotsylvania, Chancellorsville, Gettysburg, Shiloh, Donelson, Chickamauga, and a hundred more of equal desperation. The heart sickened and many grew weary, but we knew for what we were fighting, took courage, and went on. We whipped, we conquered; and to-day no armed rebel is in the field—no one to resist the enforcement of the law; the integrity or dignity of the Government.

Our tactics are now to be changed. We have done all we could with arms; the law, principle, justice, and right must command, and we must obey.

I will be pardoned for making allusion to a few familiar points so well known to this House and the country, but they are necessary to my purpose, and will be important in the process of my argument.

We denounced secession as a heresy, as unwarranted by the Constitution, or any idea entertained by those who made it, or assisted in the organization of the Government.

We believed in and declared the right of coercion; that is, the right to fight and whip and bring back to obedience that portion of the insurrectionary people of the rebellious States.

We believed that slavery was one of the great, indeed, the prime cause, of the rebellion, and that we had a right to remove that cause to prevent future irritation and trouble.

We believed that this was intended to be a free Government, and one Government, with supreme and national powers over all its subjects, State and individual, and that no small or indifferent portion of the people North or South had a right to undertake its overthrow or destruction. Hence, for this and the other questions I have suggested, we went to war.

If secession was a heresy, and there was no power under the Constitution for these States to withdraw from the Union and establish another and independent government, then the Government had a legal and moral right to do what I suggested in the second place, to coerce those who attempted the secession or withdrawal.

I hold to the position of the President, and one I have always maintained, that no State is, or ever has been, out of the Union. It was impossible, under the organization and ideas of the character of this Government, for such a thing as a withdrawal of States from the Union as was attempted by the eleven southern Commonwealths, to occur, and such an attempt was madness on their part, and could do nothing else than invite resistance on our part. They asserted, we denied the principle. A war of words and ideas for thirty years had been unsuccessful as to conclusion upon this subject, and required a war of four years with arms to settle it, and it has been settled we hope forever. It has been maintained by the one side that secession was wrong, that treason would be punished, and agreed and submitted to by the other.

There is no one, Mr. Chairman, who has a more perfect abhorrence of the crime of secession and treason, and the cruelties and wrongs of those engaged in the late rebellion, than myself. I cannot recur to what has passed without a shudder, and my heart is made to mourn when I look through the four years just past and bring to mind what our noble and daring soldiers bore on the field, in battle, in hospitals and prisons. My mind wanders through the vast regions of this country where the clanking of arms was so lately heard, and I see all around hundreds and thousands of new-made graves; by each one I would pause and drop a tear of sorrow and gratitude, and a prayer for the departed brave, and the loved ones left behind. I ask, why is all this misery, woe, and death? And everywhere, by the side of every grave, in sight of every prison, in full view of every gallows, and every place of death, the solemn and awful answer comes back to me, there was no cause! It was a cruel, wicked, and unholy war against the life of the Republic; and justice demands full and complete retribution, and the Government owes it to itself to be true to its departed patriots, and teach all men of the nation that treason is a crime and must be punished. I am not here to defend but to condemn those who brought on and prosecuted that unholy war. I am not now, however, called upon to be judge or juror in the case of any one man, or number of leading conspirators. It was my inclination and pleasure, during the war, to use my best efforts to suppress the rebellion, and while in Congress to vote for men and money to vigorously prosecute the war to a successful and peaceful termination. But, as I remarked a moment ago, the war is over; there is not an armed rebel in all the land; the armies of the rebellion have surrendered to the arms of the Union, and we have accomplished what we undertook to do, the overthrow of the rebellion and the prevention of a separate and independent southern confederacy. The opposition to the Government was large and powerful, composed of the greater proportion of the people in those eleven States; but, sir, I assert that there still remained, and are there now, a large number of good and loyal men who never of their own free choice abandoned their love of the Republic, or hated that flag the emblem of their and our liberties.

I hold to the doctrine that whatever number of citizens, whether large or small, in any one of those States, or all of them who had never given in to rebellion, and longed for the appearance of the flag of their country, were entitled to, ought to have had, and, thank God! did, receive after a long and desperate battle the protection of the Government, whereby they could reassert their freedom, their social, religious, and political rights under the Constitution.

These people lived in separate geographical territories called States, with municipal regulations conforming, however, in every particular to the national Constitution and laws; by force on the part of a portion of the inhabitants of these States the civil authority of the States was suspended as they related to or were controlled by the supreme law of the land. This suspension or interruption of national authority over these States for four years (during the war) has led some to the belief that they were out of the Union, and are out now, and not entitled to any of the rights of States as such in the Union. Why, sir, we declared they were in the Union, and that we intended to keep them in the Union.

We fought four years to keep them in the Union; and now that the war is over, and the jurisdiction of the national Constitution extends all over those States, and after so much sacrifice of blood and treasure, shall it be said, shall it be claimed by any truly loyal man that they are not in the Union, States, and States for all practical purposes—a part of the nation's life, body, and soul?

Secession being wrong, unwarrantable, and violative of the Constitution, it seems strange to me that any Union man, especially a public man, one who has been in Congress, with a record all the way long, through five years past, directly and positively opposed to the doctrine, should now be found maintaining the position. When I came into Congress from the field, December, 1863, I found but one man in this Hall, as I now remember, who in anywise favored the idea that the eleven southern States then in rebellion were a foreign power, an alien enemy, and out of the Union. That was the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.] I see no difference in his position to day from that held by him in the fall of 1863. But strange, "passing strange" to me, there are others of that date, and those who were not members then, but now who seem to espouse his doctrine, and go hand in hand with him in the idea that these States are or were foreign powers, in war against the Government, and are now conquered provinces, and before they can get back into the Union must be remodeled, renovated, made over, and be admitted as new States, and not otherwise. I will, following the example of a distinguished gentleman on this floor, inquire, what is a State? That is, what is a State as considered and recognized by the American people, within their own jurisdiction, and a State as understood and commented upon by distinguished jurists and writers on international law?

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHELLABARGER] quotes from Grotius these words:

"The law, especially that of nations, is in the State, as the soul is in that of the human body; for that [the soul] being taken away, it ceases to be a State."

Now, I ask if this great writer, in framing these words, or this idea, had in his mind the component parts of a nation, a Government, a State, or the whole State, Government, and nation? The words are true, and I adopt them, for they but too plainly meet my demands. The law, to the nation, the Government, the State, is precisely to that State, or nation, or Government just what the soul is to the human body. Destroy the soul, and the body dies. Destroy the law, the Constitution, and our Government, our nation, our State dies. But, I ask, have the Constitution or the laws been overthrown or destroyed? Not at all. The Republic, the nation, the Government, the State, the Constitution, the laws, still live and survive in that very region lately in rebellion in those component parts of the Government which we chose to denigrate States.

The same writer says upon this very subject, "A morbid body is still a body, and a State, though dreadfully diseased, is still a political being." As the human body may be greatly and painfully diseased, and still live, although requiring many years of care, of treatment, and expense to bring it up again to a perfect standard of health, vigor, and manhood, so may the body-politic, the State, be diseased and live, and again, by proper nurture and judicious legislation, be brought up to perfect political health, power, and prosperity. But, sir, if we were to accept the position of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SHELLABARGER,] I will remind him that Grotius declares "a State, though it may commit some act of aggression or injustice, does not thereby lose its political capacity." The combinations of bad and lawless men, or communities, although they may overawe the remainder of the inhabitants, even the minority, do not become thereby a State, in that they effect the capacity of the State, by which all its political rights are forever destroyed, leaving them only to be revived by the will and consent of the sovereign. Is it to be said or admitted at this late day that because a lawless, insurrectionary, and rebellious people, by force of arms, overran, took possession of, and controlled the civil affairs of these States for a while, that therefore they are out of the Union, and they are as States obliterated from the list of States making up this great national Union?

It is, I am sorry to say, Mr. Chairman, asserted that such is the fact, and that because of the very act of usurpation of power by the insurgents they cease to be entitled to just consideration or representation as States. Let us see, sir, if the rule holds good in fact and as to the recognized action of Congress during the war. North Carolina was overrun, her civil government changed by the rebels. South Carolina was occupied by armed force, resisting the laws and authority of the Government, and changed her civil government. Also Tennessee, the home of the President of the United States, and her laws and civil government were altered; and so with many other of the southern States. So, therefore, we must conclude that several States did so act as to become foreign Powers, and all their people belligerents and public enemies; and the overthrow of the rebellious armed forces, by which these things were done, does not alter their political or civil status in any way whatever from that occupied by them during the war.

Let us carry the example a little further, and see how the rule works. Kentucky was also overrun by a rebel army, and with the exception of two cities on the extreme northern border, the entire territory—her capital, towns, cities, forts, arsenals, and people—were under this very force, which held the eleven other States. A rebel governor was inaugurated at the capital of the State, a Legislature was convened in the State, and elected senators to the confederate congress; members were sent to the lower house of that congress, and all was done which they conceived necessary to make Kentucky one of their confederacy. Yet, sir, Kentucky has never been one moment without a representation in the Congress of the United States. Those acts of lawlessness were done contrary to the will of a large number of her citizens, and while they were compelled to submit, they never consented. Will it be said, therefore, that Kentucky stands in the relation of a rebellious State to the Government, and not entitled to civil and political rights as a State of the Union? I presume not. Yet I will remark that it was not the people of Kentucky who drove the rebels out of that State, by which she was enabled to resume her rightful authority, but it was the army of the Union, the men who were commissioned to go forward with their guns and swords and restore the peace and unity of the nation; the very same army which followed Grant to Richmond, and brought Lee and his soldiers to a surrender; the same army which followed Sherman in his "grand march to the sea," and brought back into the fold of the Union the other eleven States, just as they did Kentucky in the beginning of their march upon the frontier of the rebellion.

Likewise Missouri was overrun, and large portions of her territory were constantly in the possession of the enemy, and a rebel governor was using every effort to make her a part and parcel of the confederacy. Maryland and Pennsylvania also. And in Missouri, Kentucky, Maryland, and even Pennsylvania, were found hundreds and thousands of people who rejoiced at their coming and mourned with deepened sorrow at their unhappy departure. But, sir, these States did not become public enemies of the Republic, and yet there was a "multitude of people united together" in each State "by a common interest and common law, to which they submitted with one accord."

Now, then, shall we say that these States last mentioned are in the Union with all the rights and privileges belonging to any other State, and these other States, which were in somewhat similar condition only differing as to time and number of people engaged against the Government, are not entitled also as States in the Union to privileges and rights which were guaranteed by the national Constitution? Congress will make a strange record if this question is not answered properly and to the effect that no State has ever been out of the Union and could get out in but one of two ways: first, I will say, by the consent of three fourths of the States, and secondly, by a successful revolution for separate independence.

I proceed further, sir, in maintenance of my position, to recite the manner in which these States got into the Union. And first to that of Kentucky, which was admitted by an act of Congress approved February 4, 1791, which declares that Kentucky "shall be received and admitted into this Union as a new and entire member of the United States of America," and by an act of February 25, 1791, was allowed two Representatives in Congress besides her two Senators. June 1, 1796, the following act was passed by Congress:

"Whereas by the acceptance of the deed of cession of the State of North Carolina, Congress are bound to lay out into one or more States the territory thereby ceded to the United States:

"Be it enacted, &c., That the whole of the territory ceded to the United States by the State of North Carolina shall be one State, and the same shall be declared to be one of the United States of America, on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever, by the name and title of the State of Tennessee. That, until the next general census, the said State of Tennessee shall be entitled to one Representative in the House of Representatives of the United States; and in all respects, as far as they may be applicable, the laws of the United States shall extend to and have force in the State of Tennessee, in the same manner as if that State had originally been one of the United States."

The State of Louisiana was admitted as one of the States of the United States, with all the privileges and rights of the other States, by an act approved April 8, 1812. So I go on with Ohio, admitted November 29, 1802; Indiana, December 11, 1816; Mississippi, December 10, 1817; Illinois, December 3, 1818; Alabama, December 14, 1819; Maine, March 15, 1820; Missouri, August 10, 1821; Arkansas, June 15, 1836; Michigan, January 7, 1837; Florida, March 3, 1845; Texas, December 29, 1845; Iowa, December 28, 1846; Wisconsin, March 3, 1847; California, September 9, 1850; Minnesota, May 11, 1858; Oregon, February 14, 1859; Kansas, January 29, 1861; West Virginia, December 27, 1862, and Nevada at the last session of Congress.

There is an act for each one of these States similar in provisions to those I have already quoted. And each and every one of those laws are on your statute-book to-day untouched, not modified and not repealed. They are the law of the land, binding and absolutely compulsory so far as we or the people are concerned, and brand as false and utterly untenable the doctrine of State suicide or annihilation.

I assert and declare most positively the truthfulness of the position assumed by some, but denied and hooted at by others, "that once a State always a State;" and there is no authority or power which can prevent it being a State for all civil and political purposes, save in the two instances I before mentioned, by successful revolution or the consent of three fourths of the States.

In support of what I have here assumed, let me call your attention to the action of Congress in the West Virginia case. The Constitution expressly declares, article four, section three:

"New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union, but no new State shall be formed or created within the jurisdiction of any other State, nor any State be formed by the junction of two or more States, or parts of States, without the consent of the Legislatures of the States concerned as well as of the Congress."

West Virginia was admitted, as I have observed, December 27, 1862. How and by what process?

The Wheeling convention, which met immediately after the ordinance of secession passed by the Richmond convention, adopted an ordinance August 20, 1861, providing for the formation of a new State out of a portion of the State of Virginia, and provided for the election of members of another convention to assemble, coming from those counties set apart to compose the new State, which met and adopted a constitution and other measures for the organization and establishment of the new State, which was approved by the people on the 3d day of May, 1862. An act of the Legislature of Virginia was passed May 13, 1862, consenting to the erection of a new State out of that portion of the State lying westward, including about half of the entire territory of the State; and an act was passed by Congress on the 13th day of December, 1862, providing for the admission of the State of West Virginia upon the amendment of the constitution prohibiting slavery, which was done, and by a proclamation of the President became a State of the Union on an equal footing with the other States. During the pendency of the act for the admission of this new State, a very interesting debate was held in this House. There were Representatives from both sections of the old State of Virginia. Those from Virginia, among the most prominent, Mr. Segar, opposed the separation and establishment of this new State; but he found his opponents on the other side, who out-battled him and succeeded in their purpose. The question was raised, and fully and ably discussed, that the requirements of the Constitution had not been fulfilled; that the war and the occupancy of the State of Virginia by a large and powerful rebel army had prevented the people of that State expressing a full and free opinion on the subject, and that the Legislature and conventions of Wheeling were not authorized to act. Upon this point allow me to read from the speech of my distinguished friend from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM.] Speaking of the ordinance of secession and the rights of the people under the Constitution in the State of Virginia as a member of the Union, he declared the ordinance void and of no effect, and said:

"Thank God! such is the wisdom, scope, and effect of the Federal Constitution, that though hand joins with hand to overthrow the rights of the loyal minority in a State, the humblest citizen who is true to his fealty is secure in his rights as a citizen of the Federal Republic under the guarantees of the Constitution, despite the conspiracy against him by the majority in his own State."

Mr. BINGHAM. I beg the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SMITH] to take notice, since he refers to that matter—for he seems to make some sort of issue with me—that I occupy precisely the position to-day that I did then; that is to say, that the act of secession or rebellion was absolutely void as against the Federal Government, absolutely void as against every loyal citizen; and therefore, in the language of Madison, which I cited and accepted that day, and which I cite and accept this day, a loyal minority, sufficient in numbers in the judgment of Congress to reorganize the disorganized State government, have the right of local civil magistracy therein, dependent, nevertheless, upon their reorganization of the State government. The point made that day was this: that the three hundred thousand loyal citizens of the State of Virginia did reorganize the State government of Virginia, and having done so, were in the rightful exercise of the legislative authority of the State of Virginia, and, in conformity with the Constitution of the United States, did assent to the erection of a new State in the State of Virginia. And I say now, if three hundred thousand loyal citizens in any of those rebel States shall reorganize a constitutional and republican State government to the satisfaction of Congress, I am prepared to recognize them and sustain them in that action.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I did not intend by any quotation I have made to misrepresent the position of the gentleman. I am not done with him yet, nor am I done with other gentlemen on this floor on this subject. But I will undertake to show before I get through, from the records I have before me, that even the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM,] together with other gentlemen on this floor, went far beyond the proclamation of the President, when he said that five thousand in a State might organize and establish it as a State, and that there was no admission in the Thirty-Seventh Congress, upon the part of any man or any set of men in this House, so far as I have been able to discover from the record, that any State of this Union was out of the Union; but it was conceded that they were all entitled to representation, even under the organization of a small, indefinite, infinitesimal majority.

Mr. BINGHAM. I have never said they were out of the Union to this hour.

Mr. SMITH. Then, if no State was out of the Union they are all in the Union—in the Union, subject to taxation, and if subject to taxation, entitled to representation in Congress.

But, to resume: what are the rights of a citizen in a State—a loyal citizen, to use the language of the gentleman? Why, sir, they are the rights of life, liberty, property, and the pursuit of happiness in his State as well as in the United States, together with the right of representation. Sir, Virginia was recognized as a State in 1862, while the war was raging, and all the State almost was in the possession of the rebels, and admitted the right of representation on this floor. Was Virginia a State then, and the loyal men entitled to their rights? And now, when the war is over, and no armed force in the field contesting the authority of the Government, it is no State, and her loyal people not entitled to their rights. Strange indeed, sir, if it should be so! No, sir, it is not so, I trust, for I "thank God the wisdom, scope, and effect of the Federal Constitution" is sufficient to overthrow and destroy the enemies of the Republic and preserve its friends.

Again, upon the subject of representation the gentleman from Ohio used the following language. When the case of Flanders and Hahn from Louisiana was up the same session of Congress, he said:

"I wish it understood that from the beginning of this argument to the end of it I have claimed that the loyal inhabitants in any organized State of the Union, even though a majority of its citizens be in insurrection against this Government, have a right to their just proportion of representation in Congress."

Sir, that is sound doctrine, good law, and pure patriotism. If it was true then, and induced him and a majority of the House to admit representation from Virginia and Louisiana, why, I ask, in all reason, patriotism, humanity, and justice is it not right now, just, reasonable, and patriotic?

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman will allow me to correct him upon one point. The gentleman labors under a very grave mistake in the remark he has just made, and I am surprised at it, for he has written out his remarks with care. He assumes here that I voted to admit Representatives from Louisiana. That is a gross mistake. I call the attention of the gentleman to the speech which I made on that occasion, in which I undertook to show to the House and tried to persuade the House that Louisiana could not be represented upon this floor. I do not know how the gentleman has fallen into the blunder, but such is the fact nevertheless. I urged at that time that Louisiana was not entitled to representation, for the reason that they had not organized a constitutional State government in Louisiana; and hence I said upon that occasion, as I repeat now, and as I have no doubt the majority of this House will say from the beginning to the end of this controversy, that when a sufficient number of loyal citizens in any State heretofore disorganized by rebellion, secession, and civil war shall reorganize a constitutional State government, of the sufficiency of which Congress will be the judge, such organization will be represented upon this floor according to their just right of representation, which in no case, under the Constitution, can be less than one member.

The difference in the case of Virginia was just this: that Congress, upon that occasion, necessarily passed upon the fact that a sufficient number of loyal persons in Virginia had reorganized a constitutional State government in the State of Virginia, and had assented, by a constitutional Legislature of that State, to the erection of a new State therein. I hope the gentleman understands my position now.

In this connection I will, with his permission, explain what he has quoted from my speech.

Mr. SMITH. Oh, no; I cannot yield further.

Mr. BINGHAM. Well, go on, and I will answer you when you get through.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, if the doctrine was true in 1862, as has been asserted even to-day by the gentleman, and has been asserted by others upon this floor, that an organized government existed in Virginia at that time, while war was raging, while rebellion was rampant, and the whole country south was flooded with armed forces moving to and fro, I cannot see how gentlemen can reconcile it to themselves to deny that it is a State now.

The gentleman claims that the people when they have organized a State government are entitled to representation. I submit the question if all of these States lately in rebellion have not organized State governments, with Governors and Legislatures and judiciaries, and all the machinery of State governments, and do not present themselves to-day to the Congress of the United States as organized States in the Union, willing to conform to the Constitution and laws of the Union? The question of States in the Union, of State organizations, is a very different thing from admitting rebels and those who were engaged in war against the Government, to overthrow and destroy it. I may be able to go with the gentleman, and I dare say I shall go with him, on the point that none but good and true loyal men, none but men who are willing to defend the interests of the Government and perpetuate it, shall sit upon this floor and exercise the rights of legislators under the national Government; but I cannot go with him. I will not go with him, or any other man, or party of men, who undertake to assert the doctrine that was asserted by the rebels when they began, that the States had a right to go out of the Union and can only come back by reorganization under an act of Congress. There is no such idea in the Constitution.

At this point I desire to return for a moment to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SHELLABARGER,] for I notice his vote is cast in the affirmative on the bill admitting the State of West Virginia, by which vote he committed himself irrevocably to the doctrine that these are States in the Union for practical, political, and governing purposes. His vote admitted in 1862 the validity and authority of both of the Wheeling conventions, the Legislatures of Virginia and West Virginia; and those very Legislatures were in session, and enacting laws, which he recognized, while a large majority of the people of old Virginia were in actual rebellion, and the Governor, Lieutenant Governor, judges, and most of the Richmond Legislature had taken an oath to support the confederate States of America. Did he not know then that a "State was a multitude of people," as he quotes from Burlamaqui, "united together by a common interest and common law, to which they submit with one accord?" Did he not know then that there was a rebel Legislature in Virginia, every one of whose members had renounced their allegiance to the United States and taken an oath to the rebel confederacy; that there was a rebel congress in the capital of that State, voting men and money to carry on war against the nation? Did he not know they were killing and starving our soldiers there, and were placing their infernal machines under and around their prisons? Did he not know then that they had sworn eternal vengeance and hatred against the life of the Republic? Was it not known to all the members of the Thirty-Seventh Congress, and those who voted for that bill and the admission of Representatives? Yes, Mr. Speaker, it was well known to all of them; but they knew another thing: that the State of Virginia was still there, in the Union, and had a loyal population who loved the country and its institutions; and they were the State, and entitled to be heard on this floor. Will these gentlemen contend they were right then and wrong now, or wrong then and right now? Then, as I have said, rebel Legislatures were in session in all these States—Virginia, Louisiana, Tennessee, and Arkansas—I know, sworn against the United States, and to maintain and uphold the confederacy. How is it now? There is no rebel Legislature in any of these States; that is, the members of these Legislatures all have sworn to support the Constitution of the United States, and have by formal acts of legislation repudiated the rebel government and everything connected with it. Hence the people, who were giving aid and comfort to the enemy in these States when this legislation was being done in Congress, have assumed now a different relation to the Government, while the loyal people—all who were there before are there now; and I assert from my convictions of right, my judgment of the law, and the precedent established, that these people are entitled to representation in Congress. At least, sir, we should admit, without a word, the principle; and if they do not send such men here to legislate for them as ought to and can take seats as members of this body, who will legislate for the good of the whole country, it is their fault, not ours.

But, sir, I am not done with the record yet. In that debate the present Speaker of the House, then holding a seat on the floor, assumed and maintained with ability the very position I am now humbly advocating. And the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] was strong and loud in his protestations against the charges of usurpation of power and the tyrannical action in the separation of Virginia, as uttered by Mr. Segar from that State, and in reply to that gentleman used the following language:

"It is the first time I have ever heard a Representative upon this floor venture so far as to say that an act authorized by the Federal Constitution, and within the express reserved rights of the people of every State, is an act of tyranny. The gentleman says that in the convention that convened the Legislature of Virginia eleven of the counties within the proposed State were not represented. What of that? Does the gentleman mean to say that it makes invalid all that has been done under that convention? Let him remember, if he pleases, when he makes an argument of that sort, that that convention, which was an original act of sovereignty of the people themselves in Virginia, appointed the very Governor of Virginia under whose proclamation he ventured to become a candidate for a seat in this House, and under whose certificate he ventured to present himself here for admission. He cannot be allowed to blow hot and cold in this way upon a question of this sort. If the convention was invalid, then their appointment of a Governor was invalid, and his proclamation for the election under which the gentleman claimed his seat was also invalid. The election proclamation of Governor Peirpoint, if I recollect the record aright, was issued before the people of Virginia were permitted to speak by ballot on the question whether Governor Peirpoint should be their Executive or not. It was the act of the convention itself that appointed the Governor of Virginia, under whose proclamation the gentleman was elected—of that very convention which the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Segar] stands here this day to repudiate.

"There was one other objection in the gentleman's argument, if it may be called an argument, which I desire to notice, and that was that there was not a sufficient number of votes given at the election to justify the House in concluding that this constitution is the act of the people. It is the first time, I may be permitted to say, that I have heard any man say that the neglect or refusal to vote of part of those duly qualified to vote invalidates an election which in other respects is legal. If that were so, then it would be impossible for the people in the State of Virginia, as long as these rebels choose to remain rebels, to reassert their rights. As to the way in which the minority may assert their rights against a majority of rebels I shall have something to say hereafter.

"If the gentleman honestly entertains the view of the subject which he has expressed, and to which I have just referred, that an election legally held is made invalid because the great majority of the voters choose not to attend and vote, then with what propriety did the gentleman come here from a district in which there are fifteen or twenty thousand voters, backed by the pitiful vote of only twenty-five citizens, and ask a seat upon this floor? [Laughter.] A man capable of playing that role might be capable of betraying in his place after he is admitted the reserved rights of the people whom he represents."

The gentleman's speech makes about a column in the Globe, and in it he charged upon Mr. Segar that he was the only Representative permitted to take his seat here by the votes of twenty-five men, while there were twenty-five thousand in his district.

Now, sir, these men come here through the action of loyal Governors and loyal Legislatures, which have adopted the constitutional amendment, repudiated the rebel debt, and coincided in the whole policy of the national Government; and they come here by the vote of thousands and thousands of loyal voters electing them to seats in this Hall; and yet the gentleman, together with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] and his colleague, [Mr. SHELLBARGER,] says that these States are not entitled to representation, that these men are not to be admitted to seats upon this floor, that these people are not to be heard in the councils of the nation. You go ahead and collect taxes from them and hold them in perfect and complete subjugation so far as the Constitution and laws are concerned, and yet these men, no matter how loyal they may be, no matter how staunch they may have been in their support of the Government and in the discharge of all their duties to it, are to be considered as outsiders, and turned away and not permitted to raise their voices here in defense of the country. While members were sitting here in their armed-cushioned chairs, with a salary of $3,000 a year, and retiring from this council Hall to their probably more comfortable rooms, with their still softer cushioned chairs and spring mattresses, and surrounded by all the comforts and luxuries that the country affords, Stokes, of Tennessee, with a sword by his side, was in that mountainous country defending the integrity, honor, and dignity of the nation, driving the rebels back, so that the honor and glory of the nation might be maintained. Yet he is regarded here as an "outsider," and not reckoned fit to be among our number. And Maynard, of Tennessee, was not permitted to sit by his own fireside with his wife and little children; the only solace he had was to wind his way over the mountains of Tennessee, seeking an asylum among the loyal people of this country, without money, without assistance, and without bread almost; always willing to defend the honor and dignity of the nation and the integrity of the Government. Yet he comes here to-day, having served two years during the war, and is called an "outsider," and must withdraw and not participate in the action of this Congress. He was actively laboring for the integrity of the Union while we were enjoying the luxuries of our own firesides, hearing no musket's fire, no cannon's roar, sleeping not upon the cold and damp ground, with nothing but the canopy of heaven to shelter them. Who is Hawkes? A man who left his native State and went into the armies of the Union, and after battling the best he could for his country was unfortunately taken prisoner and carried to Charleston, where he was exposed to the fire of our guns for sixty days and sixty nights to shield the rebels of that city from the punishment they deserved. Yet he, too, is to be regarded as an "outsider."

And who was Cooper? A man who stood up for the Union in his State during the rebellion; and when, in the spring of 1862, I was in that section of country in service, he was the only man I could refer to in Shelbyville as a reliable Union man. And who was Campbell? A commissioned brigadier general of the United States Army. All these men are "outsiders" here; and not only that, but every man who takes the position I have assumed is to be considered an outsider, a copperhead, a renegade, a latter-day-saint Democrat, because he chooses to defend the rights of the States lately in rebellion.

On motion of Mr. BAKER, leave was granted to Mr. SMITH to conclude his remarks on a subsequent day.

SATURDAY, January 27, 1866.

The House being again in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—

Mr. SMITH said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: On the occasion when I last addressed the House on this subject, I was, when the hammer fell, undertaking to sustain the position which I had assumed in the outset of my remarks, that the doctrine which had been enunciated and maintained during the war by the Union party of the United States was that secession is a heresy; that it violates all the principles of the Constitution and the law upon which our Government had been established. In maintenance of that position, I recited the authority which became a part of the record of the Congress of the United States, running through the last four years. I quoted from distinguished members of this House, and from authorities outside of the House, to show that we, as a Union party, had sustained and prosecuted the war just closed for the express purpose of keeping the rebellious States in the Union as they were when the war began, and where they are as I claim to-day.

In taking this position, and in maintaining it earnestly, as I do, I do not compromise in the slightest degree any position heretofore assumed by the great Union party of America. If we admit by our legislation now that any one of the eleven States of the South whose people waged the war against the Government for its destruction has at any time been out of this Union, we, at this late day, and after the suppression of the rebellion, come up to and adopt the very doctrine which led to the rebellion. It was maintained in the Congress of the United States for thirty years, the great South Carolina champion taking the lead, that prior to the adoption of the Constitution the thirteen original States were independent sovereignties, outside of and independent of the Union; that the Union was made up of independent States, and that they had a right, whenever they chose, to withdraw their allegiance from the Government and resume their original sovereignty as independent States. That doctrine we denied. We resisted it by argument for thirty years in Congress and out of it. We maintained that the allegiance of every citizen throughout the country to his State was subordinate to his allegiance to the national Government. When the controversy became one of arms our people, by thousands, rallied for the maintenance of the great principle which they had before asserted, and resisted to its overthrow that pernicious doctrine which brought on the most calamitous war that the world ever witnessed.

I was proceeding to show, when I last had the floor on this subject, that the action of Congress in the admission of the State of West Virginia clearly proved, beyond the shadow of a doubt, that secession and rebellion, in their most formidable strength, could not destroy the State government of Virginia. The Legislature of that State, which was assembled, not in Richmond, the capital of the State, but in Wheeling, was recognized as the legitimate authority of the State of Virginia, and gave its consent to the withdrawal of those western counties and the formation of a new State; and thus West Virginia was admitted into the Union by the action of the Congress of the United States. Congress admitted, ipso facto, that neither Virginia nor any other State had ever been out of the Union.

In addition to that, this House, by the vote of a large number of its Union members, admitted as a Representative from Virginia a gentleman who had received only twenty-five votes from a district embracing twenty-five thousand voters. And the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM,] from whom I have already quoted, declares that the men who sent these men here to represent them are the authorized power of the district and State to send this Representative, and should be recognized and are recognized as such. Mr. Lincoln asserted the same doctrine. He said:

"The people of Virginia have thus allowed the giant insurrection to make its nest within her borders; and this Government has no choice left but to deal with it where it finds it. And it has the less regret, as the loyal citizens have, in due form, claimed its protection. Those loyal citizens this Government is bound to recognize and protect as being Virginia."

There was the Chief Executive of the Union, nominated and elected by us; the great head of our party; not only elected by the Union party in 1860, but, on the doctrine enunciated in this proclamation and this message, went before the people again in 1864, and notwithstanding a combination of politicians to destroy him and put others in his place, the great American people rallied around him. The people stood by him because they were opposed to secession in every form; and he was more triumphantly elected to the presidential chair than any man since the days of Washington.

Mr. Lincoln went further on that subject. He said:

"Our States have neither more nor less power than that reserved to them in the Union by the Constitution—no one ever having been a State out of the Union."

Now, I submit, by what process of reasoning can gentlemen come to the conclusion that when war is waging, and while a vast majority of the people of a State are in insurrection against the Government; its Legislature in session; its Congress in session; its army in the field, and we having jurisdiction over a small portion of the territory—I ask how can we, with all that resistance, all that force trampling down the Constitution, the laws, and the authority of the Government, claim that the State was in the Union and could not go out; and yet, when the war is over; when there is not an armed rebel in the field anywhere in the broad land; when there is not a hand uplifted against the enforcement of the laws and the Constitution, it shall be claimed that these States are not within the Union, and not entitled to representation in Congress?

Now, on that point I shall call the attention of the House to the remarks of the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHELLABARGER] in regard to the constitutional power of the Government over the States. He claims that these States are not States in the Union for governmental purposes; but let us see. This very day, while I am addressing you, your Constitution is the supreme law of the land over all of them; it is regulating commerce among them; it requires Representatives and Senators (if they were here) to reside in their respective States; it is prohibiting the States from entering into treaties, alliances, or confederations, coining money, emitting bills of credit, making anything but gold and silver coin a tender for debt; passing any bill of attainder or ex post facto law, or law impairing the obligation of contracts; from taxing imports or exports without consent of Congress; from laying tonnage duty; from keeping troops or ships of war in time of peace; from entering into any compact with another State or foreign Power; from engaging in war unless invaded, or in imminent danger thereof; from refusing to give full faith to records, &c., of other States; from refusing to surrender fugitives from justice or labor; in requiring States to be tried in the courts of the United States; requiring all their officers to take an oath to support the Constitution; requiring them to pay State's proportion of direct taxes; in prohibiting either State from conferring any other emolument upon the President than his salary; in requiring them to furnish at command of the President their militia; and in subordinating their judges, constitutions, and laws, to the Constitution, laws, and treaties of the United States as "the supreme law of the land."

the speech of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SHELLABARGER,] and I ask, over whom or what do these provisions of the Constitution operate? Certainly, sir, over States, and the people thereof, for the Constitution in the cases mentioned deals alone with States. There was a time, it was short, however, in the life of a nation, or even a man, that these powers of the national Constitution were suspended and inoperative. In many of the States but for a few months, a few weeks, in some of them nearly four years; but now perfect, complete, unobstructed, and unquestioned authority is granted to this instrument "as the supreme law of the land."

Now, more; they have gone further, and complied with the policies of the Government adopted since the rebellion began. Nearly all the States have remodeled their constitutions and abolished slavery; they have repudiated the rebel debt; the loyal men are rejoicing and clapping their hands in gratitude for their deliverance, while hundreds and thousands of those who were in the rebellion are seeking pardon and a restoration to citizenship under the flag and Constitution of the Union.

Mr. Lincoln went further, and in the proclamation of December 8, 1863, he specified the means on which restoration to peace might be had, and enumerating the States in rebellion, he asserted the power he had over these people to grant them pardons under certain conditions. If they are not States and have not violated the laws or Constitution of the United States, what authority has the executive department to issue proclamations of pardon to the various members of those communities? What power has he under the Constitution, or what authority has Congress under the Constitution of the United States, to compel them as States, by the appointment and confirmation of officers, to execute the judicial rights of the Government in those States, and to collect from them taxes and revenue for the defense of the Government?

Now, sir, in regard to the position of the rebels, I say that is a different and separate proposition. If you come to me and ask me what I would do with the rebels, I have an answer to give you. When you ask me whether a State has been out of the Union I answer as I have always answered, and as every gentleman on this floor has answered, with the exception of one or two, that they never have and never can get out of the Union except in two ways. One is by the consent of three fourths of the States of the Union; the other is by successful rebellion. When they have accomplished the one or the other of these then they are out—otherwise not. And we spent $3,000,000,000 to keep them in. We gave five hundred thousand men to keep them in. We have lost a vast deal. We have spread the habiliments of mourning all over this land, and there is scarcely a hearth-stone in the land that is not mourning to-day because of the departure of some loved one, all to maintain the integrity of the Constitution, and to keep these States in the Union.

And are we now to admit as members of Congress those who have dyed their hands in the blood of their loyal countrymen? I answer no, emphatically no. I maintain that the rule for us to lay down as the just, the consistent, the true one—the rule by which we can stand, and by which the American people stand, and around which they will rally by thousands and millions, is, that no State has been out of this Union, but they are all in it; that the people whom you tax according to the Constitution are entitled to representation in Congress; but if they do not send the right kind of men, good men, loyal men, men who can do as we have done—stand before the altar of this House, and with uplifted hand swear before God and man that they have never done anything to overthrow and destroy this Government, send them back and let their people send another, and if he cannot take the oath, let them keep on sending men until they give us one who can be properly qualified to sit in the great Legislature of the nation. Do you suppose that any Union man in this country by taking the position I have taken now, and that I have assumed all through the war—proving my faith by my works—taking the position that no State is out of the Union, that it ought not to go out, that the States that attempted to do so engaged in an unjust and unholy war—

Mr. BROOMALL. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. SMITH. As soon as I get through my sentence. Having witnessed so many scenes of blood and terror, can I ever vote for the admission of those who have been guilty of so much crime and wrong to take part in our legislation here? By no means, sir; for one, I cannot do it.

Mr. BROOMALL. I desire to ask the gentleman whether he means by the State the body-politic or the mere land; whether, when he says that no State has gone out of the Union, he means that the body-politic of the old State of South Carolina has not gone out.

Mr. SMITH. It is a very curious question whether a State is merely a geographical line or a piece of land—territory described as such. It cannot be a State without it has people in it. It must have land, water, wood, something to eat, cattle, horses, sheep, hogs, and everything that belongs to the agricultural department as well as the mechanical departments. It must have men and women in it. It must have an organization. It must have a Governor, a Legislature, a judiciary, to be a State. When it has got these, and is recognized by Congress, it is a State. And all these States have been thus reorganized and recognized by Congress. The statute is not repealed.

Mr. BROOMALL. Will the gentleman allow me to ask—

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. SMITH. If he is satisfied with the position that ground does not make a State.

Mr. BROOMALL. I am satisfied that the gentleman does not mean the organized body-politic, when he says a State is not out of the Union. Now, I ask him whether the reorganized body-politic now existing in South Carolina is the same that existed there six years ago; is a legitimate succession in any legal or civil point of view of the former one.

Mr. SMITH. I will answer the question with pleasure. I say that the reorganized body-politic in South Carolina to-day is not the one that was there in 1860, and so I answer that the reorganized State government of Kentucky to-day is not the one that was there in 1860. Because in 1860 we had a rebel Governor, and a rebel Legislature; in 1861 we had a Union Governor and a Union Legislature; in 1864 and 1865 we had a Union Governor and a very rebellious Legislature; and so the thing is changing. But in the State of South Carolina the State organization was suspended by the result of their insurrection, and their efforts to overthrow that government as it related for the time being to this Government. But there was always from the time the rebellion began an organization in that State against the Government; and after the rebellion was put down, and there being no loyal judges, legislators, or Governor, the President of the United States had a right, as was done by President Johnson, to appoint a military governor to exercise the functions of Governor until the people could resume the powers of government, and put to work the entire machinery.

Now, the people of South Carolina have established their State government; they have elected their Governor; they have elected their Legislature; they have them, and they have their judiciary. I am not defending rebels, but I wish to submit this question to my friend from Pennsylvania, and I hope he will answer it. I ask him if he has any authority, if he has any information, direct or indirect, that the State authorities of South Carolina have in anywise, at any time, under any condition, undertaken to interfere with or overthrow the Government, the Constitution, or laws of the United States? In other words, I ask you whether the State government of South Carolina is not to-day in perfect conformity to the laws and policies of the United States?

Mr. BROOMALL. I have not the means of answering that question; but I incline to think the State of South Carolina, or rather the present organization of South Carolina, will be found to be antagonistic to the Government when examined.

But I do not yet get an answer to my question; and that is upon what the present organization of South Carolina rests; whether it rests upon the mere proclamation of the President; whether it is the legitimate successor of the old one that did exist there, or a new creation; and if a new creation, how created, and by what authority, since I am not aware that Congress ever authorized a new creation of States within any part of the conquered territory.

Mr. SMITH. The gentleman seems indisposed to receive my answer, which I thought was very explicit. I say to him that the power by which South Carolina was reorganized emanated from the people; it was by the people there that this thing has been done, just as it has been done in the States of Tennessee and of Arkansas and Virginia and other States. It has gone back to the people, and the people have elected their Governor, their Legislature, and their representatives in the various branches of the State organization. Now, take the State of Tennessee for instance. What more can we ask than that State has done, so far as it relates to the General Government? I am not speaking of individual wrongs upon this man, or that man, or the other, but I am speaking of the State. She has elected one of the most unconditional Union men of the United States as her Governor. She has sent here the very best men she has in her State to represent her in Congress. She has a Legislature elected by her people who alone had the power to elect, all who were in the rebellion having been excluded except those who took the oath, having been conscripted and forced into the rebel army.

Now, when, how, and why are you to disregard that organization, and when is it to be said that she is a State in the Union? Gentlemen say you want guarantees. I put this proposition, and I want somebody to answer it, if they please, without interrupting me, when they come to speak: what guarantees can you put into the Constitution; what guarantees can you secure by law; what guarantees can you have in the form of statutes; I do not care how voluminous or how strong in words or terms? I do not care what provisions you put in the Constitution. But what power is there in this Government to prevent these people, or the people of New England, or the people of the middle States, from rebelling when they want to? We thought before that our Constitution was secure against rebellion; we thought the laws we had were sufficient to prevent rebellion; we were continually legislating to quiet the different sections of the country; but we had a rebellion; it came upon us, and the only way we suppressed it was by force. I care not what laws you put upon the statute-book; if they choose to rebel again they will do it, and the only way the Government can maintain itself will be by force, as it did in the past.

The right of revolution is an inherent right in the people; and whether they agree to-day to laws or not is a question for them to determine; and if they choose to rebel against them a year from this time they can do it; but it is within the power of the Government to prevent the rebellion, to put it down, to suppress it if they choose. Sir, I do not believe in the right of the people to revolt against the Government and undertake its overthrow until that Government becomes oppressive. Our Government has never been oppressive; it has been the best and most beneficent in the world, and therefore our people rallied as one man to its defense. But still, while I say these things, I am for voting for whatever law is necessary to promote quiet and harmony throughout the country.

But, gentlemen, allow me to say one thing. The course to be pursued by a great people and its Legislature during a time of war may not be the best course to be pursued after that war is over. If there are those whom you think should be punished, should be held up as examples for their crimes, then, in the name of justice, of law, and of the injuries they have inflicted upon the people of this country, bring them to justice, hang them if need be, and I shall rejoice rather than weep over it. I have always believed, as I have reiterated in Congress time and time again, that treason should be made so obnoxious and terrible in the sight of the people of this country that all men will be slow to commit it again. Make your examples; I care not who they may be. But in regard to the great mass of the people from whom we must collect our revenues and taxes, with whom we must live, and with whom we must have our commercial and political and social relations, we must not go too far; we must not grind them down too much. And above all, we must remember that brave men never kick and abuse a fallen foe.

Mr. LYNCH. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SMITH. Certainly.

Mr. LYNCH. I desire to ask the gentleman if I understand him to maintain that this rebellion has in nowise changed the relations of the States to the General Government, but it is simply a question between the Government and its citizens as citizens of the United States?

Mr. SMITH. I mean to say that the war did change most materially the relations of the States toward the Government of the United States. Their relations are now altogether changed, because before the war there were fifteen slave States, with statutes upon your statute-books requiring that fugitives from labor should be returned to the respective States and owners from which they had escaped. And your judiciary decided that it was the duty of the Government to see that those laws were executed. Now the relations of those States are changed in that four million people formerly slaves are now free. And the people lately engaged in rebellion have changed their relations toward the General Government in that they have committed treason, and they cannot regain their old political rights and privileges as citizens of the United States unless they receive, at the hands of those who have the power, a pardon for the offenses they have committed.

The relation of the States which were engaged in rebellion has been changed or suspended. But, as I remarked a moment ago, those States, through their people establishing new State governments, are still States in the Union, and have never been out of it.

Mr. LYNCH. If the gentleman will allow me, I will state that he does not seem to apprehend my question to him. I understand the gentleman to say now that these States are new States, thereby acknowledging that in effect their relations toward the General Government have been changed. Now I wish to ask him, conceding that these States are new States, and not, as was very well put by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BROOMALL,] the successors of the old States, who is to determine, what branch of the Government is to determine, the status of those nine States and the conditions upon which they may reënter the Union? If they are new States—

Mr. SMITH. I do not desire to hear an argument from the gentleman at this time.

Mr. LYNCH. The gentleman will pardon me. I have no desire to make an argument, but simply to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. SMITH. The relations that Maryland, Delaware, Kentucky, and Missouri bear to the Government of the United States at this time are very different from what they were in 1860. They then bore the relations of slave States, and they were regarded and represented here as slave States, with certain rights under the Constitution and under the laws. The amendment of the Constitution abolishing slavery has been passed, but not with the consent of my State, Kentucky. She has persistently refused to do it. Yet she has had two hundred and twenty-five thousand slaves taken from her people by law. Who did that? Who made that radical change in the condition of the State of Kentucky? Was it the people of Kentucky? That State had an organized State government, and was never regarded out of the Union, however hostile some of her authorities may have been. Yet the strong arm of the Government, through the law, has changed her relation to the General Government.

And these other States have altered their relations to the General Government, first, by war; but they have resumed their relation by peace, and coming back into the Union and adopting the rules we have laid down for them.

But, in the few minutes I have remaining, I wish to be distinctly understood that, in my humble judgment, the great party to which I belong, and with which I would always wish to act, when I can do so consistently, is making one of the most important mistakes that a great party ever did make. I have no doubt that they are seeking to ingraft into their political creed something which will result in great injury to the Government, and which will expose it to more danger than any we have ever been exposed to heretofore.

You may speak of the rebellion as you choose, and I will consent to all that you may say. You may denounce all those who were engaged in it as bitterly as you please, and I will say "amen" to every word. You may exclude from participation in the Government those who have used their efforts to destroy, for so long a term as you please, and I shall not murmur. But I beg that the Union party, having the ascendancy in this House and this Government, as it has to-day, will not go too fast or too far, will not undertake to do too much. It is a wonderful spectacle in history, one which the world has never before seen, that in a country like ours, acknowledging and upholding slavery, four million people should have been emancipated, their shackles knocked off, and their freedom achieved within the short period of four years. It was a grand and a rapid stride, as I trust and believe, for the civilization of the world and for the extension of liberty to all men. I would maintain the freedom of these people here and everywhere to the extent of my humble ability. Nay, further, I would teach them to be intelligent, to be virtuous, to be Christian, to enjoy all the advantages of civilization. I would insure to them all their rights of property, liberty, and life. I would guaranty to them the rights enjoyed by any other man.

I do not believe in the doctrine that negroes should be witnesses only in cases where they alone are interested. I believe that the negro should be permitted to go into the courts to vindicate his honor, his integrity, his rights of property. But you must not ask me to go so far at this time as to declare that these negroes are all entitled to the right of suffrage, and that it should be extended to them universally throughout the United States. I say to members of this House, the negroes of the South do not to-day demand that of you; they do not ask you to give them the right of suffrage at this time, because they know the danger to which it would expose them. I am the friend of the negro race. I will do as much as any other man on this floor for the advancement of that race. I have already done a great deal more in this respect than many of those who are listening to me to-day. I affirm that the negroes themselves are, with few exceptions, afraid of the future in reference to this question of universal suffrage.

You may amend the Constitution if you please, so as to bring this question of negro suffrage directly before the States, cutting off a part of their representation, if they will not allow the black man to vote; but by such attempts you but irritate and excite the two races, the one against the other. Having been born in the South, having been reared in the very midst of the system of slavery, I believe that the effort to bestow the right of suffrage upon the negroes throughout the country is not calculated to promote their advancement or secure their best interests. In my own State, I have never met more than two or three of these people who asked to be endowed with the right of suffrage. I received the other day a letter from a negro who in 1862 was my property; and in that letter he urges me to resist this effort because of the prejudice prevailing in this country against his race. It seems to me that justice and humanity to these people require that we should not force this thing too rapidly upon them and the country.

I go further, and reiterate the sentiment uttered by me at the last session of the Thirty-Eighth Congress, that I am utterly and entirely opposed to this doctrine of negro suffrage. I believe that God Almighty never intended that the white people and the black, two distinct and antagonistic races, should be copartners in the management of civil government. Whether the negroes have been in slavery or not, the same rule, in my judgment, equally applies. It is useless for man to attempt to accomplish what nature has determined shall not exist. Mexico is suffering to-day because of the wonderful amalgamation of different races among her people. Governments under which different and distinct races become commingled politically and socially cannot in the very nature of things endure.

Now, here is the plain proposition. I care not how humble or ignorant or poor a white man may be, when he settles in this country, with his family around him, every one of the same class of people recognizes the fact that at some future day the little child that totters at his knee may grow up to be fully the equal in social and political position of the wealthiest, the most exalted man in the land. It is a part of natural law. It was so intended by the Creator; and you can never bring any man who wishes to maintain himself as an Anglo-Saxon willing to consent to any such thing.

Now, what does voting do? It brings about most social relations, more than any other kind of intercourse in the world. A Representative must talk to his constituents; he must receive them in his house; he must receive them with open house and with politeness; he must do all these things. A constituent has the right to come into his house, and sit down in his parlor, and there talk about the business of state and all matters connected with the Government. As the Representative and constituent sit and talk over the affairs of state, the children of the Representative, playing around, would see this intercourse and hear all that was said. In that way there would be such a social relation as was never intended, and which I believe would be detrimental to the Government of the United States.

I say this as an argument to support my position against negro suffrage. I do not believe that it would be wise on the part of the American people at this time. What may be done in the future I am not able to say. What may be done twenty-five years from now I am unable to foresee.

But, Mr. Chairman, the inconsistency of gentlemen here is a fruitful fact. Men sit on this floor, largely in the majority, from the various States, who ask that universal suffrage shall be imposed on all that section of the country where slavery abounded and where the blacks are so large a part of the population, while, in their own States, where they have only a few blacks, and those educated, they have persistently refused for twenty-seven years to grant to that class of their people the right of suffrage. The Pennsylvania Legislature, now in session, has just passed by one branch of its body a resolution instructing the Representatives in Congress for that State to vote for the bill granting universal suffrage in the District of Columbia. Why do not the people in Pennsylvania call a convention and so amend their constitution as to allow the twenty or thirty thousand educated negroes in that State the right to vote? They will not do it; not a bit of it. They will not do it in Illinois. They will not do it in Indiana. They will not do it in Ohio. They will not do it in any of those States; but when they come to us who have been as loyal as they have, who have manifested our loyalty as earnestly as any of them, they say it must be as a punishment on those who have been in the rebellion. If it alone affected those men I would not have anything to say; but while you punish fifty thousand men in Kentucky who were rebels you punish a larger number of the other side who never were rebels and never for one moment did anything against the United States.

If you wish to punish men in the South because they were rebels, why do you not go to New York, Pennsylvania, and even Massachusetts, and punish those men there who gave aid to the rebellion and prayed for the overthrow of the Government? It ought to be done. Legislation to be just ought to be equal.

I hear a great deal said in both branches of Congress about the condition of the negroes South and their inability to secure their own rights. I believe that to be true in part. I believe whatever legislation is necessary to give them their rights ought to be passed. I believe that this Congress would be derelict in its duty if we did not give that people whatever legislation is necessary for the purpose. If we did not we would be held responsible before God, who looks upon us every day. We would be held responsible in the future if we did not give them all the protection they ought to have.

But let me remind you that throughout that section there is a class for whom we have done nothing. They have not as yet received any sympathy upon this floor. There are white men and white women there who are poor, poorer than the negroes, who have been downtrodden and cruelly treated from the commencement of the war because of their love to the Government. There are those who lay hid in caves for weeks and months, and prayed for the return of the old flag; men who have risen and wept that they did not see the glorious folds of the old flag reflecting back the rays of the morning sun. Why should we not afford relief to these good Union men who are to be found in the valleys and mountains of the South? They were bowed down for four years and rejoiced gladly when the Union was restored.

Why, sir, go with me to Tennessee. I love to talk about it. When General Burnside went to the relief of Knoxville the roads were so bad that his teams could not follow him. He said he must give it up. "But, no," said the Union people in this mountain State, "protect us;" and they came like the people of old, with their corn and their meat and their bread in their laps and poured them down at the feet of your soldiers. And ten or fifteen thousand were fed around the city of Knoxville by these people, the poor, downtrodden and abused Union men and women, who, by this magnanimous act, left not a morsel in their houses to eat, their children crying piteously for bread. Who speaks for them? Who writes anonymous letters to Washington city for them? Who fills up the newspapers with letters from the South about these people? You find them in Alabama, in Louisiana, in Missouri, in this city, and everywhere. You find them everywhere, without arms, without legs, without eyes, without property, without a home, without bread and meat; and yet no sympathy goes out from the national heart in their behalf.

They go annually to their great cities of the dead, created so suddenly and so wickedly by a desolate war, and they water the sod that covers the noble brave with their tears. They go to those places where—

"On fame's eternal camping ground,
Their silent tents are spread,
And glory guards with solemn round and they pay their tribute of gratitude to the memory of those people for bringing back the days of peace. And yet what are we doing for them? Nothing. They send up their representatives here and say, "Will you let us have a voice in the national council? Will you allow the philanthropists and patriots who stood up for us, and wept for us and did all they could for us, to come and take a seat in Congress and assist in your legislation? Will you allow Taylor and Cooper and the rest of our friends who went to the North, and by their advocacy of the very principles we now advocate to-day, gave you success in elevating your Chief Magistrate to his place; will you allow them to come and take part in your councils and advise with you as to what is best to be done for their interests? Will you let the twenty-nine thousand men of Tennessee who shouldered their guns and marched to the front—who went where you dared not go—will you allow them a voice here as to what their rights are? Will you let a voice come up from the dead all over this land saying that these people have rights to be represented?" No, no. Why? Because, as the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LYNCH] remarked the other day, they were like Tray, in bad company. Sir, if that is the case, if we are all to be tested by that rule, there would not be many of us here to-day. For I presume there is not a district in the whole country that has not what you believe to be bad men—copperheads, so called, rebels at heart. Therefore, if these men by being in bad company are not entitled to seats, neither are you, and you ought in consistency to retire.

But strange things come over us. Some men say that revolutions never go backward; that this is a progressive age; and that we are to march on in our career. I, too, believe that revolutions never go backward. But my judgment is, that sometimes a party that has been successful as a revolutionary party, so called, may go so fast and so far that they themselves become the obnoxious revolutionists and do the wrong. There is the danger I apprehend. We have a great and good Union party in this country. There are differences of opinion between us upon some points; but is it not wise, is it not proper, that we should so legislate and so act that we keep that great party together? If you do keep it together; if you do legislate properly; if you do your duty, it will not, it cannot break or divide, while you will rejoice in the expression that revolutions never go backward.

But, gentlemen, you must remember that the longer you consult, the longer you trifle, the longer you disregard the sentiment of that loyal people, the greater the danger of making them enemies of the Government of the United States. Where are these men to go? Whom are they to look to? What must they do? "They are not in the Union"—"they are not out of the Union." Some of them are entitled to representation; some of them are not. What are you going to do? When are you going to let them in? When you have a guarantee, you say, that they will send good men here. They say, "We have no objections." But they may send bad men. Well, suppose fifteen years from now you say you will admit them. They then send good men. But who can say that they will not the very next year send bad men? You say you will fill up the country with emigrants, and create a large loyal population who will keep in Congress loyal men and not rebels. But they too may send bad men; indeed some of the loyal States have sent bad men to Congress, and they occupy seats around us.

Basis of Representation—Mr. Johnson.

HO. OF REPS.

Basis of Representation.

SPEECH OF HON. P. JOHNSON,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 29, 1866,

On the proposition to amend the Constitution of the United States, apportioning representation and taxation.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, if the masses of the Republican party are half as anxious to amend the Constitution as are their Representatives here, or, in other words, if they really believe that it needs half the amendment that has been proposed by their Representatives here, it would seem extremely difficult to reconcile that belief with the declarations so often repeated during the war that the South had rebelled against the best Government the world ever saw or that was ever devised by the wit of man.

If this multitude of propositions to amend the Constitution are the legitimate fruits of the nation's experience for three quarters of a century, and now come to us as the deliberate judgment of the American people, made up in the progress of nearly three generations, it would seem not at all strange that so large a portion of our countrymen at last rose in rebellion against a Government so defective in all its fundamental principles, and the great wonder would seem to be that the men and the party now proposing these amendments are the same that so lately and so loudly claimed to be the only true friends of the Constitution and the Union. And if our experience and judgment as a nation have not taught us that these amendments are necessary to remedy existing evils, I think it will be found very difficult to reconcile our proposed action herewith that sentiment of profound wisdom expressed in the Declaration of Independence, that "Governments long established should not be changed for slight and transient causes."

The most of these propositions, if not all of them, emanate from the New England school of politics, which embraces all the doctrines of the now thoroughly abolitionized Republican party. Who can imagine the torture that these people must have suffered for many, many long years, galled as their necks must have all the time been with the Government of the fathers to them so unrepresentative in form?

We begin now to understand why Massachusetts so long ago proclaimed the doctrine of State secession and threatened its exercise for what they regarded as evils under our system of government; and now we begin to understand why in the late war with Old England, New Englanders sent up rockets and blue lights to apprise the enemy of an opportunity to capture them. They were tired of our, to them, imperfect form of Government, and were ready to cast it off for any other that might be thrown upon them. We hear a great deal said of the consummate folly, to use no harsher term, manifested by the people of the South in going as they did into rebellion against the vastly superior power of the North; but with these developments before us it is quite evident that their supremest folly consisted in their taking the lead in attempting to break up the Union. Had they but waited until another presidential election was over and the Republican party was hurled from power, as it surely would have been, they would have had the satisfaction of beholding these malcontents turning their backs upon the best Government the world ever saw, and then the traitors and patriots would have stood during the war as they stood before it, and in the reversed order in which they now stand.

But, sir, these propositions are not the suggestions of long experience, nor are they the result of a nation's deliberation. They are the contrivances of partisan politicians, who, finding themselves in possession of political power not honestly obtained from the people by an open and candid declaration of principles, now avowed, fear that unless they can so alter and change our form of government under the pretext of amendment as to prevent it, the people will rise against them and hurl them to that oblivion so richly merited by any party that would in this enlightened age undertake to steal into power under false issues and hold it in defiance of their will.

In the first instance we have a batch of amendments, so called, which it is contended are necessary to make good the guarantee of the Constitution to the several States of governments republican in form. Some propose to enforce these provisions by constitutional amendment, adopted by three fourths of the States, while others propose to hold these States as Territories under military despots, and withhold from their people all the rights of self-government until they will consent to surrender a part of them to a foreign race. This is making good the guarantees of a republican form of government with a vengeance.

We laugh at the story of an Irishman who ran into the street brandishing his shillalah and declaring that he would have peace if he had to fight for it, while we say to the people of the several States South that unless they permit negroes to vote their governments will not be deemed republican in form, and we will hold them under military subjection forever.

The people of the South seem to fail entirely to appreciate that high-toned republican and liberal spirit which would dictate to them that they must either surrender the principles of self-government handed down to them by the fathers to an ignorant and dependent race or submit to the most despotic form of government known to the world, military satraps, provost marshals, alcaldes, and viceroys, with swarms of officeholders sent among them to eat out their substance and tax them without representation. Betwixt these evils the people of the South seem unwilling to choose.

The one proposition is to set up for them a race of false representatives and govern them accordingly; the other is to limit the class of persons who shall be represented to the white male adults, or voters, and this we are told is a just measure of punishment to this rebellious people for their political offenses. Formerly there was great complaint by the opponents of slavery against that clause of the Constitution which permitted five slaves to be counted in the basis of representation as equal to three free persons, white or black, North or South.

Against this provision of the Constitution there has been one continuous howl from the now abolitionized States. They forgot that in the formation of the Constitution the commerce and traffic of the northern States forced a continuance of the African slave trade upon the southern States until the year 1808, and that to induce the South to submit to this trade they gave them a slave representation in the Congress; and now that slavery is abolished and the three-fifths clause necessarily falls with the institution, it is proposed to take away from the entire negro population, now all free alike, all representation whatever, and thus deprive them of a freeman's right before they can be justly taxed.

It is true that the proposition is softened somewhat by the clause which relieves that class of population from being made a basis for the apportionment of direct taxes. This will make it more palatable to the white population, inasmuch as it relieves them of the great burden of that apportionment, as the Constitution now provides. But even this will not relieve the negroes from the payment of some portion of those very direct taxes, and these are by no means the only taxes that are levied in these times of high tariffs, now upon imports, and proposed to be extended to exports as well as imports.

Let us look, then, to the operation of this proposed amendment in the southern States. We say to the present voters of the South, you must allow your votes to be neutralized by the negroes among you, or we will not allow those negroes to be represented here. These manumitted slaves may grow cotton, and we will tax their labor when they come to export its fruits, and deny them all representation. Who does this punish, or who become the sufferers under the operation of this proposed alteration of the Constitution? Surely not the white population, for they are created an aristocracy worse than the old oligarchy of which we used to hear so much. They are the only persons to be represented, and while they represent themselves they govern the opposite race as arbitrarily as any despotism in the world.

This effect in the North will be the same as in the South except as to its extent. I am not only the accredited Representative of the voters and white population of my district, but I am under the Constitution the Representative of the interests of all other persons inhabiting the district; the voters by their expressed wish and the rest by the wish that is to be implied by knowing their interest. The lady friends of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Brooks,] complain that they are taxed without being permitted to represent themselves at the ballot-box. But what would they say if they were taxed and not represented at all? It must be borne in mind that persons can be represented without themselves being permitted to vote. The one is being represented, the other is representing one's self and others at the same time. Take the case of two families owning property of equal value; the one is composed of males and females, young and old, while the other is composed of an equal number of persons, but all voters. Both are taxed alike, because both are represented alike by the law-making power.

Is this not the same kind of taxation and representation for which our fathers fought the war of the Revolution? If the principle of representation as a basis of taxation was worth the long and fearful struggle of the Revolution, ought we not to hold it as too dear to be frittered away in the manner proposed? There seems to be an almost perfect oblivion among the friends of these various measures as to where the line should be drawn between the representatives and the represented. Human wisdom has never yet fixed upon any definite line of demarcation, as is attested by the various provisions in the constitutions of the several States relating to this subject. A certain class of persons must be set apart as the operators of the public will. All are passengers on board the ship of state, but all are not officers in command; yet all are protected by the flag at the mast-head.

How many hundreds and thousands of our constituents would like to be members of Congress; yet only one man out of the one hundred and thirty thousand population apportioned to a district can hold such office, and he is selected by a majority, or it may be a mere plurality, of twenty-five thousand voters. A faithful member of Congress represents the whole population of his district, male and female, black and white; and to represent them faithfully he must familiarize himself with all their varied interests and harmonize them as best he can with the interests of the whole country by the exercise of a sound discretion and a patriotic will. If he relies wholly upon the voters of his district for the expressed wish of his whole constituency he may err, but not unless the voters are unfaithful representatives of the population behind them. And this is not likely to happen, because men's wishes, when intelligibly made, are found to be with their interests. The vote of the husband is supposed to represent the interests of his wife, and so the father those of his children, and these aggregated make up the public weal, commonwealth, or respublica; and that Government which is founded and administered upon this principle is republican in form within the meaning of our Constitution. True, it may happen that these results will not always follow, and that while a Government may be republican in form it may not be wholly so in substance; yet this would be an exception that would prove the correctness of the general principle.

HO. OF REPS.

Amendment of the Constitution—Mr. Julian.

Now, let us turn again to the principles embraced in the proposed amendment and see how they square with those upon which our Government is founded. You propose to withdraw the whole colored population and substitute in lieu thereof only the white population of the District as the basis of representation. Let us apply this rule to the State of South Carolina, and, for the purposes of illustration, assume that the whole population of that State is equally divided between the races, white and black. Under the Constitution as it is members of Congress are apportioned to the whole population, and they are represented accordingly. This you change, and allow only the white population to form the basis of representation. Unless the voters of this class of persons extend the elective franchise to the negroes, one half of the entire population is at once proscribed from being represented. The ordinary ratio of voters is to the whole population as one is to five, and hence only one half of the whole population would be represented; and this is gravely proposed, so that the guarantee of the Constitution to that State of a government republican in form may be made good for all time to come. Are these voters, who are but one tenth of the population, and who are, by the express terms of this amendment, separated in interest from, and made wholly independent of, the other five tenths, regarded with their white constituency as the Commonwealth of South Carolina—the res publica? If not, then your amendment will force upon that State a government that is not republican in form. Is not this plucking up the tares to the entire destruction of the wheat?

And let me again remark, that the principle being the same for all the States, its application will be the same except as to the extent of the proscription. And as to the southern States, gentlemen say they have their remedy. Let them make their negroes voters and the rule will not operate so harshly upon them. Will they do it? And if not who will be the sufferers, they or the negroes? Were I a southern man, I am very free to say that I would do no such thing. I would sooner extend the elective franchise to all white male inhabitants, naturalized and unnaturalized, without either property or tax qualification, and by this means I would swell the basis of representation by inviting to those States the whole tide of European immigration.

By this means I would hold the poisoned chalice to the lips of those who would prepare it for and present it to me, and then we would have the northern States sheltering themselves behind the very same obnoxious remedy that they are trying to force upon those of the South. The consequences of this course are so inevitable that I am forced to the conclusion that gentlemen are either unconscious of what they are doing or that this is one of the means by which they intend to force negro suffrage upon the North as well as South, as it is—

Provided, That whenever the elective franchise shall be denied or abridged in any State on account of race or color, all persons of such race or color shall be excluded from the basis of representation.

What would be its effect in Pennsylvania? Take the fourteenth district, in which is the city of Harrisburg, and which, like all capital towns, has a large negro population. Unless the negroes were made voters that district would have to be enlarged to a greater area to embrace a sufficient population to entitle it to a member; and so the people of that district would be shorn of their representation here. And so of the Chester district, where a large Quaker population has drawn together a large population of negroes. The people of these and similar districts would be compelled to either suffer in their representation or coin voters out of negro material.

Are gentlemen prepared to introduce so great an innovation upon the American system of self-government? Our fathers took their stand between an absolute democracy on the one hand and a class aristocracy on the other, and they did this by making our Government a representative democracy, having for its basis the whole population of the country consenting to be so governed.

I know not what others may do or prefer to do, but as for myself, the form of Government handed down to us by the fathers is good enough for me. As an American citizen I accept the inheritance in the form it is given, and acknowledge the patriotic obligation resting upon us all that we should not alter or change it in any material way, but transmit it to our posterity unimpaired, to be perpetuated forever.

Holding these views and being governed by these motives, I shall steadily oppose all amendments to the Constitution which tend to alter the fundamental principles upon which it is based. Rather than adopt these alterations as amendments I would enlarge the constitutional oath to be administered to all Federal officers so as to require them, like the President, to obligate themselves not only to support the Constitution of the United States, but to protect and defend it from all revolutionary reformers from within, as well as open and avowed enemies from without.

Sir, let me appeal to this House and to the country that this is not a proper period in our political history to make these great alterations. Let us be forewarned and admonished of the great danger that always attends hasty and inconsiderate legislation, and most especially that kind of legislation that becomes from its supreme and irrepealable character the fundamental law of the land. Changes are not always reforms, and this is no time to make experiments. Our fathers waited many years after the close of the war and their independence was acknowledged before they undertook to form a more perfect Union and Government, and the great growth and prosperity of our country bear everlasting witness to the wisdom of their course. Let the passions and the excitements that lashed the skies in one vast blaze of fury and frenzy have ample time to cool, so that whatever we may do will be done in a spirit of true patriotism and love for the whole country, and not in that miserable spirit of sectional and partisan interest, envy, jealousy, hatred, and revenge that seems to pervade these propositions to alter, by way of amendment, the very foundations upon which our American system of government is laid.

Let us do this, and our country will remain the pride and glory of our race, a home and an asylum for the oppressed of all lands, and our form of Government a model for the whole world. Let us do this, and our names will be held in grateful remembrance by generations yet unborn.

Amendment of the Constitution.

SPEECH OF HON. G. W. JULIAN,

OF INDIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 29, 1866.

The House having under consideration the joint resolution reported by the committee on reconstruction for the amendment of the Constitution of the United States—

Mr. JULIAN said:

Mr. SPEAKER: Before this debate shall be concluded I desire to submit some observations which I deem important, and which I respectfully commend to the consideration of those who advocate the proposition reported by the joint committee of fifteen. How I shall finally cast my vote on that proposition I cannot now certainly decide. I find difficulties in my path; and I shall feel much obliged to any gentleman who may be able and willing to clear them away, and thus, perhaps, assist others on this floor in reaching a just conclusion. I should regret exceedingly to separate myself from those with whom I habitually act here, by opposing the measure referred to, and I must not do so without recording my reasons; and these reasons, in so far as they possess weight, may serve as my protest against whatever is objectionable in that measure, should its modification be found impracticable, and I should finally give it my support as the best thing within our power.

Under the constitutional injunction upon the United States to guaranty a republican form of government to every State, I believe the power already exists in the nation to regulate the right of suffrage. It can only exercise this power through Congress; and Congress, of course, must decide what is a republican form of government, and when the national authority shall interpose against State action, for the purpose of executing the constitutional guarantee. No one will deny the authority of Congress to decide that if a State should disfranchise one third, one half, or two thirds of her citizens, such State would cease to be republican, and might be required to accept a different rule of suffrage. If Congress could intervene in such a case, it could obviously intervene in any other case in which it might deem it necessary or proper. It certainly might decide that the disfranchisement by a State of a whole race of people within her borders is inconsistent with a republican form of government, and in their behalf, and in the execution of its own authority and duty, restore them to their equal right with others to the franchise. It might decide, for example, that in North Carolina, where 631,000 citizens disfranchise 331,000, the government is not republican, and should be made so by extending the franchise. It might do the same in Virginia, where 719,000 citizens disfranchise 533,000; in Alabama, where 596,000 citizens disfranchise 437,000; in Georgia, where 591,000 citizens disfranchise 465,000; in Louisiana, where 357,000 citizens disfranchise 350,000; in Mississippi, where 353,000 citizens disfranchise 436,000; and in South Carolina, where only 291,000 citizens disfranchise 411,000. Can any man who reverences the Constitution deny either the authority or the duty of Congress to do all this in the execution of the guarantee named? Or if the 411,000 negroes in South Carolina were to organize a government, and disfranchise her 291,000 white citizens, would anybody doubt the authority of Congress to pronounce such government anti-republican, and secure the ballot equally to white and black citizens as the remedy? Or if a State should prescribe as a qualification for the ballot such an ownership of property, real or personal, as would disfranchise the great body of her people, could not Congress most undoubtedly interfere? So of an educational test, which might fix the standard of knowledge so high as to place the governing power in the hands of a select few. The power in all such cases is a reserved one in Congress, to be exercised according to its own judgment, with no accountability to any tribunal save the people; and without such power the nation would be at the mercy of as many oligarchies as there are States. Nationality would only be possible by the permission of the States.

The same authority, Mr. Speaker, is claimed by eminent jurists under the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery, and giving Congress the power, by "appropriate legislation," to "enforce" the provision. The word "appropriate" appeals to legislative discretion, and the word "enforce" implies such compulsory measures as Congress may deem "appropriate" for the purpose of ridding the country of every vestige of slavery, in form and in fact. "There can be no denial," said Chief Justice Parsons not long since, "that when this whole amendment shall be adopted Congress will have the constitutional power—be its exercise of this power wise or unwise—to rend slavery out from our whole country, root and branch, leaf and fruit, and guard effectually against its return in any form, or under any guise, or to any extent." The nation, in other words, having given freedom to four million people, can make that freedom a blessing by conferring it in substance, as well as in name. It not only can do this, but is sacredly bound to do it. The right to freedom carries with it the right of way to it, and that right of way is the ballot. Without it the freedom of these people is a delusion and a lie.

Amendment of the Constitution—Mr. Julian.

The freedmen of the South are not free, and cannot be, when left to the domination of their former masters, exasperated by their defeat in a war which outraged civilization by thus aiming to perpetuate their rule. I need not argue this proposition, because no man can dispute it without ignoring the most obvious principles of human nature, and closing his eyes to well-authenticated facts of recent occurrence in the island of Jamaica and in the States lately in revolt. Sir, every gentleman on this floor knows what a shadow and a mockery is the freedom thus far vouchsafed to the millions now declared free by the Constitution, and that to commit their fortunes to the tender mercies of white rebels would be like committing the lamb to the jaws of the wolf. But if I am right, then Congress could unquestionably place the ballot in the hands of the loyal freedmen, and thus arm them with the power of self-defense, and save them from a condition of pitiless serfdom, in comparison with which slavery in its old form would be a blessing. I ask gentlemen, therefore, to remember, that should every proposed amendment of the Constitution now before this House be voted down, we shall not, I think, be wholly without a remedy for the evil we are so anxious to cure. Instead of restricting representation to actual suffrage, we can extend suffrage to actual representation, which will be far better. It is true that the power of Congress to guaranty republican governments in the States through its intervention with the question of suffrage has not hitherto been exercised; but this certainly does not disprove the existence of such power, nor the expediency of its exercise now, under an additional and independent constitutional grant, and when a fit occasion for it has come through the madness of treason. It will not be forgotten that we have entered upon a new dispensation. Slavery sleeps in its bloody shroud. Its shaping hand, as we believe, will no longer mold our national policy at home or abroad. Its evil genius will no longer inspire our public men, and give law to the nation from the supreme bench; but in the noonday radiance of universal liberty the Government, I trust, in all its departments, will find its speedy deliverance from the trammels of the past. Such, at least, is my hope.

But, Mr. Speaker, I may be mistaken. We may not be able, at a single bound, to escape the benumbing influence of slavery. Our exodus from the long and sore bondage of the past may be tedious and toilsome. Our dwarfed manhood may require time and judicious tonics to restore its original vigor. I cannot feel at all confident in the opinion I have expressed, when I find so many distinguished gentlemen on this floor insisting that we are still bound by former interpretations of the Constitution, in the interest of slavery. I therefore favor a constitutional amendment which shall make certain that which may otherwise remain doubtful. But I do not see how I can consistently support the amendment reported by the joint committee, though I do not say that I will not. In the first place, it seems to me that it offends the moral sense of the country. It provides "that whenever the elective franchise shall be denied or abridged in any State on account of race or color, all persons of such race or color shall be excluded from the basis of representation." Sir, what right has any State "to deny or abridge the elective franchise on account of race or color?" To assent to such a proposition is to insult humanity and mock justice. It is, moreover, as absurd as to deny or abridge the franchise on account of the distance across the Atlantic or the height of the Alleghanies. Why not say, in the plain affirmative words of the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ELIOT,] that—

"The elective franchise shall not be denied or abridged in any State on account of race or color?"

The distinguished chairman of the joint committee concedes the right of a State under the Constitution to disfranchise its citizens for such cause, and so does my friend from New York, [Mr. CONKLING.] If they are right, then the very thing to be done is to amend the Constitution in that particular. Have we any authority to sacrifice the rights of a whole race in the South in order to save ourselves from the evils of unequal representation, and thus compound with injustice and oppression? Will the world justify us in protecting our own political rights and abridging the rights of white rebels at the expense of millions of freedmen who will thus be made the vicarious victims of our policy? Would that be an honest payment of the debt we religiously owe them? My friend from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] differs with his colleagues on the joint committee as to the right of a State to disfranchise her citizens, and defends the proposed amendment as a mere penalty designed to restrain the States from violating their constitutional duty.

Mr. BINGHAM. I do not admit and never have admitted that any State has a right to disfranchise any portion of the citizens of the United States, resident therein, entitled to vote for Representatives under the second section of the first article of the Constitution, except as a punishment for their own crimes. A citizen may forfeit his right by crime, and the State may enforce that forfeiture. I favor this amendment as a penalty in aid of the rights guaranteed by the Constitution as it now stands.

Mr. JULIAN. The gentleman misunderstands what I said. I have just stated what the gentleman from Ohio now affirms, that he defends the amendment reported by the committee as a mere penalty intended to restrain the States from striking down the rights of their citizens under the Constitution; but as we are now endeavoring to amend the Constitution, why incorporate in it a mere penalty against its violation, which at least seems to imply the right to violate it, if the penalty shall be accepted? Since the whole policy of the Government from its beginning has yielded the right of the southern States to disfranchise their people of color, why not provide a positive prohibition of such right? Mr. Madison declared it to be wrong "to admit in the Constitution the idea that there can be property in man." So I say it seems to me wrong to admit in this amendment the idea that the rights of the citizen can be taken away by reason of color or race, and that in perfecting the organic law of the nation we should avoid any phraseology which by any possibility would admit a construction so fatal to the fundamental principle of all free government. Why temporize by adopting halfway measures and a policy of indirection? The shortest distance between two given points is a straight line. Let us follow it, in so important a work as amending the Constitution. The advocates of the proposed amendment do not profess to be satisfied with it. They confess that it comes short of its purpose. They say they have another proposition in reserve which will cover the whole ground. Then why not bring it forward and let us meet it on its merits? Why yield any longer to the policy of compromise? Sir, remembering the mistakes of our fathers in the beginning, and the frightful legacy to their children which has been the result, let us be warned against any short-sighted and temporary expedients to-day. Let us bring ourselves face to face with the great demand of the nation upon us, and then appeal to the people to sanction a plain, unambiguous amendment of the Constitution, which we believe to be necessary for their future security.

But the advocates of this measure, while promising us a better, frankly tell us it is the best we can now hope to secure. They defend it on this ground, and insist that our present alternative is between its adoption, and the representation of four million loyal colored people in Congress by ex-rebels, who would utterly misrepresent their wishes and trample down their rights. To this several answers are obviously suggested.

In the first place, how do you know that the broad proposition I advocate will fail in Congress, or before the people? These are revolutionary days. Whole generations of common time are now crowded into the span of a few years. Life was never before so grand and blessed an opportunity. The man mistakes his reckoning, who judges either the present or the future by any political almanac of bygone years. Growth, development, progress, are the expressive watchwords of the hour. Who can remember the marvelous events of the past four years, necessitated by the late war, and then predict the failure of further measures, woven into the same fabric, and born of the same inevitable logic? It is only a few days since this nation, speaking through its Representatives on this floor, by a vote of 116 against 54, deliberately sanctioned the very policy I urge as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States. Sir, if that policy is right in this District, shall we decline to extend it over the districts lately in revolt where far stronger reasons plead for it? Shall we distrust the people, who have been so ready to second all radical measures during the war, and now speak with such emphasis on emerging, with newly anointed vision, from its terrible baptism of fire and blood? And besides, how do you know, Mr. Speaker, that even the proposition reported by the committee can prevail, either in Congress or in the States? It encounters, I know, a very considerable opposition here, and I sincerely hope it may be recommitted and amended. It may encounter a greater opposition in the States. Its indirect mode of reaching a desirable result, and its apparent recognition of the infernal heresy of State sovereignty, may seriously endanger, if not totally defeat, the proposition. Sir, I hope this suggestion will not be deemed unworthy of consideration. But the question, after all, is, what amendment of the Constitution, if any, is really demanded? If we can agree as to this, then we should submit it, trusting in God, in the people, and in the great educational forces now everywhere at work, that it will prevail. Should it fail for a season, it will triumph ultimately, and in the end repay all the cost of its delay. Neither constitutional amendments nor reforms in any other direction could make much headway, if no man should ever espouse them till the people are found prepared to accept them without opposition or dissent.

Again, Mr. Speaker, it should not be forgotten that the proposed amendment, should it prevail, must fail of its purpose till after the census of 1870. If I am not mistaken, there could be no new allotment of Representatives among the southern States prior to that time. If I am mistaken, and the Constitution will permit us to take another census whenever we choose, it will not make any practical difference, as no one proposes that measure, and if adopted the reapportionment under the new census could not take effect sooner than the time I have named. In all these intervening years, therefore, these rebel States must have their full representation under the existing basis, or else their Representatives must be kept out of Congress. If they should be admitted, prior to the passage of the amendment, there would be no coercive authority in the hands of the Executive or Congress to constrain any State to ratify the amendment, and it could not be ratified. If the southern Representatives should not be admitted, then the evils of unequal representation would be avoided, so long as they are kept out. The object of the amendment, therefore, namely, the reduction of rebel representation in Congress and the extension of suffrage to the whole people of the South, could not be secured before the year 1870, or 1872, if the next census shall be taken at the regular time; and then it would remain for the southern States to say whether they would give the ballot to the negroes, or still cling to that unchristian spirit of caste and lust of power which have so long been the higher law of the South. If I am correct in making these statements, much of the alleged practical significance of the proposed amendment is made to disappear, and we are thus the better prepared to demand the amendment, really necessary and effective, or else such congressional action as shall grant suffrage to the people of the South, irrespective of color. Should both these measures for the present be found impracticable, I do not see that any great interest of the country will suffer in consequence, while the regular march of events and the great tidal force of public opinion will at length open the way for such action, in some form, as shall be required by the national exigency.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I deny that the rebels of the South, who are the rulers of the South, would grant the ballot to the negro if the proposed amendment were now in full force. They would not do it, because their love of domination, their contempt for free labor, and their scorn of an enslaved and downtrodden race are as intense as ever. They hate the negro now, not simply as the ally of the Yankee in foiling their treason, but as the author of all their misfortunes, who, having been villainously misused by them, is of course villainously despised. They hate him with a rancor that feeds unceasingly upon every memory of their humiliation and defeat. They confront him with a hatred so remorseless, withering, consuming, that it crops out to-day in every quarter of the South, in deeds of outrage, violence, and crime, which find no parallel even in the atrocities practiced in that section under the old codes of slavery, which were codes of murder and all minor crimes. Can any gentleman read the late report of General Schurz, and listen to the testimony of the great cloud of concurring witnesses whose voices are now filling the land, respecting the popular feeling in the South, and then believe that the rebel class will ever, under any inducements, voluntarily give equal political rights to the freedmen? The leaders of southern opinion openly declare that they would rather die than give the ballot to their former slaves. While it would give their section an increased representation in Congress, that representation would be secured by the votes of negroes, and abolitionists, whose darling purpose would be to Yankeeize and abolitionize the entire South, and put the old slave dynasty hopelessly under their feet. And the old slave dynasty understands this perfectly. They know that negro suffrage, by checking rebel rapacity and restoring order, and thus rendering emigration from the North and from Europe a safe and practicable thing, will reorganize the whole structure of society in their region, and thus doom their pride and sloth to a hopeless conflict with the energy and enterprise of free labor. Do you tell me that men are governed by their own interests, and that the ruling class in the South, finding no other way to serve those interests, will extend suffrage to the negroes? I answer, that long-cherished and traditional prejudices and passions are stronger than interest. It was always the true interest of the South to abolish her slavery, but she waged a horrid war to save and eternize it. She could always have increased her power in Congress by its abolition, but she loved her domination over the negro more than she loved political power. It was the interest of the northern States, long ago, to unite in checking the aggressions and the further spread of slavery in the Union, and thereby to hasten the employment of peaceable measures in the South for its abandonment; but the northern States, on the contrary, became the allies of the slave breeders in fortifying and extending their rule on this continent. It was the interest of our first parents not to sin, but the devil proved too much for them. Sir, the argument of interest will not do. Passion is stronger than interest, because, being blind, it does not perceive the best good. Before I agree to intrust the freedmen to the interest of their old masters, I want to know that they understand what their interest is, and that they have so far outlived their prejudices that they will follow it. I think no gentleman on this floor can feel sure on these points. What we want, what the nation needs for its own salvation, is a constitutional amendment, or a law of Congress, which shall guaranty the ballot to the freedman of the South. This is not simply his equal political right as a citizen, but his natural right as a man. As I have argued on another occasion, a voice in the Government which deals with property, liberty, and life, is not a "privilege," but a right, and as natural, as indefeasible as the right to life itself. Government cannot rightfully withhold it, but is as sacredly bound to secure it to all men, regardless of race or color, as it is bound to secure other rights which are accorded to them by common consent as natural. In this view I am very glad to find myself sustained by some of the ablest men in this House. Our fathers affirmed, as a self-evident truth, that all men are endowed by their Creator with the right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; and that Governments are instituted among men to secure these rights, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed. Sir, let us not shrink from the practical vindication of this truth. Let us recognize no such anomaly in our free system of government as a disfranchised citizen, innocent of crime, but prize the franchise as so sacred that a man without it shall everywhere, and of necessity, wear the brand of a convicted enemy of society. Let us not preach a mere lip-democracy, while we confess by our acts, our faith in the maxims of despotism. Let us not, with the warnings of the past before us, still continue to deny the very gospel of our political salvation, and arm the absolutists of the Old World with weapons fatal to every just theory of republicanism. Let us not make enemies and outlaws of four million people, among whom no traitor or sympathizer with treason has ever yet been found; who were eager to help us from the very beginning of our struggle, and as soon as we were ready gladly furnished nearly two hundred thousand soldiers to aid in saving the nation's life; and who, if allowed justice at our hands, will be found in the future, as they have been in the past, our effective auxiliaries and most faithful friends. Above all, let us remember, for our own sake as well as that of the colored race, that justice is omnipotent; that her demands must be met to the uttermost farthing, and cannot be slighted without offending the Most High; and that if, when our pathway is lighted up by the fires of a stupendous civil war, which the whole world interprets as the avenger of these wronged millions, we now turn a deaf ear to their cries, our guilt as a nation, and our retribution, will find no precedent in the annals of mankind.

Basis of Representation.

SPEECH OF HON. JOHN L. THOMAS,

OF MARYLAND,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 31, 1866,

On the proposition to amend the Constitution of the United States, apportioning representation.

Mr. J. L. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, the discussion of the propositions from the committee on reconstruction to amend the Constitution of the United States has developed such a variety of opinion that it is with great difficulty we can estimate the value of either of them, or determine which one should receive our assent. That the altered condition of our country requires reform in our fundamental law, none but those on the other side of the House deny. That we have not only the power under the Constitution to alter and amend that instrument, but that it is our imperative duty to do so, all candid, patriotic men must admit.

To be sure it has been asserted that now is not the time, nor this body the proper medium, by and through which our organic law should be changed. It is insisted that we should wait till the States lately in rebellion are represented on this floor, so that they be heard and consulted as to what is agreeable to them to be put in the Constitution. Sir, I am afraid if we wait for the return of our "erring sisters," who departed from this House at a time and under circumstances not well calculated to legislate for the good of the Union, that we will find that but one constitutional amendment could have any chance of receiving their votes, and that one the repeal of section three article three of the Constitution.

Such reasons as these, Mr. Speaker, are but the special and dilatory pleadings of astute advocates, determined to resist all and any effort to reconstruct the rebel States on any principle save an unconditional surrender of all the great results flowing from this war.

For myself, I have too little faith in the professions of loyalty on the part of the leading men of the States lately in rebellion to be induced to put off till to-morrow that which reason and justice and a sound policy demands should be done to-day.

The fathers of the Republic and the founders of the Constitution had no conception at the time they formed that instrument that their children could become so wicked as, in the short space of three score years and ten, to fill the land with slaughter and blood in striving to tear down their handiwork. They made no provisions to meet the great changes that have been occasioned by this rebellion.

We find that even the First Congress, that met at the city of New York on the 4th of March, 1789, proposed twelve amendments to the Constitution, all of which were ratified by the States except the first and second proposed to them. We find that at the first session of the Third Congress another amendment was proposed, and at the first session of the Eighth Congress still another, all of which were ratified by the several States. So that it will be seen that so far from our proposed action being a "new thing," our predecessors, many of whom were members of the Convention that framed the Constitution, added to and altered as the times and the occasions demanded. If they had not have acted thus, some of the most valuable powers given to the Government, and some of the most precious retained by the States, would not this day be in existence.

Alexander Hamilton, in his introduction to the Federalist, makes this just reflection, which, I think, is peculiarly appropriate at this time:

"It has been frequently remarked that it has been reserved to the people of this country to decide by their conduct and example whether societies of men are really capable or not of establishing good government from reflection and choice, or whether they are forever destined to depend for their political constitution on accident and force. If there be any truth in the remark, the crisis at which we are arrived may with propriety be regarded as the period when that decision is to be made; and a wrong election of the part we shall act may in this view deserve to be considered as the general misfortune of mankind."

I am not of a nature inclined to indulge in gloomy forebodings, nor to think that "all is lost that is in danger." Nor am I at all gifted with an imagination that will allow me to picture "a land flowing with milk and honey" when I see before me nothing but sand and barrenness. Judging from the official accounts we have received from our southern borders, I cannot think that "peace yet reigns supreme," or that "grim-visaged war hath smoothed his wrinkled front," except in so far as the legions of Sherman and Grant would indicate by their having gone to their homes and rested from their labor. The war, to be sure, is over; but there is another battle yet to be fought. Our brave soldiers did not fail in meeting the demands of the country when they faced the cannon's mouth and braved death and starvation to preserve what we enjoy to-day, and we would be recreants and cowards were we to fail in comprehending the great results of this war, and not come up like men and patriots to meet the demands of the hour.

Basis of Representation—Mr. Thomas.

HO. OF REPS.

Judging the South by some people in my own State, I am inclined to believe that rebellion only "sleepeth" and is not dead. I have no unkind words for any man, and would rather forget the past than to recount it; but when I see men in my own State who, in the hours that tried true men's souls, proved faithless in their loyalty and used all of their influence to induce the people of my State to take up arms against the Government, men who have been incarcerated as traitors to their country, men who rejoiced at every Federal reverse and lamented at every Federal victory—when I see men like these, I say, arrogantly and imperiously demanding that they should participate in the affairs of the Government, and that Union men, who have stood the test of loyalty and have sacrificed friends and social ties and kindred for their country, should hand over what they have preserved to such as sought to destroy them, I begin to think it is time for "the watchmen on the towers of freedom" to keep a sharp eye and a steady hand on such as are beyond the Potomac.

As God knows my heart, I have no bitterness of feeling toward the people of the South. Some of the dearest kindred I have on earth are there, and buried beneath her soil sleep the remains of all that have gone of my flesh and blood. There is no one more desirous than I am that the enmities of this war should be forever buried, that its animosities should be forgotten, and that the people of these States should be bound together by the golden chains of love. No one will go further than I shall to accomplish it.

But, sir, I remember that I have a duty to perform to the future. What has happened once may happen again; and unless we of to-day make up our minds to so build up that which has been torn down, as that the causes that produced the rebellion shall be forever blotted out, and the active agents in them disqualified from hereafter participating in our national affairs, we will leave to our children the same legacy that our fathers left to us.

When these propositions were first submitted I was disinclined to vote for any of them, and especially when the distinguished chairman of the committee undertook, Joshua like, to stop the sun in his diurnal course, when he stated that these resolutions should be passed upon before the going down of the sun. But, sir, after I had examined the subject carefully, I became satisfied that the sooner they were disposed of the better for the peace and quiet of the whole country.

It appears to me, Mr. Speaker, that slavery having been abolished, the basis of representation, as fixed upon by the Constitution, is not only meaningless, but, if suffered to remain there, will work the grossest injustice, and result in permanent injury to the interests of our country hereafter. I cannot close my eyes to the fact that fifty-seven disloyal Representatives and twenty-two disloyal Senators are quite enough to "clog the wheels of Government," and be able in after time to produce a revolution, peaceful, it may be, but as disastrous to the loyal States as the war has been to the South.

That this clause was inserted in the interests of slavery is apparent by reference to the debates of the Convention that framed the Constitution, and more particularly by reference to the remarks of Charles C. Pinckney in the convention of the State of South Carolina. He says, page 355 Elliot, volume three:

"As we have found it necessary to give very extensive powers to the Federal Government, both over the persons and estates of the citizens, we thought it right to draw one branch of the Legislature immediately from the people, and that both wealth and numbers should be considered in the representation. We were at a loss for some time for a rule to ascertain the proportionate wealth of the States. At last we thought that the productive labor of the inhabitants was the best rule for ascertaining their wealth. In conformity to this rule, joined to a spirit of concession, we determined that Representatives should be apportioned among the several States by adding to the whole number of free persons three fifths of the slaves. We thus obtained a representation for our property, and I confess I did not expect that we had conceded too much to the eastern States, when they allowed us a representation for a species of property which they have not among them.

"The numbers in the different States, according to the most accurate accounts we could obtain, were:

New Hampshire.....	102,000
Massachusetts.....	360,000
Rhode Island.....	58,000
Connecticut.....	202,000
New York.....	238,000
New Jersey.....	188,000
Pennsylvania.....	360,000
Delaware.....	37,000
Maryland (including three fifths of 80,000 negroes).....	218,000
Virginia (including three fifths of 280,000 negroes).....	420,000
North Carolina (including three fifths of 60,000 negroes).....	200,000

It will be seen from this that the three-fifths rule was to represent the slave property, and nothing else. The slave property having now become changed by the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery, no State of this Union is any longer entitled to have a representation for what does not and cannot by the terms of the same Constitution have any existence.

This being the case, the question is now presented, what basis shall be proposed to the States for their ratification or rejection?

I always considered that representation according to population was the best and most certain way of apportionment. I see a great many difficulties in basing representation on voting population, unless you say at the same time that the qualification for electors shall be uniform in all the States, so as to prevent one State from manufacturing a class of voters that another State would refuse to have; and yet I do not see how this can be done unless you give the power to Congress to regulate by general law the qualification of voters for each State. This I am opposed to, for the reason that it would be depriving the States of one of their most precious rights, and at the same time give to Congress a power that would be dangerous in its application. To have representation based on voting population would be most unjust to such of the loyal border States as were compelled to ingraft clauses in their constitutions preventing such of its citizens as were engaged in rebellion against the Government from exercising the elective franchise. Maryland and Missouri are perhaps the only States that have laws to exclude this class of disloyal persons. Kentucky, I believe, had one, but repealed it; and the repeal of that law by Kentucky has been a warning to Union men in my State to let it remain as it is until rebels learn to breathe a spirit of loyalty to the Government. Strenuous efforts are now being made in my State to repeal that law; and public meetings have been held, bold and defiant resolutions passed, and petitions circulated and signed by all the rebels and rebel sympathizers in the State, asking the Legislature to restore them to their rights, which they say the Union men deprived them of.

Here is one of a number of the resolutions lately passed at a meeting of these men in Baltimore, which will show the kind of reasoning they resort to in demanding their rights:

"This convention, after having carefully deliberated, and having ascertained what enlightened public sentiment demands, now express their profound conviction that it is the duty of the Legislature, at its present session, to repeal the registration law passed in March last, which has brought inquisitorial power, in its most odious and irresponsible form, to the fireside of our citizens; which compels every man to give evidence against himself, under oath, as to the utterance even of his private thoughts and sentiments within the sacred circle of his own family, and which, whether he confess or refuses to swear, equally declares him degraded; which offers a premium to perjury and corruption, and imposes penalties only upon the conscientious and the truthful.

"They further declare that the fourth section of the first article of the constitution relating to the qualification of voters, and prescribing a test oath for them, and the seventh section of the same article prescribing a retrospective test oath for all State officers, are repugnant to the spirit of the constitution of the United States and to our own declaration of rights, and that it is the duty of the present Legislature to pass an amendment of the constitution according to the terms of the eleventh article of that instrument, abrogating those odious and anti-republican provisions, and to submit that amendment to the people at the next general election for ratification. And, as a measure of immediate relief, this convention also declares that the Legislature ought to pass an act, in conformity to the provisions of the constitution, restoring to his full rights of citizenship every one who is deprived of this by the terms of the fourth section of the first article of the constitution."

Be it remembered, too, that some of these men are the descendants of the soldiers of the "old Maryland line," whose contemporaries passed laws to better secure the Government, and to prevent the men who refused to aid our revolutionary sires from participating in the affairs of Government.

Here is an act passed by the General Assembly of Maryland, October, 1777:

"Whereas in every State allegiance and protection are reciprocal, and no man is entitled to the one who refuses to yield to the other; and as every inhabitant of this State enjoys the protection and benefit of the government and laws thereof, and as it is reasonable that any person should give testimony of his attachment and fidelity to this State and the present government thereof as now established: Therefore,

"Be it enacted, &c., That every free male person within this State above eighteen years of age, unless a Quaker, &c., shall, on or before the 1st day of March, take, repeat, and subscribe the oath of fidelity and support to this State, contained in the act entitled 'An act to punish certain crimes,' &c."

The following is the oath referred to:

"I will be true and faithful to the State of Maryland, and will, to the utmost of my power, support, maintain, and defend the freedom and independence thereof, and the government as now established, against all open enemies and secret and traitorous conspiracies, and will use my utmost endeavors to disclose and make known to the Governor or some one of the judges or justices thereof all treasons or traitorous conspiracies, attempts or combinations against the State or the government thereof, which may come to my knowledge. So help me God."

And it will be found by reference to another section of the law that every person neglecting to take the oath was not only "mulct" in heavy damages, but forever disqualified from holding any office:

"SEC. 10. That every person neglecting shall, for and during life, in all public and county assessments, pay a tax twice the tax which, by such public and county assessments, shall be imposed upon every £100 worth of real or personal property within this State, and so pro rata, which said tax shall be paid, collected, and levied, &c."

"SEC. 17. That every person chargeable with the treble tax aforesaid shall be forever disabled and rendered incapable to practice the law, physic, or surgery, or the art of an apothecary, or to preach or teach the Gospel, or to teach in public or private schools, or to hold or exercise within this State any office of profit or trust, civil or military, or to vote at any election of electors or senators, or delegates to the House of Delegates, and, if any such person shall offend against this act in any of the particulars above specified, he shall, for every such offense, forfeit and pay £5 for every £100 of property he shall be deemed worth on the public assessment of all property within this State."

Thousands of these men were disfranchised after they had left a State that, thank God, was true to the Union, and had joined the enemies of the country, to fight your sons and brothers in maintaining the Union. Is it for such men as these, who desecrated the soil of Maryland at Antietam and at South Mountain, and who carried devastation and ruin in their track, despoiling our fields and despoiling our homes—is it for such men to dictate to the people of Maryland when and how and to what extent they shall be allowed to vote? Is it for the men familiarly known and commonly called the "rebel Legislature at Frederick," who for their direct complicity in rebellion were taken military possession of by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS,] and placed where their "bills of safety" and their "resolutions of sympathy" and their "protests" against arbitrary arrests could do the country no harm—is it for such as they to again influence the destinies of my State? Let others act as they may, for one I shall never consent that such men shall be enfranchised till the foundations of this Government have been so firmly established as that no man once tainted with treason can ever exert any influence in unsettling it.

But, sir, the most mortifying thing to me, as a Union man and a Marylander, is the fact that prominent men in my State—men who once held high positions in the Union ranks, and who have been honored by the loyal masses with their confidence—are found leagued with these rebels and rebel sympathizers in obtaining a repeal of the clause in our constitution disfranchising them on account of their disloyalty. To say that the Union people of Maryland hold in utter abhorrence such men is not to express half of the indignation that is felt at the unholy alliance they have made; and I venture to assert that these disfranchised rebels, who are now using them as their pliant tools, will, so soon as their work has been finished, cast them adrift as no longer worthy to associate with "southern chivalry." Prominent among these "constitutional reformers" is one who, failing to become the leader of the Union element, has sought for prominence among those who hate him as cordially as they love, or rather feign to admire, his treason to his party. They are dupes enough to believe that that gentleman can make their "calling and election sure." In a speech which he lately made to the "anti-registration convention" he thus discourses:

"The President of the United States has said that we must trust the people with their Government. [Applause.] That is the principle I go upon. And when we have got to the period when we cannot trust the people with their Government, there is an end of the nature of government. And he applies that to the southern States where the rebellion has been existing, and where all men, whether they concurred in the original policy of secession or were drawn into it by their sympathies with their brethren, have been or still are arrayed against the Government. He says to his fellow-citizens, 'You must trust those men with the management of their local governments and give them their share in the affairs of the General Government.' A fortiori, if this can be said of the southern rebellious States, it can be said of the State of Maryland. And yet, here in Maryland, by the process taken here, more than one half of her stalwart population are denied a share in the Government of the country. Everybody agrees that our troubles are over—General Grant, General Sherman, Governor Andrew, in a late message to the members of the General Assembly of Massachusetts. And let me tell you here that I have great respect for Governor Andrew. He is one of the sincere men of the country. He says that everybody in the South has upheld the sentiments of secession, but that it is a thing of the past. That is the sentiment of the men who have mingled in the war and the disinterested men who have looked on from a distance. Why, then, are our people here and there to be disfranchised? It is for the object of possessing political power [loud applause and hissing] in defiance of the political principle which underlies our whole form of Government; that the minority may rule the majority. And they have ulterior objects in view to perpetuate that rule. They do not anticipate that they can keep forever one half of the whole country, or one third of you, my fellow-citizens, from sharing all power in the Government; but they anticipate keeping it so long until they can force into the elements of political power the black race. [Long-continued applause, and cries of 'That's the ideal!']

"That is, to build power over you and over our fifteen southern States, until it is absolute that such elements are introduced into the future history of the country, to be managed by the Freedmen's Bureau, and absolutely controlling the balance of power of the whole of these fifteen States in which that institution has existed. You see that it is a very large scheme, conceived with very great skill, and by very adroit and ambitious men. A little while ago, having this conception of the matter, I felt it my duty to separate myself, in my political action, from the organized forces with whom I had been voting during the war, and to go to that party and help and aid it in bringing the country together—the Democratic party, [enthusiastic cheering:] the Democratic party, which it is charged by the opponents is to be restored to power if these southern States are to have their rights of franchise. If they had no higher motive for exerting themselves in behalf of the southern States, I go with them without regard to their motive, because that is our object, and I want to see it secured. The other side, acting upon the same party interests, seek to keep those States out, because they apprehend they will be voted down. That made a great hurrah among my friends of the Union party in Maryland, that I should presume to have an opinion of my own, and to act upon it in regard to the existing circumstances. Some of the gentlemen with whom I had been associated, some of whom I had been instrumental in electing to Congress, reproached me with having left them and gone to the side of the Democratic party in New York. Well, what have they been doing? They have been voting with the Democrats in the House of Representatives. They have found, what I told them before, that this radical party, which predominates, and under the discipline of old Thad. Stevens, who drives them where he wills, has got the negro as the predominating element to the control of power. Mr. Phelps, and John L. Thomas, jr., and others, who represent the constituencies of Baltimore, have to vote with the Democrats all the time."

Now, sir, in so far as these remarks are applicable to myself, I can only say that this gentleman is the last man on earth that I am indebted to for the position I occupy in this House. On the contrary, it has been asserted that he was the friend of another gentleman who failed to get the nomination of my party. Neither am I aware of having "reproached him for going over to the side of the Democratic party." I never considered that his going over to the Democracy was of any moment, and I do not think his defection will carry along with it any consequences detrimental to the Union party.

As to my voting with the "Democrats all the time," it is not "according to the record." I have never voted for a Democrat in my life, and since I have had the honor to be a member of this body I have found my name recorded on the same side that they supported but once, and that was on the District suffrage bill. Had I the right to vote to-morrow, I would vote the same way and for the same reasons.

Sir, these men who left the State to engage in armed rebellion will find that the Union men of Maryland are not inclined to sell their hard-earned heritage for a mess of pottage. They will discover that there is loyalty enough in the State to prevent its surrender to its enemies, and that he whom they have chosen as their leader will be as successful in deluding the Union party to commit suicide as he was in persuading the people of New York to support John Van Buren & Co.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, I may be pardoned for thus alluding to the affairs of my State; but as the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] basing representation on voting population, would be unjust to the Union people of my State, and, in my opinion, aid directly the efforts now being made to enfranchise the rebellious portion of it, I thought it my duty to allude to it, and at the same time to defend myself from the efforts made by their leader to place me where I do not now, never have, and never expect to belong.

I have said, Mr. Speaker, that population was the most certain way of apportioning representation. I do not see how we can agree on any other plan. To base representation on wealth, or the amount of taxable property in a State, is not right in its theory or just in its practical workings. It would give large representation for wealthy cities, and do an injustice to agricultural districts; and the only feasible plan that has been proposed is the one reported from the committee on reconstruction.

This resolution has been supposed by some to be intended to force negro suffrage on the southern States. If I thought that this was either its intention or would be its effect, I would not support it. I am opposed to negro suffrage at this time, in any manner and any and everywhere, for the reasons fully stated by me in the debate on the District of Columbia bill. I have nothing to take from what I then said. From the language and intention of this proposed amendment, I am satisfied that no southern State will grant the suffrage to the negro. They cannot give a qualified suffrage to the negro for the reason that they make nothing in their increase of representation. They will not give them universal suffrage, because a majority of white men cannot be found in the South willing to place them on the same political level. It leaves it to be settled by each of the States for themselves, and that without any interference by the General Government.

The effect of this amendment will be that the States lately in rebellion will lose ten Representatives in this House.

To illustrate this point more fully, I beg leave to add the following, from the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LAWRENCE,] and which shows the gross inequalities that have existed all along, and will continue to exist, unless this amendment becomes a part of the organic law:

"In 1790 the ratio of representation was one Representative to every thirty-three thousand of the representative population. Now it is one Representative for every one hundred and twenty-seven thousand. On the 23d of May, 1850, the principle was established, for the first time, of limiting the number of Representatives, and thus relieving Congress of the necessity of fixing every ten years the number of members of which the House should consist. This law established the number of Representatives at two hundred and thirty-three, who were to be apportioned among the several States, respectively, by dividing the number of the representative population of the States by the number 233, and the product of this division was to be the ratio of representation. In the slave States three fifths of the slaves were added to the white class to preserve the balance of power. This law of May, 1850, was changed after the apportionment by another law, passed on March 4, 1862. This increased the number of Representatives to two hundred and forty-one, several of the States gaining one member by the change."

"This representation was apportioned among the several States having free and slave population thus:

"The free colored population of the States in 1860 was 476,562, making a total of 31,194,905.

"From this it will be seen that New Hampshire, with a white population of 325,579, has but three Representatives, while Louisiana, with a white population of 357,629, had five. California, with a white population of 323,177, has but three Representatives, while Mississippi, with a similar population of 353,901, had five. In South Carolina, 72,847 white persons had one Representative, while the ratio of representation is one for 127,000 persons.

"Under this mode of apportionment the late slave States had eighteen Representatives by the census of 1860 more than their just share, if based on free population."

So much impressed were the Union men of Maryland of the preponderating influence in the slave counties of the State, that in 1864, when they abolished slavery, we made a new apportionment of representation, which was based exclusively upon the white population, just as it will hereafter be under this amendment in all the late slave States. We did this because we thought it would be unjust to allow the slave counties to have the same representation for their negroes as freedmen as under the old constitution they had for their slaves.

That this is so can be seen by reference to the third section of article three of the constitution of Maryland of 1850, where it says that representation shall be apportioned according to the population of each county, while in the new constitution of 1864, section four of article three provides "that the white population of the State shall constitute the basis of representation."

Under the old constitution the negroes, free and slave, were counted as population. Under the new constitution neither male nor female colored are counted, but the white population exclusively.

By the census of 1860 Maryland contained, as a portion of her population, thirty-nine thousand seven hundred and forty-six free colored males, and forty-four thousand three hundred and thirteen slave males, making in all eighty-four thousand and fifty-nine free colored males. The most of these are contained in what are known as the first and fifth congressional districts of the State, so that, conceding that Maryland would lose one Representative, the loss of that one would cause such a change in the reconstruction of the congressional districts as that the loyal element will be more evenly diffused where the formerly disloyal predominated.

But it is not at all likely that Maryland will lose any Representative, for, so soon as the people of the North find that we are in earnest in our endeavors to place our State on the firm foundations of right, her enterprise and her people will flood in upon us and fill up what may be temporarily occasioned by the operation of this amendment.

This amendment commends itself to my mind in another particular. By the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio, which bases Representatives on the number of male citizens who are allowed to vote in any State, it might have had the effect of forcing the repeal of the law referred to, because as disloyal people are not allowed to vote, neither would they have been counted in the representation.

By the provisions of the amendment of the committee it is only when "the franchise is denied or abridged on account of race or color that all persons of such race or color" are excluded from the basis. Now, we do not exclude such as took part in the rebellion on account of their race or color, but on account of their disloyalty, without regard to race or color, so that all such persons are still counted as a part of the basis just as though they voted.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that I am fully alive to the fact that the vote I am about to give will cause to be heaped upon me all the bitter venom and vile abuse of the secesh press of my city and State. I ask no favors from them and expect none. If I received their friendship I should begin to suspicion that I was not "acting in the strict line of my duty" in standing firm and true to the cause which I expose and which they oppose.

When I consented to run as the candidate of the Union men of my district for this body, I told them that if it became apparent to me that the professions of our southern brethren were not sincere, that they were trying to get back into the Union under false pretenses, that they had the rebel still ranking in their hearts, I would reserve to myself the right, while I took them by the hand, to stand true to my country.

Sir, I am convinced from what has transpired in Virginia and elsewhere, and even in my own State, that the only difference between the men who twelve months ago were defying the constituted authorities is, that then they had arms in their hands and armies in the field, now they have neither, but the disposition to have both; ay, sir, they have the determination to seize hold of the political power, and to use it if possible to punish those who have made them submit to the laws.

I have been too true in my devotion to my country in the past to consent that their unhallowed hands shall again be allowed to seize the helm of the "old ship of state." Four years of carnage and blood has taught me who the friends of the Republic are, and in their hands I hope it may remain.

I do not know, sir, whether my course in this matter will be indorsed by my constituents or my State. If it be, then I shall be gratified to know that the sentiments I have uttered have been the reflex of their loyal feeling. If such be not the case, I shall at least have the proud satisfaction of knowing that my course here to-day has been prompted by no other motive than a conscientious conviction of a duty I owed to my country and to posterity. I would rather retire from these Halls covered all over with the curses and anathemas of the whole people of my State, feeling that I had acted and voted in so reconstructing this Government as that hereafter no power exerted by the South can ever disturb the harmony of the Union, than to receive their praises and hallelujahs, knowing that I had yielded "one jot or tittle" of the full measure of the solemn responsibility expected of every loyal man.

Basis of Representation.

SPEECH OF HON. JOHN HOGAN,

OF MISSOURI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

January 30, 1866,

On the proposition to amend the Constitution of the United States, apportioning representation and taxation.

Mr. HOGAN. Mr. Speaker, this session of Congress has now continued for nearly two months. We have just passed through a war the most terrible in history, one in which immense armies have been gathered and dreadful battles fought. To meet its vast expenditures taxes hitherto unknown in our country have been levied, and for the accomplishment of the great objects had in view the whole people have cheerfully responded to all the vast demands of their Government. Uncomplainingly they have acquiesced in all your measures of excise, tariffs, internal revenue, &c., your issuance of paper credits, and the consequent enhancement of all values, until even the wealthy of your land have found your numerous taxes requiring a full tithe of all their incomes to pay your demands, and the medium and poorer classes are almost absolutely unable to live under their exactions. Yet all these burdens the people of this country have cheerfully borne, feeling that the great object had in view, namely, the preservation of our glorious Constitution, and the Union formed under it, as an inheritance for them and their posterity forever, was worthy of the expenditure; and also because they believed the demands thus made upon them would be but temporary, would soon, with the close of the "war for the Union," cease, and although, from the magnitude of the operations, there would necessarily be a heavy increase of taxation for all time to come, yet there would be some amelioration of its burdens, and those least able to bear it would be freed in some sort from its onerous demands, and they with great propriety looked forward to this Congress, to this Union Congress, having so large a majority of those claiming to be, par excellence, the Union party, the friends of humanity, to do something to reduce the oppressive burdens.

But, sir, during these two months of our session they have looked in vain. There are in this country over twenty million white persons who have been paying the taxes and bearing these burdens of the Government, and the members of this House are their Representatives; and yet they seem to be wholly ignored, not thought of, and no measure for their relief brought forward in this House during all this session.

There are other questions of great and vital interest to very many of the people, which grow legitimately out of the war in which we have been engaged, which demand the attention of this House. Look for a moment at the demands for pensions. Those who were their chief support now lie "beneath the clouds of the valley." Fathers, sons, husbands, fell in the deadly strife, leaving loved ones as dear to them as life, dependent now upon the cold charities of the world. They supposed when their last dying thoughts reverted to the loved ones at home that they would find support from the paternal Government for whose glory and flag and the perpetuation of whose unity they sacrificed life itself. And then, again, look at your multitudes of maimed and disabled and broken-down defenders who are found in all parts of your land suffering, and many of them begging from the passers-by a little pittance to aid in supporting their existence. What are you doing for these multitudes?

I have felt humiliated when, passing through the streets of our large cities, I have been stopped by a maimed veteran wearing the uniform of my country and bearing on his breast the badge of his corps, yet begging each passer-by for something to meet his daily demands. Yet we, the people's Representatives, have wasted precious time without apparently making any effort for relieving either of these most meritorious classes.

Then, again, there is another class that require some consideration. Multitudes of men entered the service of their country in the beginning of the war solely from patriotic motives, firmly believing that their services were required for the safety and perpetuity of their beloved country. They volunteered in its defense. They did not demand or even expect bounties; they left home and family and business and worldly prospects, cheerfully to endure the hardships of a soldier's life, to aid in saving their country from peril. They endured hardship as good soldiers, and for three years and more they labored for the accomplishment of the end they had in view at the beginning, the "preservation of the Union." Many of these men were subjected to very great privations at the early period of this strife, because there was no adequate provision then made by the Government for their equipment and sustenance, yet they bore it all, and went forth to battle for their flag. Many survivors of these early regiments now ask that the bounties and benefits conferred on those who, at a much later date and under more favorable auspices, entered the service of their country, be conferred on them. And, sir, do they ask too much? These were the men "who bore the burden in the heat of the day." But they are unheeded. Unfortunately for them they are only white men. They have no great sympathizing party so sustain their claims. They are not "the wards of the nation." Their interests are all identified with the white race, and in this country now that race is only fit to be taxed. And all these measures and interests are required to "bide their time," and stand without any consideration, while the great American Congress in both its branches attend to the more important and interesting and virtually absorbing subject of the better citizens, the African race, now just released from the fetters of slavery.

There is still another matter by some regarded as important—I mean the recuperation of the country from the waste and desolations of the war. The people of the United States have a right to expect that this Congress will devote itself to some effort at least to repair the waste of the past four years, in which millions of men were engaged in destroying. Sir, if this destruction has been confined chiefly to one section of the country, "if desolation, like a plowshare," has been driven all through the southern portion of the land; if from the Potomac to the Rio Grande farms and houses and agricultural implements have been burned and destroyed; still, that is a portion of our country; its losses are the losses of the American Union; its prosperity was once part of our prosperity; its wealth was part of our national wealth, and now its desolation is a portion of the loss of the country by the war, which as statesmen and patriots we should now labor to restore by every means in our power. I do not say that this war was not necessary, nor yet on the whole not beneficial in many ways to the country, but that now when it is happily over, when throughout the length and breadth of the land the people are rejoicing at once more beholding the dawn of peace, when strife has ceased and the burdens necessary to war heretofore cheerfully borne by the people may be expected to cease, the people expect their chosen Representatives to spring to the work of so modifying the existing systems of taxation as to render them less oppressive to the masses and more equitable in their adjustment.

These great questions, however, are required to sleep, pressed off until the session is far advanced, and no time be allowed for calm and proper deliberation, while we gravely, from day to day, discuss the question of suffrage in this District, and amendments to the Constitution for African elevation. I entreat gentlemen to think of the necessities of the country, and as there is no imperative necessity for making this so absorbing a question, that we defer it until we have nothing more important.

Sir, in the progress of this debate some strange things have been uttered and strange positions taken by gentlemen who favor these innovations. In their great zeal for the colored, they seem anxious to decry the white race, and would lead the world to infer that this country is indebted almost wholly to the colored soldiers for the suppression of the "great rebellion." Now, sir, these gentlemen cannot have thought much about the position they assume, or else in their zeal for the favorite they became blind to the merits of all the whites who came to the rescue and achieved successes before colored troops were even allowed to enter our armies in any form except as servants or teamsters.

It was not colored soldiers who fought at Carthage, or Wilson's creek, or New Madrid, or Island No. 10. They did not storm the strongholds at Fort Donelson; nor yet aid in the repulse at Shiloh; nor were they in the lead at Chickasaw bayou; nor did they capture Vicksburg nor Arkansas Post. They were not relied on to reclaim the Peninsula from Yorktown to Williamsburg, nor did they achieve glory at the Seven Pines. The truth is, all of those early victories were won by the indomitable courage of the white race alone, and in great part by the bravery of those soldiers of German birth whom the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] seems to regard as inferior to his great favorite, the negro, and whom in his resolutions he characterizes as "ignorant foreigners who do not understand our language." Yet this very class of men were among the first to spring to arms as volunteers, not waiting either to be drafted or receive bounties, but plunged early into the fight in defense of the Union, especially in the West, and chiefly remained in the Army until the close of the war.

The gentlemen on the other side have no encomiums to bestow on this class; they are not especial favorites; they are only spoken of as "ignorant foreigners who do not understand our language;" they are to be put below the negro, because these latter are "native and to the manner born." And while the gentleman from Illinois decries the German and the Swiss and other continental Europeans of our armies as less intelligent and deserving than the native-born negro, other gentlemen assail the Irish as vastly below the negro in every particular.

Thus the fanaticism of the Republican party having made an idol of the African, determined to give him a monopoly of all good qualities; and the more effectually to do so degrade the character, the intelligence, and the manhood of the foreign-born whites who in such numbers entered our armies and contributed so much by their bravery, skill, and intelligent endurance to insure victory to the arms of the Union.

But, sir, if we believe the assertions of the advocates of African enfranchisement in this Hall, we will almost be led to believe that the pusillanimous whites of this country, native and foreign, would have suffered this republican Government to have been broken up and our country ruined, had not the noble negro sprung patriotically to the rescue and saved our country for us.

Sir, I think this is all nonsense. I do not deny to the African race all the honor to which they are fairly entitled. I would not detract from them nor undervalue their services, but I do not see that they came as volunteers to the rescue of the Republic. In the early stages of negro enlistment they were generally incited by large prospective bounties and privileges offered by Massachusetts and other northern States to enlist, while in Kentucky and Missouri very many were literally captured and kidnapped into the Army; and finally, when the conscription system was adopted, they were compelled, like others, to serve in the Union armies. But long before any of these things happened nearly one million whites, native and foreign-born, had bared their bosoms to the deadly shot, the blood of thousands had been spilt, and multitudes had laid down their lives in the defense of the country which they loved, and left to their children a patriotic name. But they never supposed that in the Halls of Congress the time would come when they would be placed below the African and their self-sacrifice ignored for the purpose of negro elevation.

But, sir, it is not true that by your laws you have recognized even the equality of the African to the soldiers of the Caucasian race, even to those of foreign birth, much less the present contended for superiority of the former; for in the organization of negro troops you have required they shall be officered exclusively by whites; and I believe it is a truth, that in all this war no African has ever reached a higher elevation than a non-commissioned officer in your armies. Sir, this fact itself shows who those were upon whom the safety of the Republic, the maintenance of its integrity, devolved; and notwithstanding all the pathos of the advocates of the African race, all their assumptions, all their eulogiums, the people of all this country and of all the world know that it was the prowess and endurance of the white race that won this great victory. And notwithstanding the attempted degradation of the non-English-speaking portions of our armies by the gentleman from Illinois, or of the Irish by the other gentleman, all these have fully vindicated their martial bearing upon the battle-field, and have shown the world devotion to the cause of constitutional government by their persistent valor, which will challenge admiration for all time. And they have not only illustrated their capacity to fight, but also to lead and to command. They have attained high position, and their bravery and skill have caused their names to be inscribed as high on the tablet of fame as those born on the soil. The names of Mulligan and Corcoran, and multitudes of Irish heroes who fought and bled in this war, will live in "song and story," to illustrate the prowess of the sons of the "Emerald Isle," beside the name of Montgomery and others from the same land, who fought and fell in the earlier, I may say, all the wars of the Republic. And, sir, there are not wanting names of men who were chiefly "ignorant of our language," continental Europeans, like Osterhaus and many others, who like De Kalb and La Fayette and many other foreigners, vindicated our original independence. True, they were not the pets of fanatics. They had not employed scribes to write them up. They relied on their good right arm to vindicate them, on their own innate bravery to illustrate their deeds, and it is inscribed in imperishable granite; and the numerous general and field officers which foreign nationalities among us have given to the Republic in this terrible struggle clearly prove the vast superiority of these races over the now petted "wards of the nation," of fanatics.

But there is one more point to which I desire to advert. The advocates of African enfranchisement are equally ardent in their advocacy of the disfranchisement of all the white race at the South. There is no term of commendation too exalted to be employed in behalf of the noble and devoted, unselfish, patriotic African race. Nor does our language, extensive as it is, furnish epithets of sufficient opprobrium to characterize the infamy of all the white people of the South. The bitterness displayed here toward those of our race unfortunately domiciled in the South is to me in exceedingly strange contrast with the honeyed words and more than affectionate phrases employed toward a different race, held in all the past as greatly inferior to our own in all particulars. And I, for one, have been led to inquire why this universal denunciation of the white and equally universal commendation of the black or African race; why the one is absolutely anathematized and the other almost deified; why these gentlemen can find nothing too good to bestow upon the one, nothing too bad to heap upon the other? And the general answer given in all the speeches of most of those occupying the last few weeks in the effort to secure universal suffrage, or rather male suffrage without regard to color, is, the blacks all were loyal, were our friends, the whites were all our enemies, all disloyal, and hence we should to them carry out the old Jewish rule, "Thou shalt hate thine enemy," and this hatred must be nourished, cultivated, perpetuated, everything must be done to foster it. And as the exaltation of the former servile race over our enemies will assuredly manifest most "hatred," we will take that course, and make our enemies "bite the dust."

Now, I am not prepared to admit these premises. All the blacks in the South were not "loyal;" were not our "friends," did not rush to "our rescue;" did not "fly to arms" for "our defense." Only some one hundred and eighty or one hundred and ninety thousand of all the Africans in the whole land were brought into the Army under all the appliances used, of bounties, impressments, conscriptions, fugitives from former owners and every other means, while there were more than two million white men engaged in the fight to put down the rebellion and give freedom to the slaves. But beside this there is another statement, which I am indebted to a major general in the Army for, and have seen stated by others, which is, that of the "white men" in the rebellious States, there were more voluntary enlistments in "the Union Army" than of all the colored people by every means brought into the same Army.

Now, if this statement is correct, and I have not seen it denied, how shall we account for the zeal of gentlemen for the African and their hatred of the Caucasian? The plea that the blacks have "saved this nation, and have secured for us our liberty," is all mere nonsense. Better might we assume that the two hundred thousand or more southerners who came into our Army saved it. But they did not; they only aided in the work, as did also the Africans. But surely if honor and gratitude are due the blacks for what they did in the struggle, more honor and much more gratitude are due to the southern whites who came to our assistance; for these latter came "voluntarily;" came because of the "Union" and its emblematic "flag." They encountered hazards of all kinds, endured privations and hardships untold, gave up all prospects of home, preferment, and pecuniary gain. They did not ask for bounties or freedom, but only for the privilege and honor of battling for their country and its unity; and now what is the reward proffered them for their toil and valor and suffering? Why, the majority of this House announced to them, "Go back to the land you deserted to come to our aid. We hate you and all your viper race. We intend to remit your States below the grade of Territories. We disfranchise all you whites and enfranchise the blacks, and sustain them in ruling over you, as in times past you have ruled over them." And, sir, to accomplish these purposes more effectually, this effort to amend the Constitution is to be pressed and the southern States held from participating in the legislation of Congress or having any interest in the business of the country.

Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to all this. I think it all wrong. I do not believe the Union is or has been dissolved, and so believing, my oath of office, as I conceive its nature, precludes me from following in the lead of gentlemen on the other side of this question.

I do not enter into the argument which has occupied so much of the time of this House, and the attention of gentlemen, as to what Grotius or any other learned publicist says about the law of nations, the powers of States, the relations of sovereigns, civil or uncivil wars, and all that. I am no lawyer, hence will not bring to bear on this question arguments derived from these sources. These are plain, matter-of-fact questions, and in a plain matter-of-fact way the people of this country will deal with them, and, in my judgment, the question of the people to-day is, who dissolved the Union; when was it dissolved? And to these questions the American people will bring their Representatives for an answer. And they will not take their ideas from these learned foreign authors, who knew nothing of such a Federal Republic as ours with a written Constitution in which the lines and rights of State and General Governments are so clearly defined, and which possesses in itself no power of dissolution except by general consent.

When and by whom was this Union of States dissolved? Gentlemen have talked about the southern States as being out of the Union, as being alien enemies, as conquered provinces, to be governed by the will of the conqueror, as subject to sequestration, confiscation, and every other evil which may be imposed upon them by this Congress.

Sir, I ask still, and again, when did these States get out of the Union? Was it when they attempted to secede? If they went out of the Union then, and they had the right to go, by what right did we go to war with them, and for what did we fight?

We have always acted on the doctrine that "governments are formed by the consent of the governed," and if the people of the southern States deemed it to their interest to "dissolve the tie" that bound them to us, and if, then, secession accomplished the dissolution, then surely we had no right to prevent them from going, much less to fight them back. But we did not believe they had the power thus to separate themselves from the Union. We acted on the assumption that the secession was a revolt, not of the masses of the people, but of some restless spirits, and hence the General Government, being by the organic law required to preserve all the States from "insurrection," came forth to suppress the revolt. The Government called upon the people to prevent the overthrow of the Union by the insurrection in the southern States. And they responded.

Sir, the Union was not dissolved by these ordinances, and the people resolved that it should not be so dissolved. The preservation of the Union was the great object of the war. For this more than two million men went forth into the deadly strife, for this hundreds of thousands offered up their lives as sacrifices upon the altar of patriotism. The Union, was their battle-cry. For its preservation they left families and fireside joys, and marched into the deadly breach; the Union, with its mem-toes, with its glories, its heroes, its monuments, its triumphs, its troubles; the Union, with its early battles, its Bunker Hill and Yorktown, its Saratoga and the Cowpens, its Brandywine and Camden. The triumphs of its middle age were dear to all its sons. They sung of Lundy Lane and of New Orleans. They saw its armies triumph and its flag emblazoned with more than thirty stars. They saw its triumphs on the ocean also, and determined to maintain its territorial unity. For this Grant battled so perseveringly, and Sherman marched and fought, as only western men can march and fight, for the West is the child of the Republic, and its unity is to secure to the West its markets and its power. And when all the battles were fought, the insurrection put down, the forts reoccupied, the flag everywhere thrown to the breeze, its triumphant vindicators may now with propriety ask, who dissolved the Union? And I firmly believe, sir, that when these soldiers are by politicians informed the Union is dissolved, their answer will be it is not so.

And now, Mr. Speaker, what is the true situation of the country? The southern States have repealed their ordinances of secession, have declared their former slaves all free, have repudiated their debts created by the war; they have done all in their power to restore their States to their former condition in the Union. The President has looked to the restoration of these States with an anxiety characteristic of his patriotic devotion to the unity and glory of his whole country. He found society almost dissolved. By the cessation of strife, and dissolution of both the civil and military power of the rebellion, there was no government left in all that country. As Commander-in-Chief of the armies, he appointed military rulers, and then provisional governors. He then proceeded in the work of restoration, opened the ports to foreign commerce, set all the machinery of government to work; collected, through the agents of the law, internal taxes. Post offices have been opened and postal service restored, and but for the desolations and losses of war, a stranger would not know that there had ever arisen a question of the existence of the Union even in those States.

Still, the question recurs, is the Union dissolved, and how was it done? The President answers, I do not regard the Union dissolved. The rebellion failed, and its failure left the Union intact. Had it succeeded, then this dissolution would have been an accomplished fact; but the Union armies triumphed, and he is to-day the President of the whole United States, with none to dispute the authority vested in him by the people from the eastern boundary of Maine to the Rio Grande, and all its laws are enforced and its taxes collected. Lieutenant General Grant, who opened up the Mississippi and caused its waters to "flow unvexed to the sea," assures you that the Union is not dissolved. To prevent it he drew his sword, and did not sheathe it until the idea of dissolution had been driven from the southern mind; until its best army had surrendered; until its chosen and able leader had sued for peace, delivered up his sword, receiving a parole of honor, and agreeing not again to take up arms against the Union. Grant and his veteran and persevering legions maintained the Union and prevented its dissolution.

You ask Sherman, is the Union dissolved, did you fight to sever or to restore it? Who does not know his answer? When in a few most eloquent words our accomplished Speaker three days ago introduced to this House that modest soldier whose renown and glory fill the world, whose march has no parallel in either ancient or modern history, when cheer after cheer made this Hall ring, and every one felt pleased to shake the hand of the victorious soldier, was it because he had done much to dissolve the Union, he was thus received? And had the Speaker asked him if the Union was destroyed I fancy I hear his blunt, soldier-like reply, as in the fullness of his soul he would exclaim, "The Union dissolved! No, thank God, it is not, cannot be dissolved while the memories of the past are cherished by the soldiers of the present; and the campaign of those who followed me and cheered me on was begun and continued to rescue our beloved Union from the impending danger of severance."

Ask the soldiers of every grade, of every army, what they fought for, what they endured so much for, what they submitted to all manner of toil, hardship, privation, and suffering for, and they will tell you in their triumphantly victorious notes, "To save the Union from overthrow, and, thank God, we were successful."

Who then says that the Union is dissolved? None but the so-called Union members of Congress, elected as Union men—they only proclaim dissolution.

I am a Democrat; and with all in this House who bear that honored name we proclaim, with Andrew Jackson and Andrew Johnson, "The Federal Union, it must be preserved," not only for the sake of our present population and our posterity, but as the beacon-light to guide all men to happiness.

Mr. Speaker, I have said that we had no right to go to war with the southern States only on the assumption that theirs was an insurrection, unsustained by the masses of the people. And this was evidently the idea entertained by the late President Lincoln, who first called forth the voluntary offering of the people to suppress this revolt against the authority of the Government. He says:

"It may well be questioned whether there is to-day a majority of legally qualified voters of any State, except, perhaps, South Carolina, in favor of disunion. There is much reason to believe that the Union men are the majority in many, if not in every other one, of the so-called seceded States."—President Lincoln's Message of July 4, 1861.

This I say was the assumption at that period, the war was for the suppression of the rebellion and protection of the Union and Union men. And subsequent developments in all the States demonstrated the existence of that Union element among the white inhabitants, manifesting itself, as in Tennessee, in furnishing scouts, giving accurate information, harboring deserters, raising armies for your aid, and doing all that could be expected of them to maintain their allegiance to the Union. Mr. Lincoln steadily maintained that whenever the armed power of the rebellion was broken, and the arms raised against the Union were laid down, that then the union of the States would be restored, the States resume their wonted functions, and harmony and unity again give vitality to all their functions, and we should be again in every acceptance of the words a "Union of States," which none could sever. And, Mr. Speaker, is it not desirable that this should be realized as early as possible?

I am opposed to all these proposed amendments to the Constitution, to all questions of enfranchisement of the African race among us, because I do not think this is an auspicious time to tamper with that almost sacred instrument, our fundamental law. We have just got through a bloody strife; passion doubtless was aroused, bad feelings engendered; let us wait calmly for awhile, curb our passions, and honestly, as patriots, seek more light before we attempt change. I believe this is not the time, for as we are only the servants of the people, not their masters, and as when we were elected these questions were not before the people, hence they have expressed no full and matured opinions on this most interesting question. We should therefore wait, consult the people, not attempt to forestall them, nor yet consult only with the few whom we may regard as friends, or, as they are familiarly called, "the leaders." This Constitution belongs to the people, the whole people. I deny the right of self-constituted leaders to dictate to the people on this grave question. Let us wait awhile, go before the people with it, let it be fully discussed on both sides, and then, if the people want these changes, let them send men here instructed on the subject, and let their behests be obeyed. But surely no one will pretend that these questions in any way entered into the contests which eventuated in our election. And if this is so in reference to members of Congress, it is even more true in reference to the State Legislatures who will be called on to decide the question. My judgment, therefore, is these questions had better be deferred, at least until the next session of this Congress, and let us proceed to the important questions which more immediately concern the people of the country.

And these remarks apply to the twin question of African enfranchisement. Who, of all the members of this House, was elected on this issue? And yet this extraneous question absorbs all the time of the House. No sooner is one phase of this African question disposed of than another takes its place. Suffrage in this District is no sooner passed, after weeks of argument, than suffrage in the States is to be procured for the African by constitutional amendment, and as soon as we get through with this the African comes up again in the shape of a measure—which has already passed the Senate—to enlarge the powers of the Freedmen's Bureau. Thus we go, and all the anomalies of these separate measures claim our notice, but do not sufficiently attract attention.

For thirty years it has been steadily proclaimed that African slavery had reduced the enslaved to the very lowest grade of being. The enslavement of his body had, by consequence, almost obliterated his intellect. He could scarcely be called a man. That he might be rescued, he must be freed. He is freed. Presto, change! As soon as the chains fall he is no longer the brutalized being over whom, for thirty years, we have made the land to mourn; he is an American citizen, fully qualified and prepared to take upon himself the responsibilities of an elector, and qualified for all these important duties. Wonderful!

But yet more passing strange, another turn of the cards, and this noble African, of whom we heard so many eulogiums a few days ago, comes now before us as the "mere child," the "ward of the nation," who is to be followed by a guardian, in the shape of a high military officer, at heavy pay, to see that this now helpless being is secured in his contracts for labor and not defrauded out of his earnings. But yesterday his qualifications for a voter, and, indeed, his evident superiority to the "ignorant foreigner who did not understand our language," were eloquently proclaimed. A day before he by his prowess, his valor, his zeal in our behalf, had saved us a nation. He rescued us from fierce rebels, and baring his noble breast, received in lieu of us the deadly shaft, thus delivering our poor white race from overthrow. But now again he is placed under the watchful care of a new organization in the Government for his special benefit, "a Freedmen's Bureau," solely to look after him, help him to get employment, help him say how much a month he should work for, how he shall employ his time, and where he shall and where he shall not go; but over and above all this, he is to be educated, sent to school; he is to be fed by the public if he does not choose to work for his living; he is to get clothing from the overflowing Treasury of the nation; Government must find him a house and pay for a doctor when he is sick; and all this because he is a freedman of African descent. White soldiers, disabled in the service of the Union, unable to work, are left to beg upon the streets. What a fault for them to have been born white! Had they been colored Government would have had an agent to look after them.

And this nice little operation of the Freedmen's Bureau was estimated to cost the American people for this year (1866) nearly twelve million dollars. How much its cost is enlarged by enlarging and extending its operations I am not prepared to say. About forty years ago the Administration of John Quincy Adams was turned out of power for expending for all purposes about thirteen million dollars a year. This year, (1866,) groaning under a debt the interest of which alone requires of the people in taxes all they are able to pay, the poor white taxpayer must have saddled on him, over and above, nearly or quite twelve million dollars to feed, clothe, and house the freedmen; whom gentlemen here tell us are really better qualified to vote and be freemen than many of the whites who have, through taxation, to contribute to their support.

I am no enemy of the African in our midst; I have always commiserated his condition; I have always been and am now his friend; but I tremble for him in view of the action of the new philanthropy. Many years will not elapse until he will be compelled to look to others for help and sympathy; but it may possibly be too late to save him from the fate of another race upon this continent, who had at one time philanthropic enthusiasts seeking apparent benefits for them, but now, thrown off and discarded, are turned out to die, or hunted down to be exterminated.

And now, Mr. Speaker, I close what I have to say. I am very solicitous for harmony among our family of States. I know great wrongs have been done. But this will not justify us in the perpetration of other wrongs. Southern people have tried to destroy our glorious charter; but they failed, and their effort will not justify us in doing what they were unable to do. Armies tried to dissolve our Union; I pray you let not an American Union Congress do that which others by the force of arms were unable to accomplish. Now, let us all encourage all the people to allay the bitterness of the recent strife, seek to restore harmony. Let Massachusetts reach out her arms to the South and help them now, as the South flew to the succor of Massachusetts "in the days that tried men's souls;" and while we exclaim—

"That mercy I to others show.
That mercy show to me,"

let us try once more the influence of gentle means to restore our erring brethren; let our effort be to bring again to our beloved land union, harmony, fraternity, a rivalry only to promote the greatest happiness and secure the speediest restoration of general prosperity, and exemplify to the world that we are once more a happy, prosperous, and thoroughly united people, realizing more fully in fact than in any period of the past, that ours is indeed,

"A union of hearts and a union of hands,
A union of States none shall sever;
A union of lakes and a union of lands,
And the flag of our Union forever."

Freedmen's Bureau—Restoration of the Rebel States.

SPEECH OF HON. J. A. GARFIELD, OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
February 1, 1866.

The House having under consideration the bill to enlarge the powers of the Freedmen's Bureau—

MR. GARFIELD said:

MR. SPEAKER: The bill now before the House is one of a series of measures which it is the duty of this House to consider and act upon during the present session; and I shall, in the time allotted to me, take a wider range than the provisions of the bill itself would warrant, and discuss, in connection with it, the general question of the restoration of the States lately in rebellion. I shall try to examine the situation of national affairs resulting from the war; to determine, if possible, what ought to be done to bring the Republic back, by the surest, safest, and shortest path, to the full prosperity of liberty and peace. This is the result earnestly desired by every patriotic citizen. How to reach it is the great problem we are called upon to solve. On the main points in the problem I believe there is far less difference of sentiment in this House than is generally supposed.

Men differ far more in theory than in practice. It would be easy to find ten men who perfectly agree in recommending a given course of action. It would be difficult to find ten who would give the same reasons for that recommendation. If the members of this House could lay aside their theories and abstract definitions, and deliberate on questions of practical legislation, many apparent differences would at once disappear. The words and phrases we use exert a powerful influence on the opinions we form and the action which results.

In inquiring into the legal status of the insurgent States we are met at the threshold by three distinct theories, each of which has its advocates in this House.

1. That these States are now and have never ceased to be in the Union with all their rights unimpaired.

2. That they are out of the Union in fact and in law; that by their acts of secession and rebellion they are reduced to the condition of Territories, and that it rests with Congress to determine whether they shall now or hereafter be admitted into the Union.

3. As held by the gentleman from New York [MR. RAYMOND] in his speech of day before yesterday, that whatever may have been the effect of the war upon them, "they have, under the President's guidance and action, resumed their functions of self-government in the Union," and we ought to accept them.

MR. SPEAKER, I am unable fully to agree with either of these propositions, and I shall endeavor to point out what seems to me the error which has led to their adoption. Two terms made use of in the debate on this subject seem to me to have caused much of the diversity of opinion. I allude to the word "State," and the phrase "in the Union."

The word "State," as it has been used by gentlemen in this discussion, has two meanings, as perfectly distinct as though different words had been used to express them. The confusion arising from applying the same word to two different and dissimilar objects has had very much to do with the diverse conclusions which gentlemen have reached. They have given us the definition of a "State" in the contemplation of public or international law, and have at once applied that definition, and the conclusions based upon it, to the States of the American Union and the effects of war upon them. Let us examine the two meanings of the word, and endeavor to keep them distinct in their application to the questions before us.

Phillimore, the great English publicist, says:

"For all the purposes of international law a State (demos, civitas, volk) may be defined to be a people permanently occupying a fixed territory, bound together by common laws, habits, and customs into one body-politic, exercising, through the medium of an organized government, independent sovereignty and control over all persons and things within its boundaries, capable of making war and peace, and of entering into all international relations with the other communities of the globe."—Phillimore's International Law, vol. 1, sec. 65.

Substantially the same definition may be found in Grotius, book one, chapter one, section fourteen; in Burlamaqui, volume two, part one, chapter four, section nine; and in Vattel, book one, chapter one. The primary point of agreement in all these authorities is that in contemplation of international law a State is absolutely sovereign, acknowledging no superior on earth. In that sense the United States is a State, a sovereign State, just as Great Britain, France, and Russia are States.

But what is the meaning of the word State as applied to Ohio or Alabama? Is either of them a State in the sense of international law? They lack all the leading requisites of such a State. They are only the geographical subdivisions of a State; and though endowed by the people of the United States with the rights of local self-government, yet in all their external relations their sovereignty is completely destroyed, being merged in the supreme Federal Government. (Halleck's International Law, section sixteen, page 71.)

Ohio cannot make war; cannot conclude peace; cannot make a treaty with any foreign Government, cannot even make a compact with her sister States; cannot regulate commerce; cannot coin money; and has no flag. These indispensable attributes of sovereignty the State of Ohio does not possess, nor does any other State of the Union. We call them States for want of a better name. We call them States because the original Thirteen had been so designated before the Constitution was formed; but that Constitution destroyed all the sovereignty which those States were ever supposed to possess in reference to external affairs.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the five great publicists, Grotius, Puffendorf, Bynkershoek, Burlamaqui, and Vattel, who have been so often quoted in this debate, and all of whom wrote more than a quarter of a century, and some nearly two centuries, before our Constitution was formed, can hardly be quoted as good authorities in regard to the nature and legal relationships of the component States of the American Union.

Even my colleague from the Columbus district, [Mr. SNELLABARGER,] in his very able discussion of this question, spoke as though a State of this Union was the same as a State in the sense of international law, with certain qualities added. I think he must admit that nearly all the leading attributes of such a State are taken from it when it becomes a State of the Union.

Several gentlemen, during this debate, have quoted the well known doctrine of international law, "that war annuls all existing compacts and treaties between belligerents;" and they have concluded, therefore, that our war has broken the Federal bond and dissolved the Union. This would be true, if the rebel States were States in the sense of international law—if our Government were not a sovereign nation, but only a league between sovereign States.

I oppose to this conclusion the unanswerable proposition that this is a nation; that the rebel States are not sovereign States, and therefore their failure to achieve independence was a failure to break the Federal bond—to dissolve the Union.

The word "State" which they discussed is no more applicable to Ohio than to Hamilton county. The States and counties of this Union are equally unknown to international law.

There is another expression to which I have referred, and which is used in an equally ambiguous manner. We have discussed the question here whether these insurgent States are in the Union. "In the Union!" What do we mean by the phrase? In one sense, every inch of soil we own is "in the Union." The Territory of Utah is in the Union. So is every Territory of the West in the Union; that is, under its authority, subject to its right of eminent domain. On the other hand, when some gentlemen say these States are "in the Union," they mean to include all their relations, all their rights and privileges, which is quite another thing. From this ambiguity in the use of terms have arisen most of the differences of opinion on this subject.

I would not be understood as saying that international law has nothing to do with the question before us. It has much to do with it. It furnished us with the rules of civilized nations in the conduct of war, the rights of belligerents, the treatment of prisoners, the rules of surrender, cartel, and parole. Guided by the precepts of international law, we are enabled to understand the rights and duties of neutral Powers and the legal results of successful war against domestic enemies and traitors. But when gentlemen quote the doctrines of international law in reference to sovereign nations, and apply them directly to the political status of the States of this Union, they lead us into error.

In view of the peculiar character of our Government I ask, in what condition has the war left the rebel States? Did they accomplish their own destruction? Did they break the bonds which bound them to the Union? I answer, they would have done both these things, if anything short of successful revolution could do it. It was not, as some gentlemen hold, merely an insurrection of individuals. It was not, as most civil wars are, a war among the atoms, so to speak, flaming here and there, as fire breaks out in a hundred places in a city. It was a war of organized popular masses, or as the Supreme Court, borrowing the prophetic words of De Tocqueville, calls it, "a territorial civil war," in which we granted them belligerent rights, and claimed for ourselves both belligerent and sovereign rights. We could pursue them with war as enemies, or try them by criminal law as citizens, and hang them as condemned traitors.

I cannot agree with the distinguished gentleman from New York, [Mr. RAYMOND,] when he holds that we are to deal with the rebels only as individuals. They struck at the Union through every instrumentality within reach. Through personal service in the army, and individual contributions of money; through voluntary associations, to raise men and money; through popular mass meetings to inflame the passions and develop all the power of their people; through township, county, and city corporations; through State conventions which framed new constitutions in order the more perfectly to sever the bonds which held them to the Union; and, to make a more powerful and effectual instrument with which to establish their rebel sovereignty, through State Legislatures, by laws levying taxes for the purchase of arms, ammunition, and all the matériel of war, by resolutions denouncing the pains and penalties of treason against all citizens who refused to join their conspiracy; and finally, by a confederation of eleven States, consolidated into a central sovereign government de facto, which became the most absolute military despotism in modern history—a despotism which inundated with its deluge of tyranny all State guarantees, all municipal privileges, and assumed absolute control of all persons and property within the limits of its territory. There was not a conceivable calamity which could have befallen us as a nation that they did not attempt, with all their power and in every available way, to bring upon us. Individuals fought us as individuals, States as States fought us, and if a State can commit treason each of the sinful eleven committed it again and again. They utterly subverted the governments of their States, they broke every oath by which they had bound themselves to the Union, they let go their hold upon the Union and attempted to destroy it.

What was the tie that bound them to the Union? For example, what made Alabama a State of the Union? Read the history of that transaction. When she had formed a constitution for herself in obedience to the law of Congress, when Congress had approved that constitution as republican in form, the following act was passed by the Congress of the United States, approved by the President, December 14, 1819:

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, That the State of Alabama shall be one, and is hereby declared to be one, of the United States of America, and admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatsoever."

Now, Alabama may violate a law of Congress, but she cannot annul it. She may break it, but she cannot make it void, except by successful revolution.

By another law of Congress, approved April 20, 1820, it was declared—

"That all the laws of the United States not locally inapplicable shall be extended to the State of Alabama, and shall have the same force and effect within the same as elsewhere in the United States."

Congress extended our judiciary system over

Alabama, dividing the State into judicial districts; and since that time, year by year, Congress has been covering Alabama with Federal legislation as with a net-work of steel. Has Alabama broken all these bonds? She has done all she could to break away from the Union, but she has not been able to destroy or render invalid one law of the Republic. Alabama let go of the Union, but the Union did not let go of Alabama. We have held her through four years of war, and we hold her still. When she tried to break the Federal bonds we called out millions of men in order that not one jot or tittle should pass from these laws, but that all should be fulfilled.

Let the stars of heaven illustrate our constellation of States. When God launched the planets upon their celestial pathway He bound them all by the resistless power of attraction to the central sun, around which they revolved in their appointed orbits. Each may be swept by storms, may be riven by lightnings, may be rocked by earthquakes, may be devastated by all the terrestrial forces and overwhelmed in ruin, but far away in the everlasting depths the sovereign sun holds the turbulent planet in its place. This earth may be overwhelmed until the high hills are covered by the sea; it may tremble with earthquakes miles below the soil, but it must still revolve in its appointed orbit. So Alabama may overwhelm all her municipal institutions in ruin, but she cannot annul the omnipotent decrees of the sovereign people of the Union. She must be held forever in her orbit of obedience and duty.

Mr. STEVENS. If the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] will permit me, I will ask him a question. Some of the angels undertook to dethrone the Almighty, but they could not do it. And they were turned out of heaven because they were unable to break its laws. Are those devilish angels in or out of heaven? [Laughter.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I thank the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] for his interruption. The angels that kept not their first estate! What was their fate? It was the Almighty who opened the shining gates of heaven and hurled them down to eternal ruin. They did not go without His permission and help. And if these States are out of the Union it must be because the sovereign people of the Republic hurled them out; because they pleased to let them go. I am glad the gentleman interrupted me; it happily illustrates my position.

I will not discuss what we might do with Alabama, but simply what was Alabama herself able to do, and what she was not able to do toward breaking up this Union. Two years ago, when I had the honor for the first time to address this House, the same question that is now before us was under discussion. I maintained then, as I hold to-day, that the rebel States are not, in any legitimate sense of the words, out of the Union. I then declared, as I declare now, that by their own act of treason and rebellion they had forfeited all their rights in the Union, but they had released themselves from none of their obligations. It rests with the people of the Republic to enforce the performance of these obligations, and, so soon as the national safety will permit, restore them to their rights.

I agree with my distinguished colleague, [Mr. BINGHAM,] that for Federal purposes the rebel States are in the Union, but if the expression be allowable they are out of the Union for State and municipal purposes.

Mr. BINGHAM. I beg to correct the gentleman. I never used the expression that they were "States out of the Union," but that, by reason of their rebellion, they had ceased to be States, for municipal purposes, in the Union.

Mr. GARFIELD. Of course I desire to quote my colleague correctly, for I agree with him, and quote him to strengthen my position, that the rebel States have not severed the Federal bond, but have utterly demolished their municipal governments.

Now, let us inquire how the surrender of the military power of the rebellion affected the legal condition of those States. When the rebellion collapsed, and the last armed man of the confederacy surrendered to our forces, I affirm that there was not in one of those States a single government that we did or could recognize. There was not in one of those States, from Governor down to constable, a single man whom we could recognize as authorized to exercise any official function whatever. They had formed governments alien and hostile to the Union. Not only had their officers taken no oaths to support the Constitution of the United States, but they had heaped oath upon oath to destroy it.

I go further. I hold that there were in those States no constitutions of any binding force and effect; none that we could recognize. A constitution, in this case, can mean nothing less than a constitution of government. A constitution must constitute something or it is no constitution. When we speak of the constitution of Alabama we mean the constitution of the government of Alabama. When the rebels surrendered there remained no constitution in Alabama, because there remained no government. Those States reverted into our hands by victorious war, with every municipal right and every municipal authority utterly and completely swept away. Whose duty was it to assume the control of them under such circumstances?

In the first instance it was the duty of the President of the United States. Congress was not then in session. Military resistance to the armies of the Union had ceased, and the laws of war pervaded every inch of the conquered territory. I appeal to the highest authorities in international law, as quoted by Halleck, chapter thirty-two, section one:

"The right of one belligerent to occupy and govern the territory of the enemy while in its military possession is one of the incidents of war, and flows directly from the right to conquer. We therefore do not look to the constitution or political institutions of the conqueror for authority to establish a government for the territory of the enemy in his possession, during its military occupation, nor for the rules by which the powers of such government are regulated and limited. Such authority and such rules are derived directly from the laws of war, as established by the usage of the world, and confirmed by the writings of publicists and the decisions of courts—in fine, from the law of nations. But when the conquest is made complete in whatsoever mode, the right to govern the acquired territory follows as the inevitable consequence of the right of acquisition, and the character, form, and powers of the government established over such conquered territory are determined by the constitution and laws of the State which acquires it, or with which it is incorporated. The government established over an enemy's territory during its military occupation may exercise all the powers given by the laws of war to the conqueror over the conquered, and is subject to all the restrictions which that code imposes. It is of little consequence whether such government be called a military or civil government; its character is the same, and the source of its authority the same; in either case it is a government imposed by the laws of war, and so far as it concerns the inhabitants of such territory, or the rest of the world, those laws alone determine the legality or illegality of its acts. But the conquering State may, of its own will, whether expressed in its constitution or in its laws, impose restrictions additional to those established by the usage of nations, conferring upon the inhabitants of the territory so occupied, privileges and rights to which they are not strictly entitled by the laws of war; and, if such government of military occupation violate these additional restrictions so imposed, it is accountable to the power which established it, but not to the rest of the world."

Again, chapter thirty-three, section sixteen, in applying the laws of war to our Government, he says:

"The President of the United States can make no treaty without the concurrence of two thirds of the Senate, and his authority over ceded territory, though derived from the law of nations, is limited by the Constitution and subordinate to the laws of Congress. It, however, is well settled by the Supreme Court that as constitutional Commander-in-Chief he is authorized to form a civil or military government for the conquered territory during the war, and that when such territory is ceded to the United States, as a conquest, the existing government so established does not cease as a matter of course or as a consequence of the restoration of peace; that, on the contrary, such government is rightfully continued after the peace and until Congress legislates otherwise; but that the President may virtually dissolve this government by withdrawing the officers who administer it; provided he does not thereby neglect his constitutional obligation, 'to take care that the laws be faithfully executed.'

"So long as that government continues, with the express or implied sanction of the President, it represents the sovereignty of the United States, and has the legal authority to enforce and execute the laws which extend over such territory. Congress may at any time put an end to this government of the conquered territory, and organize a new one, or it may permit the people of such territory to form a constitution, and admit it as a new State into the Union."

It was decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, in reference to the Mexican war, that—

"On the conquest of a country the President may establish a provisional government, which may ordain laws and institute a judicial system, which will continue in force after the war and until modified by the direct legislation of Congress or by the territorial government established by its authority."—9 Howard, p. 615.

From these authorities and from the facts in the case it is evident:

1. That, by conquest, the United States obtained complete control of the rebel territory.
2. That every vestige of municipal authority in those States was, by secession, rebellion, and the conquest of the rebellion, utterly destroyed.
3. That the state of war did not terminate with the actual cessation of hostilities, but that under the laws of war it was the duty of the President, as Commander-in-Chief, to establish governments over the conquered people of the insurgent States, which governments, no matter what may be their form, are really military governments, deriving their sole power from the President.
4. That the governments thus established are valid while the state of war continues and until Congress acts in the case.
5. That it belongs exclusively to the legislative authority of the Government to determine the political status of the insurgent States, either by adopting the governments the President has established, or by permitting the people to form others, subject to the approval of Congress.

The President might have sent a major general or any other military officer to govern each one of the rebel States. But he chose to consult the people and allow them to adopt a form of government so nearly resembling civil government that they might the more easily come back to their places by and by. But it was none the less a military government for that reason. On any other ground the whole course of the President would have been an unwarrantable usurpation.

Now, holding first that the President had full authority in the matter, I ask, how long does his authority last? It is clearly settled by the authorities to which I have referred that his authority lasts until Congress speaks. So long as Congress is silent, the governments established by the President will remain.

It is now time, Mr. Speaker, that Congress should make its declaration of policy and principle in reference to these governments.

Let us not quarrel with the past. Let us not endanger the future because the President's policy in the past has not been all we could desire. In one important particular I wish it had been different. When he appealed to the people of the South to cooperate with him in establishing his military governments I greatly regret that he did not appeal to all the loyal people. I regret that he did not recognize the rights and consult the wishes of those loyal millions who were made free and made citizens also by the events of the war.

But let that pass. What he did he had a right to do; what remains to be done is for Congress and the President in their legislative capacity to determine. Our rights in this direction are as ample as the rights of conquest. What are they? I read from Woolsey, page 231, the latest utterance of public law, made with direct reference to our war:

"When an internal war breaks out the Government must determine whether the municipal or international code, in whole or in part, shall be adopted. In general the relation of the parties ought to be nearly those of ordinary war which humanity demands, and will be, because otherwise the law of retaliation will be applied. Municipal law may be enforced with less evil in the way of pecuniary than of personal penalties; fines or confiscations may be efficacious in strengthening the Government and deterring from rebellion. If slaves, as among us, form a part of the property of the rebels, since slavery is local and the law of nations knows of no such thing, the advancing military power of the Government may set them free and use and protect them; and, indeed, if force overthrows the local laws on which slavery rests they become free of course. The same rules of war are required in such a war as in any other, the same ways of fighting, the same treatment of prisoners, of combatants, of non-combatants, and of private property by the army where it passes. So also natural justice demands the same veracity and faithfulness which are binding in the intercourse of all moral beings.

Nations thus treating rebels by no means concede thereby that they form a State, or that they are de facto such. There is a difference between belligerents and belligerent States which has been too much overlooked.

"When a war ends to the disadvantage of the insurgents, municipal law may clinch the nail which war has driven, may hang, after legal process, instead of shooting, and confiscate the whole instead of plundering a part. But a wise and civilized nation will exercise only so much of this legal vengeance as the interests of lasting peace imperiously demand."

These capacious powers are in our hands. How shall we use them? I agree with my friend from Connecticut [Mr. DEMING] that we need not apply the strictissimum jus to these conquered people. We should do nothing inconsistent with the spirit and genius of our institutions. We should do nothing for revenge, but everything for security; nothing for the past, everything for the present and the future. Indemnity for the past we can never obtain. The four hundred thousand graves in which sleep our fathers and brothers, murdered by rebellion, will keep their sacred trust till the angel of the resurrection bids the dead come forth. The tears, the sorrow, the unutterable anguish of broken hearts can never be atoned for. We turn from that sad but glorious past, and demand such securities for the future as can never be destroyed.

And first, we must recognize in all our action the stupendous facts of the war. In the very crisis of our fate God brought us face to face with the alarming truth that we must lose our own freedom or grant it to the slave. In the extremity of our distress we called upon the black man to help us save the Republic, and amid the very thunder of battle, we made a covenant with him, sealed both with his blood and ours, and witnessed by Jehovah, that when the nation was redeemed, he should be free and share with us the glories and blessings of freedom. In the solemn words of the great proclamation of emancipation, we not only declared the slaves forever free, but we pledged the faith of the nation "to maintain their freedom." mark the words, "to maintain their freedom." The Omnipotent witness will appear in judgment against us if we do not fulfill that covenant. Have we done it? Have we given freedom to the black man? What is freedom? Is it a mere negation; the bare privilege of not being chained, bought and sold, branded and scourged? If this be all, then freedom is a bitter mockery, a cruel delusion, and it may well be questioned whether slavery were not better.

But liberty is no negation. It is a substantive, tangible reality. It is the realization of those imperishable truths of the Declaration "that all men are created equal," that the sanction of all just government is "the consent of the governed." Can these truths be realized until each man has a right to be heard on all matters relating to himself?

Mr. Speaker, we did more than merely to break off the chains of the slaves. The abolition of slavery added four million citizens to the Republic. By the decision of the Supreme Court, by the decision of the Attorney General, by the decision of all the departments of our Government, those men made free are, by the act of freedom, made citizens. As another has said, they must be "four million disfranchised, disarmed, untaxed, landless, thriftless, non-producing, non-consuming, degraded men, or four million land-holding, industrious, arms-bearing, and voting population. Choose between the two!"

If they are to be disfranchised, if they are to have no voice in determining the conditions under which they are to live and labor, what hope have they for the future? It will rest with their late masters, whose treason they aided to thwart, to determine whether negroes shall be permitted to hold property, to enjoy the benefits of education, to enforce contracts, to have access to the courts of justice—in short, to enjoy any of those rights which give vitality and value to freedom. Who can fail to foresee the ruin and misery that await this race to whom the vision of freedom has been presented only to be withdrawn, leaving them without even the aid which the master's selfish, commercial interest in their life and service formerly afforded them? Will these negroes, remembering the battle-fields on which nearly two hundred thousand of their number have so bravely fought, and many thousands have heroically died, submit to oppression as tamely and peaceably as in the days of slavery? Under such conditions there could be no peace, no security, no prosperity. The spirit of slavery is still among us; it must be utterly destroyed before we shall be safe.

I remember an incident in the history of the eastern church, as recorded by Gibbon, volume two, chapter twenty-eight, which illustrates the power which slavery has exercised among us. The Christians of that day under the lead of Theophilus undertook to destroy the heathen temples. Gibbon says:

"Theophilus proceeded to demolish the temple of Serapis without any other difficulties than those which he found in the weight and solidity of the materials, but these obstacles proved so insuperable that he was obliged to leave the foundations and to content himself with reducing the edifice itself to a heap of rubbish, a part of which was soon afterward cleared away to make room for a church, erected in honor of the Christian martyrs.

"The colossal statue of Serapis was involved in the ruin of his temple and religion. A great number of plates of different metals, artificially joined together, composed the majestic figure of the deity, who touched on either side the walls of the sanctuary. His aspect of Serapis, his sitting posture, and the scepter, which he bore in his left hand, were extremely similar to the ordinary representations of Jupiter. He was distinguished from Jupiter by the basket, or bushel, which was placed on his head, and by the emblematic monster which he held in his right hand, the head and body of a serpent branching into three tails, which were again terminated by the triple heads of a dog, a lion, and a wolf. It was confidently affirmed that if any impious hand should dare to violate the majesty of the god the heavens and earth would instantly return to their original chaos. An intrepid soldier, animated by zeal and armed with a weighty battle-axe ascended the ladder, and even the Christian multitude expected with some anxiety the event of the combat. He aimed a vigorous stroke against the cheek of Serapis; the cheek fell to the ground; the thunder was still silent, and both the heavens and the earth continued to preserve their accustomed order and tranquillity. The victorious soldier repeated his blows, the huge idol was overthrown and broken in pieces, and the limbs of Serapis were ignominiously dragged through the streets of Alexandria. His mangled carcass was burnt in the amphitheater amid the shouts of the populace, and many persons attributed their conversion to this discovery of the impotence of their tutelary deity."

So slavery sat in our national Capitol. Its huge bulk filled the temple of our liberty, touching it from side to side. Mr. Lincoln, on the 1st of January, 1863, struck it on the cheek, and the faithless and unbelieving among us expected to see the fabric of our institutions dissolve into chaos because their idol had fallen. He struck it again; Congress and the States repeated the blow, and its unsightly carcass lies rotting in our streets. The sun shines in the heavens brighter than before. Let us remove the carcass and leave not a vestige of the monster. We shall never have done that, until we have dared to come up to the spirit of the Pilgrim covenant of 1620, and declare that all men shall be consulted in regard to the disposition of their lives, liberty, and property. The Pilgrim fathers proceeded on the doctrine that every man was supposed to know best what he wanted, and had the right to a voice in the disposition of himself.

Is this Congress brave enough and virtuous enough to apply that principle to every citizen, whatever be the color of his skin? The spirit of our Government demands that there shall be no rigid, horizontal strata running across our political society, through which some classes of citizens may never pass up to the surface; but it shall be rather like the ocean where every drop can seek the surface and glisten in the sun. Until we are true enough and brave enough to declare that in this country the humblest, the lowest, the meanest of our citizens shall not be prevented from passing to the highest place he is worthy to attain, we shall never realize freedom in all its glorious meanings. I do not expect we can realize this result immediately. It may be impossible to realize it very soon; but let us keep our eyes fixed in that direction, and march toward that goal.

There is a second great fact which we must recognize, namely, that the seven million white men, lately in rebellion, now stand waiting to have their case adjudged—to have it determined what their status shall be in this Government. Shall they be held under military power; shall they be governed by deputies appointed by the Executive; or shall they again resume the functions of self-government in the Union—are some of the questions growing out of this second fact.

I will proceed to state, in a few words, what seems to me necessary for the practical settlement of this question. In view of the events of the war, and the peculiar and novel situation of the parties and interests concerned; in view of the powers conferred upon us by the Constitution and the laws of war; and in view of the solemn obligations which rest upon us to maintain the freedom, security, and peace of all the citizens of the Republic, I inquire, what practical measures can we adopt best calculated to reach the desired result? It appears to me, sir, that we should take action in regard to persons and in regard to States.

In reference to persons, we must see to it, that hereafter, personal liberty and personal rights are placed in the keeping of the nation; that the right to life, liberty, and property shall be guaranteed to the citizen in reality as they now are in the words of the Constitution, and no longer left to the caprice of mobs or the contingencies of local legislation. If our Constitution does not now afford all the powers necessary to that end, we must ask the people to add them. We must give full force and effect to the provision that "no citizen shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law." We must make it as true in fact as it is in law, that "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States." We must make American citizenship the shield that protects every citizen, on every foot of our soil. The bill now before the House is one of the means for reaching this desirable result.

What shall be done with the States lately in rebellion? How shall we discharge our duty toward them? I shall hail with joy the day when they shall all be again in their places, loyally obedient and fully represented by loyal men. Are they now entitled to admission? Are they worthy of so great confidence? To my mind, Mr. Speaker, the prima facie evidence is against them; the burden of proof rests on each of them to show whether they are fit again to enter the Federal circle in full communion of privileges. We are sitting as a general court of the nation. They are to appear at the bar of the Republic and show cause why they should be brought in. I say the burden of proof is upon their shoulders. When we knew them last they were hurling the lightnings of war against us; they were starving our prisoners of war in their dungeons; they were burning our towns; they were hating the Union above all things, and were bound by bloody oaths to destroy it. Thus stood the case when Congress adjourned ten months ago. They must give us proof, strong as Holy Writ, that they have washed their hands and are worthy again to be trusted. No rumors of change will satisfy me. No Delphic oracle, telling beautiful tales of peace and restoration: no gentle declarations like those we hear from the other side of this Chamber, that the people of the South "have accepted the results of the war," will suffice. I know they have accepted the results of war—as Buckner accepted them at Fort Donelson; as Pemberton accepted them at Vicksburg; as Lee accepted them last April in Virginia.

I hasten to say, Mr. Speaker, that I do not expect seven million men to change their hearts—to love what they hated and hate what they loved—on the issue of a battle. Nor are we set up as a judge over their beliefs, their loves, or their hatreds. Our duty is to demand that before we admit them they shall give us sufficient assurance that, whatever they may think, believe, or wish, their actions in the future shall be such as loyal men can approve. What have they done to give us that assurance?

I hold in my hand, Mr. Speaker, a proclamation issued a few days since by Benjamin G. Humphreys, late a general in the rebel army, now the military governor of Mississippi, which will illustrate the spirit in which it is desired to administer the affairs of reorganized Mississippi. He says:

"Whereas section six of an act of the Legislature of the State of Mississippi, entitled 'An act authorizing the issuance of treasury notes as advance upon cotton, approved December 19, 1861,' provides that whenever the present blockade of the ports of the Confederate States shall be removed, which shall be determined by the proclamation of the Governor declaring the fact, 'the Governor shall, by said proclamation, require all persons to whom advances may have been made to deliver the number of bales of cotton upon which they have received an advance, in accordance with their respective receipts, within ninety days from the date of said proclamation;'

"Now, therefore, I, Benjamin G. Humphreys, Governor of the State of Mississippi, by virtue of the authority vested in me by the constitution and laws of said State, do hereby proclaim that the blockade of the ports of the Confederate States has been removed; and I do require all persons to whom advances have been made to deliver the number of bales of cotton upon which they have received an advance, in accordance with their respective receipts on file in the auditor's office, within ninety days from the date of this proclamation."

Now, what does that mean? That he recognizes as valid the acts of the Legislature of the late rebel State of Mississippi and of the Confederate States, and bases his proclamation thereon. This proclamation only reached us a few days ago. And yet there are members of this House who ask us to admit the Representatives of Mississippi at once.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in the neighboring State of Virginia a law has lately been passed which declares certain negroes vagrants, and provides that as a penalty they may be sold into slavery. Major General Terry, on the 24th of January, issued his military order nullifying that law. Is that a civil government in which the military authorities abrogate the laws? Are the men who make such laws worthy of our confidence? I say again, the case is against them, the burden of proof is on their shoulders. They must purge themselves before I can consent to let them in.

How stands the case in Tennessee, the least treasonable of all? In a letter addressed to yourself, Mr. Speaker, under date of January 15, 1866, after pleading for the admission of the delegation from that State, Governor Brownlow says:

"Standing upon a different footing altogether, it does not follow that if the Tennesseeans are admitted the Representatives from other States lately in rebellion must come in also. Not a man south of Tennessee should be admitted until those States manifest less of the spirit of rebellion, and elect a more loyal set of men, and men who can take the congressional test oath, which but few of those elected can do."

"If the removal of the Federal troops from Tennessee must necessarily follow upon the admission of our congressional delegation to their seats, why, then and in that case, the loyal men of Tennessee beg to be without Representatives in Congress. But our members can be admitted, and a military force retained sufficient to govern and control the rebellious. I tell you, and through you, all whom it may concern, that without a law to disfranchise rebels, and a force to carry out the provisions of that law, this State will pass into the hands of the rebels, and a terrible state of affairs is bound to follow. Union men will be driven from the State, forced to sacrifice what they have, and seek homes elsewhere. And yet Tennessee is in a much better condition than any of the other revolted States, and affords a stronger loyal population.

"Those who suppose the South is 'reconstructed,' and that her people cheerfully accept the results of the war, are fearfully deceived. The whole South is full of the spirit of rebellion, and the people are growing more bitter and insolent every day. Rebel newspapers are springing up all over the South, and speaking out in terms of bitterness and reproach against the Government of the United States. These papers lead the people, and at the same time reflect their sentiments and feelings. Of the twenty-one papers in Tennessee fourteen are decidedly rebel, outspoken and undisguised, some of them pretending to acquiesce in the existing state of affairs. In all the vacancies occurring in our Legislature, even with our franchise law in force, rebels are invariably returned, and in some instances rebel officers, limping from wounds received in battle fighting against the United States forces; and yet I tell you that Tennessee is in a better condition than any other revolted State.

"Others will give you a more favorable account. I cannot in justice to myself and the truth. I think I know the southern people. I have lived fifty-eight years in the South of choice, and two at the North of necessity."

In view of these facts we await further proofs. But, sir, there is a duty laid upon us by the Constitution. That duty is declared in these words:

"The United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government."

What does that mean? Read the twenty-first and forty-third numbers of the Federalist, and you will understand what the fathers of the Constitution meant when they put that clause in our organic law. With wonderful foresight, amounting almost to prophecy, they appear to have foreseen just such a contingency as the one that has arisen. Madison said that an insurrection might arise too powerful to be suppressed by the local authorities, and Congress must have authority to put it down and to see that no usurping government shall be erected on the ruins of a State.

What is a republican form of government? When these States were admitted into the Union, there was not one of them in which one tenth of the citizens were disfranchised. I will read a few words from one of the ablest men that ever stood upon this floor, that man so untimely dead, so sadly and lately removed from among us, whose words were like flaming swords, and who was intellectually one of the greatest and most gallant of men—Henry Winter Davis. He is here describing the conditions of a republican Government, and after premising that at the formation of the Constitution all the States but three admitted free colored persons as citizens, he says: "In Virginia there was but one free colored man to thirty-six of the population; in South Carolina one to seventy-seven; in Georgia one to one hundred and twenty-eight," and so on; showing that there were not more than one tenth of the adult males in any State disfranchised. And now, says he, we are asked to recognize as republican such despotism as the following:

"In North Carolina 631,000 citizens will ostracize 331,000; in Virginia, 619,000 citizens will ostracize 533,000 citizens; in Alabama, 596,000 citizens will ostracize 465,000 citizens; in Louisiana, 357,000 citizens will ostracize 350,000 citizens; in Mississippi, 353,000 citizens will ostracize 436,000 citizens; in South Carolina, 291,000 citizens will ostracize 411,000 citizens."

We are asked to guaranty all these as republican governments! Gentlemen upon the other side of the House ask us to let such shameless despotisms as these be represented here as republican States. I venture to assert that a more monstrous proposition was never before made to an American Congress.

I am therefore in favor of the amendment to the Constitution that passed the other day to reform the basis of representation. I could have wished that it had been more thorough and searching in its terms. I took it as the best we could get; but I say here, before this House, that I will never, so long as I have any voice in political affairs, rest satisfied until the way is opened by which these citizens, so soon as they are worthy, shall be lifted to the full rights of citizenship. I will not be factious in my action here. If

I cannot to-day get all I desire, I will try again to-morrow, securing all that can be obtained to-day. But so long as I have any voice or vote here, they shall aid in giving the suffrage to every citizen qualified, by intelligence, to exercise it.

Mr. Speaker, I know of nothing more dangerous to a Republic than to put into its very midst four million people stripped of every attribute of citizenship, robbed of the right of representation, but bound to pay taxes to the Government. If they can endure it, we cannot. The murderer is to be pitied more than the murdered man; the robber more than the robbed. And we who defraud four million citizens of their rights are injuring ourselves vastly more than we are injuring the black man whom we rob.

Mr. KERR obtained the floor.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I move that my colleague [Mr. GARFIELD] be allowed time to conclude his remarks.

No objection was made.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am very much obliged to the House for the courtesy they have extended to me. It is the first time I have ever had occasion to ask this indulgence.

I say that slavery, and the inequality of rights before the law which are now a part of our system, are more dangerous to us than to the black man whom it disfranchises. It is like a foreign substance in the body, a thorn in the flesh; it will wound and disease the body politic.

I remember that this question of suffrage caused one of the greatest civil wars in the history of Rome. Ninety years before Christ, when Rome was in the grandeur of its glory, just before the dawn of the Augustan age, twelve States of Italy to which the franchise was denied rose in rebellion against Rome. And after three years and ten months of bloody war they compelled Rome to make its first capitulation for three hundred years. For three hundred years the Roman eagle had been carried triumphantly over every battle-field. But when iron Rome, with all her grandeur and glory, met men who were fighting for the right of suffrage, she was compelled to succumb, and give the ballot to the twelve States to save herself from dissolution. Let us learn wisdom from that lesson and extend the suffrage to people who may one day bring us more disaster than foreign or domestic war has yet done.

I must refer for a moment to the proposition of my friend from Connecticut, [Mr. DEMING,] who asks us to imbed in the imperishable bulwarks of the Constitution an amendment that will forbid secession in the future. I want no such change of the Constitution. They never had by the Constitution the right to secede. If we have not settled that question by war it can never be settled by a court. That court of last resort is higher than any other tribunal. As the Governor of Ohio has so well said:

"These things have been decided in the dread court of last resort for peoples and nations. By as much as the shock of armed hosts is more grand than the intellectual tilt of lawyers, as the God of battles is a more awful judge than any earthly court, by so much does the dignity of this contest and the finality of this decision exceed that of any human tribunal."

"There are some things to which courts of law can add no sanction, and a nation's appeal to God when it seizes the sword is one of them. We may, when necessary, try individual traitors, and the people of the United States will appear as prosecutor, but not as defendant at the bar."

I care not what provision might be in the Constitution; if any States of this Union desire to rebel and break up the Union, and are able to do it, they will do it in spite of the Constitution. All I want, therefore, is so to amend our Constitution and administer our laws as shall secure liberty and loyalty among the citizens of the rebel States. I am not among those who believe that all men in the South are enemies in the eye of the law. Their property was "enemy's property," when it was transported and used contrary to the laws of the Government; but all are not therefore enemies of the Government. Judge Sprague, in the Amy Warwick case, distinctly declared that they were only enemies in a technical sense, namely, in reference to property, and not in any other respect. Justice Nelson, in 1862, declared distinctly that men who resided within the limits of the rebellious States were not therefore to be considered as enemies.

Mr. STEVENS. Does not that decision refer to the question of criminality; that they are enemies in every sense except that of being criminals?

Mr. GARFIELD. The court distinctly declared that the question of their property being enemy's property depended upon the use made of it. If the attempt was made to take the property out in opposition to law, then it fell under the technical category of enemy's property, and not otherwise. I take it for granted that the farm of Andrew Johnson, in Tennessee, was never enemy's property. If he had undertaken to violate the revenue laws in his use of his property, it would have become "enemy's property." If the distinguished gentleman from East Tennessee (Mr. Maynard) had undertaken to violate the revenue laws his property would then have become "enemy's property."

I do not regard all these men as enemies of the country. I remember that the long range of mountains which reaches from West Virginia down to Georgia, and terminates in the sand-hills of Mississippi, stood like a promontory of rock in the fiery ruin with which the rebellion had involved the Republic. I remember that East Tennessee with its loyal thousands stood out like a rock in the sea of treason. I remember that thirty-five thousand brave men from Tennessee stood beside us to assist in putting down the rebellion. They are not enemies of the country, and never were; and it is cruelly wicked, by any fiction of the law, to call them enemies of the country. To those distinguished men of Tennessee—and I see some of them in this Hall whom I reverence as loyal and patriotic men—let me say that I am not dissatisfied with them; but I want them and their friends to show that there is behind them a loyal government; that a loyal State government has been organized, based on the will of loyal people, and that in that State districts of loyal constituents have sent loyal men here. Satisfy me that there is a loyal State, loyal by the will of its people, that there are districts of loyal constituents, and that they send loyal Representatives, and those Representatives shall at once have my vote in favor of their admission. But, as I said before, the burden of proof is on their shoulders. Let them present that proof, and I will vote affirmatively on the question of their admission, and rejoice that I am enabled to do so.

Mr. Speaker, let us learn a lesson from the dealing of God with the Jewish nation. When His chosen people, led by the pillar of cloud and fire, had crossed the Red sea and traversed the gloomy wilderness with its thundering Sinai, its bloody battles, disastrous defeats, and glorious victories; when near the end of their perilous pilgrimage they listened to the last words of blessing and warning from their great leader before he was buried with immortal honors by the angel of the Lord; when at last the victorious host, sadly joyful, stood on the banks of the Jordan, their enemies drowned in the sea or slain in the wilderness, they paused and made solemn preparation to pass over and possess the land of promise. By the command of God, given through Moses and enforced by his great successor, the ark of the covenant, containing the tables of the law and the sacred memorials of their pilgrimage, was borne by chosen men two thousand cubits in advance of the people. On the further shore stood Ebal and Gerizim, the mounts of cursing and blessing, from which, in the hearing of all the people, were pronounced the curses of God against injustice and disobedience, and His blessing upon justice and obedience. On the shore, between the mountains and in the midst of the people, a monument was erected, and on it was written the words of the law, "to be a memorial unto the children of Israel forever and ever." Let us learn wisdom from this illustrious example. We have passed the Red sea of slaughter; our garments are yet wet with its crimson spray. We have crossed the fearful wilderness of war, and have left our four hundred thousand heroes to sleep beside the dead enemies of the Republic. We have heard the voice of God amid the thunders of battle commanding us to wash our hands of iniquity, to "proclaim liberty throughout all the land unto all the inhabitants thereof." When we spurned His counsels we were defeated, and the gulfs of ruin yawned before us. When we obeyed His voice, He gave us victory. And now at last, we have reached the confines of the wilderness. Before us is the land of promise, the land of hope, the land of peace, filled with possibilities of greatness and glory too vast for the grasp of the imagination. Are we worthy to enter it? On what condition may it be ours to enjoy and transmit to our children's children? Let us pause and make deliberate and solemn preparation. Let us, as Representatives of the people, whose servants we are, bear in advance the sacred ark of republican liberty, with its tables of the law inscribed with the "irreversible guarantees" of liberty. Let us here build a monument on which shall be written not only the curses of the law against treason, disloyalty, and oppression, but also an everlasting covenant of peace and blessing with loyalty, liberty, and obedience; and all the people will say, Amen.

Freedmen's Bureau.

SPEECH OF HON. L. H. ROUSSEAU,

OF KENTUCKY,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 3, 1866.

The House having under consideration the bill (S. No. 60) to enlarge the powers of the Freedmen's Bureau—

Mr. ROUSSEAU said:

Mr. SPEAKER: Although I have had no reason to question the veracity of the gentleman either then or now, yet I think he will hereafter have reason to doubt the accuracy of his memory. But he got about as near the truth as people generally do concerning such matters, having exaggerated the fact only fourfold.

Now, sir, I do not propose to justify here any of the wrongs alleged by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] to have been committed in the State of Alabama. I do not seek to justify wrong of any sort. I know nothing about the instances of injustice cited by the gentleman. All that I will say is, that the data was exceedingly meager for any argument attempted to be founded upon it. I propose here to discuss the principles of this freedmen's bill. I am opposed to it; not in any partisan spirit nor from any prejudices, but because of the oppressions that such a law must lead to, and the injury that it must inevitably bring to the colored race.

This bill emanates from a party with which I have acted for the last four years. I am not a Republican; I was a Whig and am a Union man, and belong to the Union party, and I am sorry to say that the Union party and the Republican party are not always convertible terms, in my judgment. My reasons for this statement may appear as I proceed. I have acted with the Republican party in its measures to suppress the rebellion. I have given it a hearty support for the last four years. I have sustained it blindly, asking no questions, because I believed the Government of the United States was in the hands of that party, to be saved or lost. I was told at the outset of these difficulties that, representing the loyalty of the nation, that party undertook to suppress the rebellion, to restore the authority of the United States, and reestablish the original status of States in all the dignity and rights which they had before the rebellion. It was said not only to southern men, but all over the United States, that they owed a paramount allegiance to the United States Government, and that no man could be released from such allegiance to the Federal Government. I subscribed to that doctrine. It is the doctrine of that man in whose principles I have believed, whose talents and eloquence we all admired. It was the doctrine of Henry Clay, of Kentucky, and not for one moment since our troubles began have I thought of doubting it, much less of abandoning it.

I believed, sir, that the Republican party in the outset of this war would save the Government. I had no doubt about it. I had no doubt that any party that represented the United States would save the Government. The rebellion is now suppressed. We have peace. I care not what gentlemen may say; but, sir, there is not in the whole United States of America one single armed rebel to-day. How, then, can gentlemen talk about existing war? The existing state of things in the country affords no excuse for the passage of a bill of this description, outrageous in all its features. It proposes to confer powers such as never were heard of as having been conferred by the Congress of the United States, either upon judicial officers or upon regularly-established courts; and here these powers are proposed to be conferred upon mere irresponsible agents, military subalterns, lieutenants, captains, and majors of the Army, [A VOICE. "And politicians,"] and, as suggested, politicians. May the Lord save us from them! I mean no disrespect to the politicians upon this floor, [laughter,] but of all military men, relieve me and the Army from the "military" man who wants to fill some petty office, for he only eats up rations that better and more serviceable men should have. [Laughter.]

I say, sir, that this bill is oppressive in all its features; and I wish to say to the House in justice to my own position, that I am for any and all measures, I do not care what they are, that are just and necessary to take care of these unfortunate people. There is not one of them, the poorest and meanest and humblest in the United States, in defense of whose rights, if I saw them assailed, I would not stake my life, and the poorer and humbler the quicker would I do it. I would protect that people in every proper way, but we do not need to protect them at the expense of the rights of other people. I draw no distinction between blacks and whites so far as the rights of person and property are concerned. We have distinctions that we cannot to-day get rid of, and we have others still that we do not want to abolish. But this bill sweeps all such distinctions pretty much away. I undertake to say that if the enforcement of this bill is placed in the hands of prejudiced men who go South with their minds made up upon this subject, made up in the way that the gentlemen from Pennsylvania [Messrs. STREVELS and KELLEY] would have them, insults and outrages that no community on earth could bear will be of daily and hourly occurrence.

You do not know, Mr. Speaker, gentlemen here do not know, what the loyal element in the South has to bear in matters of this sort. The Union cause in Kentucky has gone down; and why has it gone down? Why, from these abuses and oppressions which loyal men cannot defend and which the community cannot bear. I tell you, sir, that gentlemen in this House ought to look to these things and have at least a little respect and a little kindly feeling for men who have stood true to the Government in its trials. Take care of the negroes, in God's name, and I will help you, but do not place these extraordinary powers in the hands of a body of men who will oppress, insult, and outrage our people. What are those powers? I ask the Clerk to read the seventh and eighth sections of the bill.

The Clerk read, as follows:

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That whenever in any State or district in which the ordinary course of judicial proceedings has been interrupted by the rebellion, and wherein, in consequence of any State or local law, ordinance, police, or other regulation, custom, or prejudice, any of the civil rights or immunities belonging to white persons, including the right to make and enforce contracts, to sue, be parties, and give evidence, to inherit, purchase, lease, sell, hold, and convey real and personal property, and to have full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings for the security of person and estate, are refused or denied to negroes, mulattoes, freedmen, refugees, or any other persons, on account of race, color, or any previous condition of slavery or involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, or wherein they or any of them are subjected to any other or different punishment, pains, or penalties, for the commission of any act or offense, than are prescribed for white persons committing like acts or offenses, it shall be the duty of the President of the United States, through the Commissioner, to extend military protection and jurisdiction over all cases affecting such persons so discriminated against.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That any person who, under color of any State or local law, ordinance, police, or other regulation, or custom, shall, in any State or district in which the ordinary course of judicial proceedings has been interrupted by the rebellion, subject or cause to be subjected any negro, mulatto, freedman, refugee, or other person, on account of race or color, or any previous condition of slavery or involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, or for any other cause, to the deprivation of any civil right secured to white persons, or to any other or different punishment than white persons are subject to for the commission of like acts or offenses, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000, or imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both; and it shall be the duty of the officers and agents of this bureau to take jurisdiction of and hear and determine all offenses committed against the provisions of this section, and also of all cases affecting negroes, mulattoes, freedmen, refugees, or other persons who are discriminated against in any of the particulars mentioned in the preceding section of this act, under such rules and regulations as the President of the United States, through the War Department, shall prescribe.

Mr. ROUSSEAU. Now, Mr. Speaker, these are very extraordinary powers for the Congress of the United States to confer. They are powers which the Constitution of the United States forbids in the provisions in regard to the judicial power, to trial by jury and the security to person and property from unreasonable search, and in various other provisions. But granting that Congress could confer these powers upon courts, which certainly it cannot do, I ask the members of the House, in view of their oaths to support the Constitution, if they can possibly confer these powers on the mere agents of the Freedmen's Bureau; lieutenants, if you please, and captains in the Army, or citizens, not of the proper locality, but gatherers of crumbs falling from the tables of politicians all over the country? I need not go into an argument to show how far this bill is unconstitutional. The whole bill, root and branch, is without warrant and against the organic law. At one blow it sweeps away the constitution and laws of Kentucky, courts, juries, justices of the peace, sheriffs, and everybody who denies to the negro the civil rights laid down in this bill; all these are liable to be arrested by the agents of this bureau and fined and imprisoned, not exceeding a fine of $1,000 and imprisonment for one year. Our ministers of the gospel who refuse to solemnize marriages between whites and blacks, that they are sworn not to solemnize, may be arrested and taken before the agents of this bureau. Our justices of the peace, who will not allow negroes to testify in their courts, may be treated in the same way. A judge of any court while trying a cause may be taken from the bench and imprisoned for one year by the agents, the subalterns of the Freedmen's Bureau, and fined $1,000.

Now, sir, I ask gentlemen here if they can vote for a bill of this sort? Can we not secure all the rights of the negroes without thus outraging the feelings of the people of the southern States, and also of the people of the northern States, in consequence of the condition of things which this bill would create? I think we are bad off if we cannot. Sir, this class legislation will prove injurious to the race it professes to shield and protect. You raise a spirit of antagonism between the black race and the white race in our country, and the law-abiding will be powerless to control it. And if you get this feeling excited up to a certain point, and the whole of one race shall be thus arrayed against the other, you may send there all the armies you can raise, you may send soldiers into every county and every precinct in the States, but you will never be able to prevent violence and bloodshed there. When men become bent on mischief, as the operation of this bill will be sure to make them, you cannot raise force enough to prevent it. I do not state this by way of threat. I speak of it as a fact which we owe it to ourselves to consider.

This House does not know what has been the operation of this Freedmen's Bureau. I desire to accuse no man. I believe the head of the bureau in my section is a gentleman and a clever man, and wishes to do right. I may be allowed to name the gentleman to whom I allude; I mean General Fisk. But he is not always present to look after these things, and I do not know what he would do if he were present. Men whose minds are prejudiced on this subject are not to be trusted. We are not to be trusted; nobody is to be fully trusted. All of us require to be watched; and that is what I would have this bureau to do, to look after the interests of these people and to take care of them. But in doing that let us not destroy the liberties of the communities in which this race reside.

Now, I wish to state a fact that came within my own knowledge for the information of this House. In my town, the city of Louisville, the commercial metropolis of the State, we had a man placed at the head of the bureau there who had some queer notions, which men generally get who have a particular duty to perform, a duty involving prejudice, hate, and bitterness. He considered every man in the country who did not believe as he did to be his enemy, the enemy of the Government, and the enemy of the negro. What was the result of his course? He would arrest any man, no matter whom, the most inoffensive and the most loyal, on the ex parte statement of a negro. And when the man was brought into his presence, he would turn to the negro making the statement, and say "Brother," or "Sister," as it might happen, "what has this man been doing to you?" And then he would take the testimony of negroes against him, and sitting as a court, he would punish him by fine and imprisonment, or by a fine alone, ordering him to be imprisoned "unless the fine was paid." Now, these are things I have from the most reliable authority.

And I will mention another case. A man by the name of Blevins in my town came home one evening and found his wife engaged in some controversy and collision with a negro woman who had been her servant—not one who had belonged to her as her slave. He took part with his wife, as I think any gentleman ought to have done, whether his wife were right or wrong. The negro woman complained to this agent of the bureau, and a couple of negro soldiers were sent there to arrest him and his wife. And because one of his little girls had said something in the matter an order was also sent for her arrest. The man came to me, supposing that I might be able to assist him. I asked the post commander how it happened such things were allowed. He said, "This Freedmen's Bureau, it is said, is over us all; what can I do?" I replied, "If I commanded this post I would know who it was who ordered the military to arrest the people without my knowledge, and I would stop it. While I was commandant I would do my duty. If the authorities did not like it, they could send me away." Early the next morning I went to the commandant's headquarters and there I found Mr. Blevins and his wife and children seeking protection against the Freedmen's Bureau, acting on the complaint of the negro woman.

Now, sir, I told the agent of that bureau then just what I thought and felt in reference to this matter. I said to him, "If you want to protect the freedmen of this community I am with you heart and soul; I will stand by you in all just measures; but if you intend to arrest white people on the ex parte statements of negroes, and hold them to suit your convenience for trial, and fine and imprison them, then I say that I oppose you; and if you should so arrest and punish me, I would kill you when you set me at liberty; and I think that you would do the same to a man who would treat you in that way, if you are the man I think you are, and the man you ought to be to fill your position here."

I tell you, sir, that no community of the United States can endure a system of this sort. Such have been the operations of this bureau under the old law. What will be its operations under this bill Heaven only knows. I cannot even imagine what a man may not assume the right to do under the provisions of this bill. If those who are to be appointed under this act should adopt the latitude of construction adopted by my venerable friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] if they carry out his notions in reference to the force of the Constitution and the effect of the rebellion, they can find a warrant for anything they may wish to do.

Mr. CHANLER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. CHANLER. My point of order is that my colleague from New York [Mr. CONKLING] and the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. STEVENS] are out of order in holding a conversation while the gentleman from Kentucky is addressing the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point of order is well taken. Gentlemen will resume their seats and not converse in an audible tone.

Mr. ROUSSEAU. It was no disturbance to me whatever. Are not such things customary here?

Mr. CONKLING. Before the gentleman from Kentucky resumes his speech, I beg his permission to make a remark.

Mr. ROUSSEAU. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. My colleague from some district—the seventh or the eighth, or somewhere there—has made a remark with the apparent purpose of conveying to the gentleman from Kentucky the impression that his speech was not listened to here, or that something was going on in derogation of that politeness due to the gentleman. I beg, therefore, to assure him that it was his speech which was the subject upon which a single remark was passing between gentlemen here. I submit to the gentleman who made this point of order with so much originality and genius, whether it was worth while to call the attention of the House to what was really a perfectly respectful proceeding to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. ROUSSEAU. I am very much obliged to the gentleman for any portion of his attention. I do not expect to get the gentleman to vote with me on this bill, though I wish he would. I wish that he, a good, loyal man, would stand out with me for the right, as I have stood with him for the last four years. I wish that I could induce him and other gentlemen who will vote with him to look at this matter without prejudice. Remember, sir, that although I am not, properly speaking, a Republican, I am a Union man, good and true, as I believe; and I think that I am entitled to the gentleman's attention and his confidence when I state what I know as to the operations of this bureau.

Sir, as I remarked before, the judicial and other officers of Kentucky, if they refuse to violate their oaths in obedience to the behests of the agents of this bureau, may be arrested and punished by them, this bureau acting as an appellate court on all subjects, while appeals lie from it nowhere.

If you get on the cars with your wife and daughter, and if there be a spare seat, and a drunken negro comes forward to take it, and you ask him if he pleases to move a little further off, and he takes a notion that he will not do it, and should report to the bureau that because he was a negro he was not allowed to take that seat, this Freedmen's Bureau may at once arrest you and your daughter, and fine and imprison both. I say this bill authorizes that thing, and I defy any one of its friends to successfully combat that position. If you go to a theater in a place where this Freedmen's Bureau is established, and, not because they are negroes, but because they are unfit and ignorant persons, they are told they have no right to go and take seats with your family, and you prevent it, the bureau may arrest and imprison you. If a judge decides that a negro cannot be sworn in a cause being tried in his court, under the laws of a State which he has sworn to administer, why, sir, before that decision is cold upon his lips they may arrest and take him off to the agent of the bureau and punish him as before stated.

Mr. Speaker, I ask members here, and especially the Union men of this House, to answer and tell me whether they would submit to such outrages? If they would not submit to them, will they then ask the Union men of the South, who have stood by the Government, to submit to them? If they do, all I have to say is that we cannot and will not submit to them.

But, sir, there is no necessity for these outrages. Laws should be provided ample in their character to protect that race if they are not now sufficient, and I think they are not. And, as I have already said, if these things do occur they will destroy all feeling of good will between the whites and the blacks in that country. I repeat, when ill feeling has thus been created all the armies you may raise cannot protect them.

Where now is the Freedmen's Bureau? Why did not its agents prevent the hangings and imprisonments of which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] has spoken? The Freedmen's Bureau is in Alabama, and the military are still there. No, sir, it cannot be done. So far as I understand the operations of the bureau, it lies around the towns in the State of Kentucky to harass and oppress, and by oppressions to put upon the loyal men of that State issues that they cannot carry; issues which they cannot defend. Let us first do right ourselves, and then we can demand that all others shall do it.

Mr. ELIOT. I only desire to inquire of the gentleman from Kentucky whether he has it in his power to state the name of any agent within the State of Kentucky who has had charge of matters under the bureau and who has exposed himself to this censure?

Mr. ROUSSEAU. Yes, sir. I never say anything that I am not willing to stand by. I will not come here and make such allusions to persons and refuse their names when called for by their friends. I refer to Colonel McCaleb, as one of the men connected with the Freedmen's Bureau in Kentucky, and he is the man whom I told that if he undertook to arrest me and my family as others had been arrested and punished I would kill him. And Captain Kennedy was another I referred to.

Mr. ELIOT. I ask the gentleman whether Mr. Kennedy was not appointed in Kentucky before the bureau took charge of affairs there?

Mr. ROUSSEAU. I do not know. Colonel McCaleb, who preceded him, received orders from General Fiske.

Mr. ELIOT. Is it not true that Mr. Kennedy was appointed by a gentleman who occupied the position of post commander?

Mr. ROUSSEAU. Yes, sir.

Mr. ELIOT. And is it not true that Mr. Kennedy was removed from his office within a few days after the bureau took charge under the present officer?

Mr. ROUSSEAU. I do not know how many days afterward; but I do know that he committed more outrages there than the people will be able to forget in thirty years.

39TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Freedmen's Bureau—Mr. Rousseau.

HO. OF REPS.

Mr. ELIOT. Is it not also true, on the removal of Mr. Kennedy, the gentleman himself was called upon by the assistant commissioner there to recommend a successor; and whether he did not recommend the gentleman who has ever since occupied that position?

Mr. ROUSSEAU. I was called on before his removal, and I did recommend Colonel W. P. Thomasson, who is a gentleman in every way unexceptionable, and who now fills that position.

Mr. ELIOT. Mr. Kennedy being out of the way, can the gentleman name any other gentleman connected with the Freedmen's Bureau against whom he complains?

Mr. ROUSSEAU. I have had no further acquaintance with them, and I am sorry that I have had any. [Laughter.]

Mr. ELIOT. That is all.

Mr. ROUSSEAU. Mr. Speaker, I wish now to call the attention of the House to a letter sent up here from Charleston. It emanates from one Reuben Tomlinson, one of those gentlemen, I suppose, who go down South for their own purposes, and are constantly writing back what they are doing, and taking great credit to themselves.

"CHARLESTON, S. C., October, 13, 1865.

"DEAR SIR: I am now endeavoring to start the schools in this city. There are in Charleston four public-school buildings: the Normal, St. Philip's street, Morris street, and Meeting street buildings. The Meeting street school is a small and very insignificant affair; the others are very fine houses. The old trustees have applied to be put in possession of them. This General Saxton has refused unless they will agree to give a fair share of them to the colored children. They refuse to do this. The Normal, Morris street, and Meeting street schools I have opened and they are already well filled with colored children. The white children, of course, do not attend."

There are four school-houses in Charleston, and this gentleman takes credit to himself for having taken possession of the whole of them and used them for the benefit of the colored people to the exclusion of the whites.

Mr. Speaker, when I was a boy, and in common with all other Kentucky boys was brought in company with negroes, we used to talk, as to any project, about having "a white man's chance." It seems to me that now a man may be very happy if he can get "a negro's chance." Here are four school-houses taken possession of, and unless they mix up white children with black, the white children can have no chance in these schools for instruction. And so it is wherever this Freedmen's Bureau operates.

Sir, what will be the result of all this? It will result in that state of feeling I have spoken of which Union men in my section of the country want to keep down.

Mr. Speaker, I am told that the Constitution and laws of the land are nothing just now because we are in a state of war. I do not care what may be said about the theory that a state of war may exist without any declaration of it or existing hostilities, but I say there is no such state of war among the people who are brethren and fellow-citizens of a common country as to justify these illegal interferences.

But, sir, four years ago we began resistance to the efforts of the rebels to put down this Government. We were told that this war was for the Union. But we are told now that the rebel States are out of the Union, and that all these laws may of right and must of necessity be passed, and that we must sweep away the constitution and laws of these States as this bill does. As I have already suggested, you may arrest the judges of Kentucky, not by warrant of law, but by order of a subaltern of this bureau, and deprive them of liberty. You may take away the liberty of any man, woman, or child without warrant of law, without affidavit, but upon the ex parte statement of any vagabond negro who strolls through the country.

And we are told that these States are not in the Union. Why, sir, how is this? Was there a soldier in the whole Army of the United States who fought in this war for the preservation of the Union who did not do so to save the Government of his country? And yet, when the war is at an end and the rebellion dead, we are told by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHELLABARGER] that it does not matter in the least how the war might end, whether the rebellion was suppressed or not, the Union is at any rate dissolved; that our nationality is dead, but the consolation is afforded us that the Republican party still lives, and to keep it alive and in power the organic law must be amended.

Now, sir, as I before said, I have acted with that party and would act with it still. I want to stay with the loyal men of this country. But, sir, I find there are northern as well as southern secessionists, and they not only seek the same result but adopt pretty much the same reasoning on that subject. I am not willing to act with either, and I care not whether either or both are honest in the belief that secession could be or is accomplished. I do not value, in the least, honesty in treason.

They told me at the beginning of this war that Jefferson Davis and his co-traitors were honest in their belief that they could secede. I knew they could not. I knew there were but two ways in which they could secede; one was according to the law of the land, and the other was by force. You all say they could not do it by the law of the land; and I ask you if we did not put down the force by which they attempted to carry out their purpose? Sir, we southern men have fought our share in this war. We have gone through more trials than you know of. We have aided in bringing the war to a triumphant close, we have aided in gaining the victory upon which the life of the Government depended, and now, when we come here, those who profess extreme loyalty get up and coolly tell us to "Stand off; you are enemies of the country."

A few days ago my friend from Ohio on my right [Mr. DELANO] made a report, and he was complimented with much honeyed commendation, to use an old expression, by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CONKLING] for making that report, that the people down in the insurrectionary States were enemies to the Government, and that he could make no distinction between loyal and disloyal men in the southern States. I ask those gentlemen to-day, and I wish they were able to answer me, when the loyal men in the southern States became enemies to their country? Did they do so by the secession of these States, which all these gentlemen said was a nullity? Why, sir, upon the principle these gentlemen contend for, the southern man who, while defending the flag of his country in the face of the enemy, if he had left his wife and children behind him, they were enemies of the Government because they were left in the seceded States. I do not believe a word of all this. It cannot be true. We have cut ourselves loose; we have broken every tie that bound us to our people; brother has been against brother and father against son; and yet when we come to the legislative halls of the nation and ask for that protection which we think we are entitled to, we are told that we are enemies to the Government, and must wait the convenience of gentlemen for even a consideration of our claims.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. ROUSSEAU. I would rather go on.

Mr. CONKLING. As the gentleman has referred to me, I desire to set him right on a statement of fact.

Mr. ROUSSEAU. Excuse me, if you please. I would rather go on. I do not like to have my train of thought broken in upon.

Mr. CONKLING. The gentleman does not state correctly the position I took.

Mr. ROUSSEAU. Then I yield, of course.

Mr. CONKLING. I trust I shall not interfere with the gentleman's line of argument by saying that he quite misapprehends, and therefore quite misstates, the position which I took.

The remark which he refers to was a question I propounded to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DELANO.]

Mr. ROUSSEAU. Perhaps I did. I will read it, and the House can see whether I did or not:

"Mr. CONKLING. I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio a question. I wish to say that I listened with very great pleasure to the reading of the report made by the gentleman some days ago, and, having once examined this question, I agree with him, as I understand his report, and I feel for one under great obligation to him. I desire to ask him what is the difference, not as a matter of clemency and discretion, but as a matter of law, between a claim presented by a disloyal person and one presented by a loyal man, if both men were citizens of the country occupied and held by the enemy? I ask the question in the light of the decision of the court in the prize cases."

Mr. DELANO. I do not wish to interrupt the gentleman from Kentucky, but some time in the course of his remarks I desire him to allow me to explain what I meant by the language that I used in reply to the gentleman from New York, if he will give me the opportunity.

Mr. ROUSSEAU. I will do so; and meantime I will read the remarks of the gentleman in reply to the question of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CONKLING.]. He said:

"There may be cases upon this point. But if there are I frankly say to the House that my industry has not brought them under my observation. And if he or any other gentleman knows of any such case I would be obliged to him to inform me. All the time I have been speaking in reference to this distinction between the claims of loyal and disloyal persons I have been speaking in reference to equity and not in reference to law, and I desire the House so to understand me. I have been considering the question in the light of benevolence and equity, rather than in the light of law and strict justice. I think the suggestion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CONKLING] exceedingly pertinent, because it presents to those who see fit to take that view of the subject another reason for rejecting these claims."

"I will add further upon this point that it once occurred to me, while I had this report under consideration and preparation, that those who were brought into the rebellion by the sovereign power of their States—for I acknowledge the sovereignty of States to a limited extent—those who were carried into the rebellion by the sovereign action of their States, so far as they could act, thus being in a certain sense enemies, to whom for some purpose belligerent rights were accorded, must necessarily, upon principles of law, stand upon the same platform with those who caused the rebellion."

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am not going into a discussion of this question, whether the States lately in rebellion are out of the Union or not. Enough has been said about that on my side of the question and on the other side. I wish to state here one single position, and it is one that we have stood upon through the war, and one I expect to stand upon as long as I live, and which nobody shall drive me from, and that is, that every citizen of the United States owes paramount allegiance to the Federal Government, an allegiance that neither the States in one or another capacity, nor the people in any capacity, can release him from, and that this allegiance, when given heartily to the Government, entitles the citizen to all the protection that the Government can give him, and that no matter where or in what State he may be he is entitled to all the rights that belong to any and all other citizens.

That, sir, was the sensible ground that we occupied in the South. But after the war is over, a war waged for the salvation of the Government alone, we are told that these States are out of the Union. I say this war was waged for the salvation of the Government alone. In support of that assertion I will ask the Clerk to read the resolution adopted by this House the day after the battle of Bull Run. It is hardly necessary to refer to it; but I will ask the Clerk to read it.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"Resolved by the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, That the present deplorable civil war has been forced upon the country by the disunionists of the southern States, now in arms against the constitutional Government, and in arms around the capital; that in this national emergency Congress, banishing all feelings of mere passion or resentment, will recollect only its duty to the whole country; that this war is not waged on their part in any spirit of oppression, or for any purpose of conquest or subjugation, or purpose of overthrowing or interfering with the rights or established institutions of those States, but to defend and maintain the supremacy of the Constitution and to preserve the Union, with all the dignity, equality, and rights of the several States unimpaired; and that as soon as these objects are accomplished the war ought to cease."

Mr. ROUSSEAU. The day after the battle of Bull Run that resolution, as I understand, was adopted by this House. The nation then trembled for its safety, and no one could tell how this war would end. The people of the United States then wanted every loyal man to come up to the work, and show that he regarded his allegiance to the General Government as paramount to everything else. The country needed help then. And we in the South went forth on that platform, and we fought through this war upon it.

I shall not forget what occurred the day we heard of the result of the battle of Bull Run. I was then in camp "Joe Holt," with perhaps fifteen hundred enlisted soldiers, without a tent, without food, without money, and without credit. I remember the night on which the news of the battle of Bull Run was received in Louisville. The enemies of the Government held a meeting in that city, and a speech was made by a Mr. Symral, who afterward joined the rebellion. He congratulated the audience on the result of that battle, and said that "Our enemies have been beaten and driven from the field." Some one who happened to think of it, said, "What will now become of Rousseau's brigade?" And they almost stamped the house down in derision of what would become of the handful of men I had under my command.

But when this resolution of the House, introduced by Mr. Crittenden, so loved and honored by every Kentuckian, came out, it strengthened the southern men in the cause of their country. They told the people that this was not a war for subjugation, for degradation of the southern people, but a war for the preservation of the Government, and to restore the Federal authority all over the land.

Let me ask the gentleman if, at any time before the battle of Bull Run, or soon after it, when you were in want of men for your Army, they had been told that the Union was to be dissolved at any rate, whether we suppressed the rebellion or not, how many men South would have taken up arms to fight in such a cause? Not one, sir; not one. I would have laid down my life before I would have done it. I would not have turned against my own people in a mere sectional war, for I love my own section best. I would not join the North as a mere section in a war against my people. The war recently closed never was a war between the North and the South; it was the United States against its domestic enemies. Yet, sir, men who have stood true to the Government throughout all this contest, and have been duly and legally elected to seats here, are refused admission to this House as members. Not only that, sir, but I noticed the other day a degree of hesitancy on the part of gentlemen here to extend to these honorable and loyal men, coming here as Representatives, the mere right to sit on this floor till their cases shall be decided. And two days ago there was an absolute flat refusal to admit the Arkansas delegation to the privileges of this floor till their cases were determined.

Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether gentlemen, in casting that vote, knew that they were repulsing and closing their doors upon men in that Arkansas delegation who have fought in defense of the Government for three years. When members voted against the admission of Maynard and Leftwich and Campbell and Hawkins and Cooper and Stokes, I wonder whether they knew the important services which those men have rendered to the Government. Maynard you have had with you in times of your trepidation. When you wanted help you would take these men from the South, if they came here but half elected. They now come here wholly elected, and, as I contend, fairly elected, and you reject them. Campbell, of Tennessee, was a colonel in the United States Army, and during the Mexican war led his regiment in the capture of the "Bishop's Palace" at Monterey. He has stood true to the Government up to this hour. How is it as to Cooper? Sir, a little over one year ago the terrible conflict between Thomas and Hood took place at Nashville. I, with my force, at Murfreesboro, was cut off from communication with my commander-in-chief; and on the 14th day of December, 1864, exactly one year prior to the day on which the vote was taken refusing him a seat in this House, Cooper slept in my tent to escape hanging by Hood's army, having been driven from his home by its approach. Leftwich has gone through a similar ordeal. Stokes was for weeks hiding out in the woods to keep from being hanged; and afterward he raised a regiment and fought bravely for his country. But now, when the war is over and the rebellion suppressed, these men come, and you tell them that they cannot be admitted upon this floor as Representatives of their State.

"Enemies!" Why sir, I ask my friend from Ohio [Mr. DELANO] when our enmity to the Government began.

Mr. DELANO. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ROUSSEAU. In a moment.

Sir, my State seceded after a fashion. We had for a time a provisional governor. General Bragg, with his army, inaugurated a rebel governor in the capital of the State, and took the State out of the Union in a certain way. But, sir, will the gentleman tell me that this made me an enemy of the Government? Will he tell me that the man from Tennessee or Mississippi or Alabama who fought on the side of the Government throughout the war was an enemy because some of the disloyal citizens of his State claimed that they had carried the State out of the Union? Why, sir, when did our enmity begin? Did it begin at Shiloh, or Perryville, at Stone River, Chattanooga, or Donelson? Not a battle has been fought in the West, and not one in the East, without some southern blood enriching the soil, blood freely poured out for preserving the integrity of the Union.

I deny the whole doctrine. I utterly repudiate it. I look with utter scorn upon the doctrine that any mortal man can make me an enemy to my country in fact or in law. The doctrine is false in law, false in logic, and utterly false in fact.

The truth, sir, is that the war is over, and we have peace in the country. We have a different state of things. I am not disappointed except when I come into this Hall and hear the venerable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] tell us that the organic law of the Union must be amended to keep the Republican party in power.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. SHANKLIN obtained the floor.

Mr. ROUSSEAU. I have a little more to say.

Mr. SHANKLIN. I yield to my colleague to finish his remarks.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I hope it will be understood it will not come out of the time of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. SHANKLIN.] I hope the courtesy will be extended to the gentleman who has been speaking to finish his remarks.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will entertain any motion for an extension of time.

Mr. CONKLING. I will make that motion, with the understanding that gentlemen who have been alluded to and put in a position they do not occupy shall also have an opportunity to deny or modify what has been said in regard to them.

Mr. BANKS. I hope the gentleman from Kentucky will be allowed to finish his speech without any condition. It has been accorded to us on this side, and ought to be accorded to him.

Mr. SMITH. That is right.

The SPEAKER stated, there being no objection, it would be ordered accordingly.

Mr. ROUSSEAU. I am much obliged for the courtesy, and I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DELANO] for a word of explanation.

Mr. DELANO. Mr. Speaker, I have listened with pleasure to the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. ROUSSEAU.] I have also heard with approbation portions of his speech. He has proceeded under a palpable and manifest misunderstanding of my opinion in reference to the condition of the States lately in rebellion. He regards me as concurring in the opinion that these States are out of the Union, or, to use the compact and forcible language of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, "dead," and seems to infer that I agree in the natural and inevitable consequences of that position. Some of these consequences I will allude to. If these States are dead, they are without law, except through military authority; and it is the duty of Congress at once to provide territorial governments for them or to recognize such governments as their people have set up and established. Without doing one or the other of these things, and granting that the States are dead and civil government entirely destroyed, these communities are in chaos, subject only to the law of power. Nothing can do me greater injustice than thus to interpret my remarks.

If hereafter I shall be fortunate enough to obtain the floor, I propose to place my views fully before the House and the country on this subject. At present, I will but say that I repudiate entirely, as groundless and unsustainable, the position that the States are "dead." They live, as integral parts of this Union. They are States for the purposes of local and State government; and to a certain extent are in actual harmonious relation with the other States forming the Federal Union. I hope soon to see each one fit for restoration and actually restored to all its privileges and relations under the Constitution of the United States. The time allowed for this explanation is too brief to go further into this subject at present.

While discussing the question of claims of citizens of the States lately in rebellion growing out of the destruction or appropriation of property by our Army and Navy during the war, I took occasion to place the refusal to pay a certain class of such claims on the ground that it was impossible to distinguish correctly between loyal and disloyal claimants. While enlarging upon this point, I was interrupted by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CONKLING] with this inquiry, whether in a legal view merely there was any difference between loyal and disloyal persons as to the legal liability of the Government, the gentleman from New York observing that he asked the question in view of the Supreme Court decision in what are termed the "prize cases." To this inquiry I replied substantially, that as matter of law, merely, I knew of no distinction; that the decision alluded to treated all the inhabitants of the rebel States in a certain sense as enemies, and hence I inferred that we might legally refuse to pay for all property taken or destroyed in suppressing the rebellion when owned by citizens of States in rebellion. In my report, however, I chose to put the refusal of Congress to pay for such property upon the ground of difficulty in distinguishing between the loyal and disloyal claimants rather than upon this rigid legal rule. The gentleman from Kentucky has proceeded upon the supposition that the term "enemy" in the prize cases was used by me as signifying an enemy to the Government, a public or foreign enemy. Nothing is more foreign to my meaning than such an interpretation. This will lead me to say that, so far as I have heard, the "prize cases" referred to, during the debates upon reconstruction, it seems to me that the law of those cases has been misapprehended and misapplied. I will, therefore, undertake briefly to explain the decision of the court in those cases as I understand it.

Freedmen's Bureau—Mr. Rousseau.

HO. OF REPS.

In the first place the court decides—

"That it is not necessary to constitute war that both parties should be acknowledged as independent nations or sovereign States. A war may exist where one of the belligerents claims sovereign rights as against the other."

This principle leads the court to say, in another place—

"That it is a proposition never doubted that the belligerent party who claims to be sovereign may exercise both belligerent and sovereign rights."—Prize Cases, 673.

Hence, it follows that belligerent rights are granted by the party claiming to be sovereign to the party in insurrection, pendente bellum, in order to mitigate the cruelties and misery produced by the scourge of war. Wherefore, the court say in these cases—

"This being the case, it is very evident that the common laws of war—those maxims of humanity, moderation, and honor—ought to be observed by both parties in every civil war."—Pages 663, 667.

It is perfectly clear, therefore, that the granting of belligerent rights, the exchange of prisoners, the exchange of flags of truce, and all other acts of humanity in mitigation of the cruelties of war, which were exercised and approved by the United States, did not convert the insurgent States into a foreign nation nor constitute them foreign States which we are authorized to say have been subjugated.

Now in regard to the word "enemy" as used in these cases the court says:

"All persons residing within this territory whose property may be used to increase the revenue of the hostile power, are in this contest to be treated as enemies, though not foreigners."—Page 674.

And again:

"But in defining the meaning of enemy's property we will be led into error if we refer to Fleta or Lord Coke for their definition of the word enemy. It is a technical phrase, peculiar to prize courts, and depends upon principles of public policy as distinguished from the common law."

It is perfectly apparent from a careful examination of this case that the court applied the word enemy to the people of the States in rebellion in the limited and technical sense "peculiar to prize courts." That is, the property of all of the citizens of these States was subject to capture and condemnation during the war, because such property might increase the revenue of the hostile power, and because the United States Government had a right and was bound to put down this power; and by analogy the Army might, I suppose, destroy the property of all persons residing within the hostile jurisdiction; and to authorize such capture and such destruction these persons are to be treated as enemies, and for no other purpose whatever. Hence, as the court say, though enemies they are not foreigners, and that the term is technical and peculiar to prize courts, and must be distinguished from its common-law definition. Therefore the theory fabricated upon this decision, that the people of the southern States were converted into foreign enemies by the grant of belligerent rights during the war, or by subjecting their property to capture on the high seas and to condemnation, is shown to be baseless and without law or reason to support it, so far, at least, as the prize cases are concerned.

I trust the gentleman from Kentucky now understands in what sense I applied "enemy" to the inhabitants of the insurrectionary States. God forbid that I should call those noble, loyal men of the South, enemies. They have done more, suffered more, endured more than we of the North for the salvation of our common country. They are not enemies, therefore, in the common-law sense of the word, however they may have been treated during the war under the decisions of judges of the prize courts. On the contrary, they are friends; friends of liberty; friends of the Union; friends of the loyal people everywhere throughout the Union. And I shall always be proud of the privilege of taking these noble men by the hand and calling them my friends, as they have been the friends of my country.

It will be remembered, Mr. Speaker, that I offered, a few days since, a resolution granting to the members-elect from Arkansas the same courtesy that has been extended the members-elect from Tennessee. These gentlemen from Arkansas are loyal and have always been loyal. They can take and are now ready to take the oath required by this House; their State is reorganized and civil law is reestablished; peace and security exist there. One of these gentlemen I have known for twenty years, and can vouch for his loyalty and his honor, yet they were denied the privilege of coming into this Hall as citizens; not as members, but as private gentlemen.

Can we restore the Union by such a course as this? In regard to Tennessee I am ready to vote for the admission of her Representatives at once; vote that they shall sit here as Representatives, as members of this House; and I believe, sir, it is due to this House and the country that the members-elect from Tennessee and Arkansas should be admitted speedily.

Mr. STEVENS. May I make a suggestion? We are about to adjourn. There are two or three gentlemen who desire to speak, and there is but little time. I suggest, therefore, that we take a recess until half past seven o'clock and meet again for the same purpose.

Mr. ROUSSEAU. I desire to speak about five or ten minutes.

Mr. STEVENS. I mean after that.

Mr. SMITH. I object.

Mr. STEVENS. It is the gentleman's colleagues that desire to speak.

Mr. SMITH. I want my colleague to get through.

Mr. STEVENS. After he gets through, I mean.

Mr. SMITH. Let him get through.

Mr. STEVENS. You have a right to object if you choose.

Mr. CONKLING. By the courtesy of the gentleman from Kentucky I want to add a single word to the statement of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DELANO,] and perhaps I can do it best by saying, in the beginning, that I disclaim and deny having expressed any such opinion as has been attributed to me by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. ROUSSEAU.] I have, upon the particular point which was then under consideration, an opinion which I have held for some time, and as I have no concealments, I should be very ready to state it now if I were not occupying the floor by the courtesy of the gentleman from Kentucky. Passing that, I have only to say that, on the occasion to which he refers, expressing no opinion myself, intimating no opinion myself, I simply requested the chairman of the Committee of Claims to state to the House and to me what the law was, in his judgment, upon the point suggested. And I think that it is quite unwarranted for any gentleman to assume that I held the same opinion expressed by the chairman of the Committee of Claims, or an opinion different from him.

One word further, and only one. The question upon that occasion was totally foreign to the question the gentleman is discussing here; and I want to say that I have never expressed the opinion that any loyal man, wherever he might live, was the enemy of his country in any sense implied by the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky. Far from it. Nor have I ever expressed an opinion upon the metaphysical question which gentlemen have been discussing, of the abstract status of these States. In my judgment, that question is destined to degenerate into a subordinate question for present purposes here. It may be a great question in rhetoric, it may be a great question in history, it may be a great question before the courts, and perhaps a great question of state-craft, although I do not believe it. For the purpose before the House, I consider the whole argument as to the particular status, in theory, of these States, from time to time, an abstraction, and destined, as I say, to degenerate into a subordinate question. I have expressed no opinion upon it, and I wish the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROUSSEAU] to withdraw his intimation with regard to me.

Mr. ROUSSEAU. I have heard with great pleasure the explanations of the gentlemen as to the interpretation I placed upon their language, but I must still insist, with all kindness to them, that the record of that matter going to my people is to this effect and no other, that they are cut off from being heard here in reference to their claims, as I understand it. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CONKLING] put in a reason in that report, and suggested to my friend from Ohio [Mr. DELANO] that there was no distinction as to the claims referred to between a loyal man and a disloyal one, if they lived in a seceded State. That, however, is explained, and I am happy to hear both the gentlemen say that they will regard us as loyal, and that they do not want to make any distinction between us because we happened to be on one side of the Ohio river and others happened to be on the other. I am glad to have the explanation, and I thank the gentlemen for the kind feelings they have expressed toward the loyal element of the southern States.

Now, Mr. Speaker, a few more words and I have done. I was going on to say awhile ago that we had at the beginning of the war a well-defined platform upon which we stood; we had a distinctive object in view; we at the South had an object in view that we never, never lost sight of; and all the abuse and denunciation heaped upon us, the charges of being "abolitionists" and "Lincoln hirelings" and "Hesians," were not sufficient to move us. We stood true to the Government upon the platform which I have read here to-day. But now, when we have got through with the war, we come here and find gentlemen in this Hall, Union men, insisting that the Union shall be considered as broken up and that the southern States are either out of the Union or dead. And for what? Why, sir, that the Republican party may live! The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] distinctly said a few days ago that we must amend the Constitution and either take away representation from the southern States or allow the colored population to vote, and then no alliance between men of the South and all the copperheads on the face of the earth could touch the Republican party! Sir, was it for this that we fought this war? Was it for this that we have endured all we of the South have gone through in struggling for the Union? They tell us now that the Union is lost, but they console us by telling us that the Republican party still lives! Was that what we fought for? Was it for that that we divided father against son, and brother against brother on the battle-field? I again ask, how many of the southern people would have fought and how many of the northern people would have fought on such an issue? Nobody, nobody, except perhaps the party itself, and I expect only their leaders would have done it. [A voice—"They never fight."] I have nothing to say about them. I have nothing to say against the Republican party. But I insist upon it that we ought not to have had one platform at the beginning of the war and another one at the end; that we ought not to have had one platform in the weakness of the nation and another one in its strength; that we ought not to have had one platform when the life of the nation was threatened and menaced, and another when its enemies are overthrown and the rebellion has gone down to its inglorious grave forever.

The right of secession was denied by all the Union men in the United States. All the loyal men in the United States denied that such a thing was legal; and now, when we have put down the force which was to accomplish the secession and maintain the acts that we said were nullities, still it is said that notwithstanding all this secession took place. I repeat to-day the question of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. RAYMOND,] and ask at what hour, on what day, by what act, or in what way these States ever seceded.

HO. OF REFS.

Freedmen's Bureau—Mr. Phelps.

39TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Sir, my venerable friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] and his doctrine upon this subject remind me of a doctor I once heard of, and I mean no offense to the gentleman when I say he was a quack doctor, and I mean no disrespect to the doctor. [Laughter.] He was visiting a patient one day who had the pleurisy, and when he was leaving, the patient asked him, as patients usually do, what he might eat. "Well," said he, "you may take a little rice, and tea and toast." After the doctor left the patient became very hungry, and it seemed to him he would die if he did not have some roast shoat. Finally he told his wife he must have roast shoat and she got him some, and accidentally he got better and was convalescent when the doctor came again. The doctor was surprised, and asked him how he came to be so well, and he told the doctor, "I thought I should die if I did not have some roast shoat, and my wife got me some, and I ate it and am better." The doctor took out his little memorandum book and wrote down, "roast shoat good for the pleurisy," and went his way. A few days after another of the doctor's patients had the pleurisy, and when the doctor had prescribed for him, he was asked, "What may I eat?" "Well," said he, "anything you like, but if you have a fancy for it, roast shoat is a very good thing." He went away, and a day or two after the man unfortunately died. The doctor came back and inquired how the patient was, and being informed of his death, said "Why, I thought he was getting better." "No," said the man's wife, "he would have roast shoat, and I gave it to him and it killed him." The doctor opened his book and where he had written "roast shoat good for the pleurisy," he added the word "sometimes." [Laughter.] And so it is here. It was declared in the beginning of the war that secession was impossible, but they now add, like the quack doctor, the word "sometimes."

Unfortunately the position that Jefferson Davis and his followers occupied, is now occupied by professed Union men on this floor. These gentlemen insist that the insurrectionary States are out of the Union, as Jefferson Davis has insisted for the last five years. Precisely when and how they got out of the Union these gentlemen do not say, but Davis does. He says they seceded by the action of the people in convention assembled; but long after that action, and even now, it was and is held to be a nullity by every gentleman on this floor, and every State in the Union now asserts the same thing, except, perhaps, one or two.

Taxes have been levied upon them as States in the Union by the Congress, these very gentlemen approving that action. In the apportionment bill their right to representation has been acknowledged, and in various other ways they have been recognized as being in the Union throughout the war; and I wish to know, sir, if these States are in the Union for the purposes of taxation and the bearing of burdens, but not for representation. Such seems to be the position occupied by the gentlemen, and to which the Union party are utterly opposed. The doctrine of the Union party, as I understand it, has been, and is, and will continue to be, that every loyal man, legally elected to the Congress by the people of an insurrectionary State has the right to take his seat and represent his people.

The rebellion being suppressed in the rebel States, the people of those States "return to the place and rights they had before." This is held and laid down by Puffendorf, who uses the following language in volume two, page 237:

"A whole nation when it hath, either by its own strength or by the assistance of friends and allies, shaken off an enemy's yoke, without doubt recovers its liberty and ancient state; and if any part of what they were before possessed of remains still in the enemy's hands, they have just pretensions to attempt to recover it as long as a war is kept on foot and a peace is not concluded. But if a third Commonwealth rescue a nation by war that was overpowered and enslaved by enemies, in its own name and for its own advantage, the nation only changeth its master, but is as far from liberty as ever. And we may say the same of a part of any nation. But if a part of the people be recovered by the people they were sometime divided or torn from, or by their allies, they again incorporate with the old body and return to the place and rights they had before."

This is the patriotic and common-sense view of the matter, and during the war I never heard any other expressed.

The rebellion but caused a suspension, an interruption of the authority of the General Government in the rebellious States, not by actual secession, but by a refusal on the part of the State authorities to recognize their relations with the Government, and levying war against it.

By this action the people of those States, in the language of Puffendorf, were, "for some time," separated from the Government and people of the loyal States. But the separation was not a legal one, for it was against the paramount law of the land. Between loyal and disloyal men, two issues were thus presented. The rebels claimed the legal right to secede, to withdraw from the Union. Loyal men said "No! not at all; there is no such right;" and in the whole United States there was not one loyal man who did not deny the legal right to secede.

This was one issue. Then said the rebels, "We will maintain our asserted secession by force of arms."

"All right," said the loyal men, "we will try that issue;" and we went to war.

This was the other issue. As I before said, in one of these ways secession had to be accomplished, or not at all.

Whether the acts of secession of the insurrectionary States were legal or illegal, was a question of very little importance if the rebels could command the force to maintain them. It took over four years to decide this question, during which time we waged a bloody and desolating civil war, unknown before in the history of the world. That war is over, the rebellion is suppressed, and the Government of our fathers, thank God, is ours still, if we will have it. The acts of secession being void, and the rebellion suppressed, the suspension and interruption of the relations between those States and the General Government having ceased, what more was needed to give us the old condition of things? Why, that the government machinery of those States, under the General Government and within the Union, should be put in operation as of yore, and that the people there should obey the laws of the land, and send loyal men to the Congress of the United States to represent them. All this they have done, and it was for this only we have waged a four years' war. All that the loyal men of the nation have ever demanded has been obedience to the law; with the motives for such obedience we have nothing to do. It may be from love of the Government, or it may be from fear, or it may be prompted by a mercenary patriotism which robs the people while it pretends intense devotion to the Government. And with the latter sort of patriots; the country is filled, and the further you get from the seat of war and its dangers, from its desolation, suffering, and death, the more numerous they are.

They would barter blood at a cheap rate, so it is not their own, and fill their pockets, unheeding the groans and tears and destitution of the unfortunate victims of the war.

At the beginning of the rebellion and during the war we demanded that the rebels should lay down their arms and submit to a common Government, and we demanded nothing more. They contemptuously and persistently refused to do that, but by force of arms we have compelled them to do so.

And now, sir, after this war, in which there was unexampled ill-feeling, bitterness, and hate, we find in little more than half a year undisturbed peace and an approach to harmony and returning amity that one year ago the most sanguine patriot did not hope for. The constitutions and laws of those States which the rebel officials, after committing treason, ran away and left behind them, have been taken up and put in use again by loyal men.

As this was all we asked during the war, shall we not accept this now that the war is over? Such was the wish and policy of that martyred patriot, Abraham Lincoln; time and again he called upon the people of the disloyal States to do that very thing. That was all he asked, and he spoke the voice of the nation. Why shall we demand more now?

If Mr. Lincoln were living to-day he would say that the return and submission of those people to their allegiance entitle them to representation in the councils of the nation, and to all the rights and dignity of States within the Union. The nation demands this, and that was the opinion and practice of the party in power during the war, as instanced in the cases of Andrew Johnson, Senator, and Horace Maynard, Representative, of Tennessee, as well as of others; and the Union party will not follow these gentlemen into the advocacy of the pestilent political heresy of secession, or the equally obnoxious one of expulsion of States from the Union. The Union party are opposed to the whole thing, and we will appeal to the constituents of these gentlemen, we will appeal to the loyal people of the nation, to occupy, and to force their Representatives to occupy, the patriotic ground upon which this war was begun, prosecuted, and triumphantly terminated; the ground occupied by Lincoln and Johnson while Mr. Lincoln lived, and the same held to-day by Andrew Johnson, "the Union, the Constitution, and the enforcement of the laws."

I know, Mr. Speaker, how this appeal will be responded to. Seven tenths of the people of the United States would come to-day to the support of the President in this policy, and all the politicians on earth cannot prevent it.

They want and will have a united, a harmonious, and a prosperous nation, and they will not permit one half the nation to rule and trample upon the other half on any pretext whatever. While the Union party holds to this position it will be triumphant, when it abandons it it will fail and ought to fail.

Freedmen's Bureau.

SPEECH OF HON. C. E. PHELPS,

OF MARYLAND,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 3, 1866.

The House having under consideration the bill (S. No. 60) to enlarge the powers of the Freedmen's Bureau—

Mr. CHANLER obtained the floor.

Mr. PHELPS. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a few moments.

Mr. CHANLER. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland for fifteen minutes.

Mr. PHELPS. Mr. Speaker, the measure now under consideration belongs to that large class of questions intimately connected with the great subject of restoration of the States lately in rebellion; questions of greater moment have never engaged the attention of public men in this or in any country. In the consideration of questions of this character, we are not, in my judgment, to be trammelled by the ordinary routine of party politics, or coerced by the machinery of party discipline. And I propose in this case, as in all others of a similar character, to bring my own individual judgment to bear upon the merits of the pending proposition, paying all due respect to the opinions of abler and wiser men, without falling under the absolute control of any combination in or out of this Capitol.

Mr. Speaker, it ill becomes a Representative in part of the State of Maryland, a State which became self-emancipated during the progress of this war, a State which abruptly and without compensation gave liberty to more than eighty thousand slaves, all of whom were valuable and tangible property to her citizens; I say it would ill become me, standing here as the Representative of such a State, to oppose the main principle upon which this bill is based. Not only so, sir, but it would not consist either with my own feelings or my own principles to deny the liberal, humane, beneficent idea which underlies the measure. I believe that these freedmen ought to be protected by the Government. I believe that they ought to be encouraged to labor and to earn their livelihood, as well as to learn; that they ought to be protected in their rights under contracts, and especially from the danger of being reduced by any process, direct or circuitous, to the condition of slavery from which we have rescued them. Four million slaves liberated, not for the sake of humanity, but by a stroke of policy, not for their sakes, but our own, are not now to be coolly dropped by a Government which will in that case have made so shrewd and cruel a use of them. I am therefore clear in the opinion that some legislation looking to the end proposed to be attained by this bill is, in general, expedient and necessary. That it is constitutional, I have as little doubt.

Congress is clothed with ample power over the subject by the second section of article thirteen of the Amendments to the Constitution of the United States. That legislation of the general scope and character embodied in the pending bill is "appropriate legislation" toward enforcing the total abolishment of slavery, is a proposition not requiring argument.

But, Mr. Speaker, while such legislation may be constitutional, expedient, and necessary, it may at the same time be overdone. In attempting it, we should not forget that we are traveling over new and dangerous ground. In endeavoring to remove an actual, or prevent a possible evil, we may establish a precedent for a worse. The limits of just protection may be exceeded. Features of profligate extravagance, or officious, minute, and aggravating intrusion into the details of social and domestic life may counterbalance all the advantages which otherwise would recommend such a measure to the support of every loyal man. Efforts have been made, and very ingeniously, by gentlemen opposed to the bill, to bring it within the last-named specification, by arguing from the language used in the seventh and eighth sections an inference of a design to control State laws in respect to the marriage relation. Such a construction is not warranted by the terms employed.

But it is, I think, more difficult to relieve the bill from the charge of extravagance. I particularly refer to the third section:

That the Secretary of War may direct such issues of provisions, clothing, fuel, and other supplies, including medical stores and transportation, and afford such aid, medical or otherwise, as he may deem needful for the immediate and temporary shelter and supply of destitute and suffering refugees and freedmen, their wives and children, under such rules and regulations as he may direct.

This provision seems designed not so much to encourage these people to work and earn their bread by the sweat of their brow as to depend upon the bounty of the Government for their support. This savors rather too strongly of agrarianism. It establishes a dangerous precedent, which may be used hereafter when from the teeming cities of the North may come up a cry for a pauper's bureau. Why not? Why should it not be granted? Why should not indigent white people likewise be boarded at the public expense in great national alms-houses? I can see no reason for a distinction, except that by the operation of the war these people were suddenly taken from the care of those whose interest as well as duty it had been to provide for them. They were thus thrown helpless and homeless, individually and in masses, upon the hands of our military commanders as our armies moved through their territory. Our generals had either to issue rations or see them starve. They adopted, from humanity or from necessity, the plan of issuing supplies.

That policy was sanctioned in the original act of March 3, 1865, of which the pending bill is an extension. By that act, this arrangement was only to last during the war, and for one year thereafter. It was a temporary, provisional policy, forced upon the Government by the necessity of events, but limited to expire within a reasonable time after it was presumed the necessity should have been obviated. But I most seriously object to that feature of the third section which clothes with such undefined powers and unlimited means the executive officers named as almoners of national bounty. Under that section as it stands, with its vague and loose generalities, the whole mass of freedmen and refugees might be billeted upon the public Treasury. Sir, there are perhaps few of those people to whom the specious terms "destitute and suffering" might not in some of the various senses and shades of meaning of which the words are capable be held by zealous and sympathetic agents to apply. It is true, that the assistance contemplated is restricted to the "immediate and temporary shelter and supply" of the classes named. But vagrants and idlers may come again and again to the officers of the bureau, bringing with them their wives and children, and each time receive immediate and temporary supplies as for a new case of destitution and suffering.

Again, sir, we hear it seriously proposed, here and at the other wing of the Capitol, to make of these people an element of political power by extending to them the elective franchise. Some propose to accomplish this result by constitutional amendment. Others hold, with revolutionary and sublime audacity, that the powers of Congress are already ample, and should be exercised in that behalf. Others again, expect to accomplish the same result indirectly, and by indefinitely protracting the complete restoration of the eleven prodigal States, coerce them at last to accept negro suffrage as the final and indispensable condition of their purgation. Suppose, Mr. Speaker, that unfortunately for the peace and happiness of the country, and calamitously to the black race itself, the result aimed at and already accomplished in the District of Columbia so far as this House is concerned, namely, the establishment of the monstrous burlesque and parody of republicanism, presented in universal and unqualified negro suffrage, should be accomplished throughout the States designed for the operation of this bill. Suppose these freedmen and refugees to be not only "destitute and suffering," within the latitudinarian phraseology of the third section, but voters and "sovereigns" as well. Is this House willing, is the country willing, to intrust such an enormous and unlimited fund to the untrammelled discretion of any officers of the Government, to be used by partisans for partisan purposes? It is not to be presumed, you may say, that we will ever have a Secretary of War, a Commissioner or subordinates, capable of such monstrous profligacy. Very well; then do not yourselves corrupt them by placing this enormous temptation in their way. The possession of absolute power we are told "makes weak men wicked, and wicked men mad." Let us take care, and not make virtuous men weak to begin with, by burdening their innocence with such a plethora and glut of free quarters, free rations, and free passes, in the midst of a "destitute and suffering" population of voters.

But, Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding these objections, which I urge seriously and in good faith, not as an enemy, but as a friend of the freedmen, not as the foe of the Freedmen's Bureau, but as its advocate and well-wisher, and which I advance with a sincere hope that before the final vote is taken the gentleman from Massachusetts who now honors me with his attention [Mr. ELLIOT] may so amend the bill which he has reported as to obviate the most important difficulties which have been illustrated by the full discussion it has received; notwithstanding this, I have to repeat that the cardinal principle of the measure is one that I cordially approve. I believe that the black race in the South are left by the war in a state of pupillage. Sir, they are not in a condition to receive the sovereign prerogatives of American citizenship, and this bill practically recognizes that great truth, and builds upon it as upon a solid foundation. The very discrimination it makes between "destitute and suffering" negroes, and destitute and suffering white paupers, proceeds upon the distinction that, in the omitted case, civil rights and immunities are already sufficiently protected by the possession of political power, the absence of which in the case provided for necessitates governmental protection.

One word, with the permission of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ELLIOT,] (in contravention somewhat of his point of order,) with respect to the proposition to amend the constitutional basis of representation, upon which my vote, together with his own, was recorded in the negative. During the single hour that that measure was before this House for its consideration I vainly sought the floor for a word of explanation, but was, like very many other gentlemen, summarily silenced by the operation of the previous question, moved by the gentleman from Pennsylvania who reported therewith, [Mr. STEVENS.] Such headlong and uncalled-for haste to change the fundamental law of the Republic, in fact to substitute a new corner-stone for the venerable one on which it had reposed so long, was a proceeding in itself that I could not conscientiously sanction by my vote.

It matters little to me what course others around me may think proper to take, I for one shall never vote to amend the Constitution of the United States without some opportunity to see with my own eyes and deliberately weigh with my own judgment the text itself, the ipsissima verba, of the proposed amendment. Sir, that instrument is the organic law of a Republic which I firmly believe is destined to expand until its citizens are numbered by hundreds of millions and its territorial limits are coextensive with the shores of the continent. I believe that in the providence of God centuries hence will find that immortal, blood-bought, blood-saved, blood-consecrated charter still the same grand monument of human wisdom and bulwark of human liberty that came down to us from revolutionary sires. And shall I vote to change that instrument in a vital point, in a point that involves the representation of the State whose interests have been in part confided to my care, with less ceremony and upon shorter notice than is usually required to consummate an alteration in the constitution of a social club or of a literary society? The proposed amendment, not laid upon the desks of members, not even printed, and only known to the body of the House as their ears caught its words from the Clerk's table! The proposition, as originally reported from the joint committee of the Senate and House by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] was in the following terms.

Joint resolution proposing to amend the Constitution of the United States.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (two thirds of both Houses concurring,) That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three fourths of said Legislatures, shall be valid as part of said Constitution, namely:

ARTICLE.—Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed: Provided, That whenever the elective franchise shall be denied or abridged in any State on account of race or color, all persons of such race or color shall be excluded from the basis of representation.

HO. OF REPS.

Freedmen's Bureau—Mr. Chanler.

39TH CONG....1ST SESS.

This resolution, it was originally intended, should be passed through the House upon the day of its introduction before the "going down of the sun," in the words of the gentleman who reported it, [Mr. STEVENS.] The House revolted at this precipitancy, and the discussion which ensued and the numerous substitutes which were presented by members friendly to a readjustment of the constitutional basis of representation, sufficiently proved the necessity for deliberation. After a week's debate the joint resolution was ordered to be recommitted, and on the next day it was again reported by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] with the remark that "the committee had merely omitted the words 'direct taxes,' leaving this for future amendment, as they did not wish to embarrass the subject." Merely omitted "direct taxes!" Why, that was just one half the subject-matter covered by the proposition, and made the resolution reported substantially and to all intents and purposes an entirely new measure.

I have made this statement, Mr. Speaker, in justice to myself and to those who sent me here and to place myself right upon the record. Since the war has changed the status of four million slaves, designated in the Constitution as "other persons," and credited with a fractional representation because of their status, the equilibrium of political power thus essentially disturbed, unquestionably, in my judgment, demands a revision and readjustment of the constitutional basis of representation. That readjustment I would have made as proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BROOMALL,] whose amendment, if it had been submitted to a vote would, with a slight modification, have received mine. The proposition I refer to would have been as follows:

Provided, That whenever the elective franchise shall be denied by the constitution or laws of any State to any proportion of its male citizens over the age of twenty-one years on account of race, the same proportion of its population shall be excluded from its basis of representation.

But after all, Mr. Speaker, I am free to confess that I have not such faith in these constitutional amendments as the great specific for the national malady as many gentlemen entertain, for whose ability and patriotism I have the profoundest respect. The great constitutional amendment has been made—formulated by Congress, ratified by the States, but really made by the pen of Lincoln and the sword of Grant. The great constitutional convention has been held; its debates were awful; they were stormy and bloody; the speeches were deafening as thunder peals, and the votes were winged with death. Every man had a right to represent himself in that august primary convention of the people. Its results are as decisive as its proceedings were sublime. The great fact of the Government, the right of the majority to rule, the extinguishment of secession and slavery, these are the irreversible guarantees we have obtained, and these we shall retain forever.

Freedmen's Bureau.

SPEECH OF HON. J. W. CHANLER, OF NEW YORK,IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
February 3, 1866.

The House having under consideration the bill (S. No. 60) to enlarge the powers of the Freedmen's Bureau—

Mr. CHANLER said:

Mr. SPEAKER: A few days ago, in a discussion on the joint resolution relative to negro suffrage in the District of Columbia, I asserted that the black race were as dependent on the white race to-day as when first brought here from Africa. This bill is confirmation strong as Holy Writ of that asseption. Gentlemen on the other side of the question professed great astonishment at my assertion at that time. This bill shows them to be early converts to my opinion. Nothing could prove the utter dependence of the negro race, as individuals and as a people, more conclusively than this measure and the history of the Freedmen's Bureau.

As far as this bureau may be charitable, just, and constitutional, I am willing it should do its work, but not one jot further. The amelioration of the condition of the negro race is as much my duty and as near my heart as it can be to any advocate of such a measure as this. I will not claim the pharisaical superiority and holiness assumed by the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. DONNELLY,] nor preach to the House in the clerical style and language of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ELIOT.]

WHAT IS ESSENTIAL TO SALVATION, AND WHAT IS THE BASIS OF FANATICAL CHRISTIANITY.

Mr. DONNELLY, in the House of Representatives, February 1, 1866, said:

"It is a subject of congratulation that we have passed beyond those old and bitter days when revenge and intolerance were the guiding principles of Governments. As victors in the mighty struggle which has but lately terminated, and as the superiors of the South in enlightenment and Christianity, we can afford to be magnanimous to the greatest degree compatible with public safety. That alone should be the limit of our generosity, and beyond that we should not go a hair's breadth."

"Sir, I am ready to trust the South when we have reformed the South, and not till then. The South that made the rebellion, in the same temper in which she made it I never will trust." "Who can fail to see in this vast disproportion the cause of the rebellion? In the language of Henry Ward Beecher, 'As upon the coast you can trace the line between the dark and treacherous sea on the one hand, and the firm and trusty land on the other, by the row of light-houses, so you can mark between the deep and damnable wickedness of treason and the supernal luster of patriotism by the line of school-houses.'"

Mr. ELIOT, of Massachusetts, in the House of Representatives, January 30, 1866, said:

"Say not, my friends, this must not be, for truly it must be! Resist it not! Fight not against it, lest you, too, hear the voice as of old, 'Saul! Saul! why persecutest thou me? It is hard for thee to kick against the pricks.'"

I would say to these gentlemen in all courtesy that these comparisons and allusions to the Christian condition of the North and South are rebuked by the great Master of the Christian faith. The Pharisee stood afar off and prayed in a loud voice and thanked God that he was not as other men. He salted his prayer to God with much praise of himself and with zealous condemnation of others. The allusion to Saul, who persecuted Christ, comes with singular inappropriateness from a reputed member of a sect which denies the divinity of Christ in the Trinity. And when gentlemen avail themselves of scraps of old sermons to enforce political and partisan purposes, they are open to the charge of that blasphemy they so often lay to the doors of others. How much more appropriate would it have been had the honorable gentleman quoted Peter, who thrice denied his Lord, to curry favor with the mob and the servants in the ante-chamber of the high priest.

Sir, there are many good men in this country who justly look with doubt and suspicion upon the loud-mouthed quotations of Scripture by those who have abandoned the pulpit for the stump, and from being priests of the living God, become demagogues of a fanatical party, who make the spelling-book the worship of man, the persecution of the ignorant and oppressed, negro suffrage and degradation of the white race, essential unto salvation. The school-house they hold to be holier than the sanctuary of God; the Boston primer better than the Bible.

MISREPRESENTATION.

Mr. JULIAN, of Indiana, in the House of Representatives, January 29, 1866, said:

"The rebels of the South" * * * * * "hate the negro now not simply as the ally of the Yankee in foiling their treason, but as the author of all their misfortunes, who, having been villainously misused by them, is of course villainously despised. They hate him with a rancor that feeds unceasingly upon every memory of their humiliation and defeat. They confront him with a hatred so remorseless, withering, consuming, that it crops out to-day in every quarter of the South in deeds of outrage, violence, and crime, which find no parallel even in the atrocities practiced in that section under the old codes of slavery, which were codes of murder and all minor crimes."

Mr. SUMNER, at Worcester, Massachusetts, September 14, 1865, said:

"Such is their spirit. Grounding their arms, they now resort to other means. Cunning takes the place of war. As they precipitated themselves out of the Union, they now seek to precipitate themselves back. A 'wooden horse' is constructed, which is stuffed with hidden foes, and thus they seek to enter our Troy. Already the rattle of arms is heard, and ominous voices, as the treacherous engine is advanced; but beyond these sounds, there is the record of the past and the present. Who does not know that the South is full of spirits who have sworn undying hatred not only to the Union but to reason itself, and whose policy is a perpetual conspiracy against the principles of our Government? Painful proofs come to demonstrate the prevailing frenzy. The freedmen are trodden down, and the land is filled with tragedies. History stands aghast at the massacre of Glencoe in a retired Scotch valley, and our sympathies overflow at the murder of a solitary traveler by the merciless Indians; but these scenes are now repeated. The barbarism of slavery rages still. The lash and the bloodhound are at large. Life is of little value if it beats under a colored skin. Citizens in the national uniform are insulted, mutilated, murdered—especially if they are in command of colored troops. And these criminals, besmeared with patriot blood, and boiling with concentrated rage, now strive to envelope themselves in the immunities of State independence, with two special objects in view: first, that they may deal with the freedmen as they please, without any check from the national authority; and, secondly, that they may send a solid representation of more than eighty votes, pledged to southern pretensions, which, in combination with treacherous votes from the North, may reassert that ancient monopoly and masterdom under which the country suffered so long."

"And once more Erect the standard there of ancient night."

"Reading the proceedings of the convention in Mississippi, we seem again to hear the voice of Satan:

"To claim our just inheritance of old Whether by open war or covert guile, We now debate."

Mr. DONNELLY, in the House of Representatives, February 1, 1866, said:

"Now, what is the condition of the South in reference to all this?"

"I assert that it is such as would bring disgrace upon any despotism in Christendom."

"The great bulk of the people are rude, illiterate, semi-civilized; hence the rebellion; hence all the atrocious barbarities that accompanied it."

"The number of ignorant is indicated by the proportion unable to read and write; indicated, I say, but not fully shown, because, of the practically ignorant, of those who read neither books or newspapers, and are thus cut off from acquiring information through its ordinary channels, the proportion who have never learned their letters or to write their names may be small indeed."

"Repeat, the condition of the South in this respect would be shameful to any semi-civilized people, and is such as to render a republican government, resting on the intelligent judgment of the people, an impossibility."

"I appeal to the revelations of the census."

"My statistics do not include the former slaves, but the white people of the South and the few freed negroes found among them in 1860."

"In the first place I would quote the following very complete table, furnished me by the Census Bureau, and giving the total results upon this subject for the whole United States: [See table at the foot of opposite page.]

It appears from this table that the adult male white and free negro population of the United States, in 1860, or twenty years of age, who could not read and write, was but little short of half a million. In other words, that in the last presidential election, if the entire population of the United States had voted, half a million votes would have been cast by men who could not read and write."

"When we recollect that upon our presidential elections depend the great interests and the life of the country, and remotely the cause of all mankind, we may well stand appalled before this vast force of half a million ignorant men deciding the destinies of the world."

"But if we look exclusively at the southern States we find still greater cause for surprise and alarm."

"The following table shows the number of illiterate male whites in seven southern States; also the total vote of those States in 1860, and the vote given in each State in the same year for Breckinridge:

States.	No. of illiterate males over 20 years.	Total vote in 1860.	Vote for Breckinridge, 1860.
Delaware.....	2,838	16,099	7,387
Virginia.....	31,178	187,223	74,323
North Carolina.....	28,020	96,230	48,539
Tennessee.....	27,358	145,333	61,709
Alabama.....	14,517	90,357	48,831
Arkansas.....	9,579	54,053	28,732
Kentucky.....	28,742	146,216	53,143
Total.....	140,036	715,651	325,614

"If we examine this table, we find that in the seven States named the number of illiterate is about one fifth the total number of voters, and nearly one half the total vote for Breckinridge, the representative of disunion and secession.

"If, however, we add to each man entirely illiterate one other who, while able to read and write his name, derives no practical advantage from these mere rudiments of education in forming his opinions, we will find the total to be more than one third of the total vote and five sixths of the vote for Breckinridge.

The total number of illiterate in the southern States in 1860, over twenty years of age, exclusive of the then slaves, was 545,177. In these, with the comparatively ignorant associated with them, we see the upholders of the rebellion at the ballot-box and in the field. Without these it could never have been inaugurated, or if inaugurated could never have maintained itself for six months against the mighty levies of the Union.

"But it may be said these evils will correct themselves. The testimony is all the other way.

"From 1840 to 1860, a period of twenty years, the number of illiterate over twenty years rose from 549,693 to 1,218,311; in other words, an increase of considerably more than one hundred per cent!

"At the same ratio of growth it would be 2,674,472 in 1880; 5,823,700 in 1900; and in 1920 it would amount to the enormous total of 12,596,688.

"In other words, in fifty years from the taking of the next census, the illiterate in the United States over twenty years, exclusive of the freedmen, will be 12,500,000, four times the number with which the nation commenced its career, nearly one half the total white population in 1860, and representing a voting force one third greater than the total vote at the presidential election in 1860; that is to say, over 6,000,000 voters!

"Who will pretend that with such a mass of ignorance the Government could survive? It would be buried in the most disgraceful anarchy the world has ever seen.

"But, Mr. Speaker, even these appalling figures do not tell the whole story. These figures do not include the then slaves, now freedmen. We must add to the ignorant population of the South the 4,000,000 blacks just released from slavery.

"The figures would stand as follows:

NUMBER OF ILLITERATE.
Year.	White.	Black.	Total.
1880.....	2,674,472	3,309,175	5,983,647
1900.....	5,823,700	4,765,212	10,588,912
1920.....	12,596,688	5,994,812	18,591,500

"So that in fifty years from the next census, a very short period in the life of a nation, when it is supposed that the total population will be 120,000,000, the illiterate will be one fifth of the entire number and nearly one third of the entire vote.

"I trust, then, that no gentleman will doubt the propriety of the amendment I have submitted. We are interfering in behalf of the negro; let us interfere to educate him. We thus strike out at one blow a large proportion of the ignorance of the South; we shame the whites into an effort to educate themselves, and we prepare thus both classes for the proper exercise of the right of suffrage.

"Nor shall it be said that the ignorance revealed by these statistics is an exotic, that it results from foreign immigration. While it is true that in the North a large proportion of the illiterate are from foreign lands, in the South the reverse is the case. In North Carolina, in 1860, the illiterate persons of native birth were 74,877, while those of foreign birth were but 100. In Alabama the illiterate of native birth were 37,302, while those of foreign birth were 2,663.

"The total number of illiterate foreigners in the United States in 1860 was 342,917; while, I am sorry to say, those born under our institutions, and unable at the age of twenty years to read and write, were 834,106.

Let us, however, set aside the foreign infusion altogether, and divide the illiterate according to the natural divisions of the country.

"The results are as follows:

Section.	No. illiterate of native birth.	Total population.
New England States.....	8,543	3,135,283
Middle States.....	93,533	7,571,101
Southern States.....	545,177	12,128,078
Western States, (Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Kansas).....	146,321	5,509,096
Northwestern States, (Michigan, Iowa, Minnesota, and Wisconsin).....	24,791	2,371,930
Pacific States.....	12,709	452,459

"A comparison of these figures leads to some surprising results. If, for instance, the ratio of the New England States held good, we should have less than 80,000 native-born illiterate persons in the United States instead of the 834,000 we now have. In other words, the illiterate native voters of the country would be less than 40,000, instead of being over 400,000!

"On the other hand, we find that the southern States have a population about equal to the middle and western States combined, while the number of illiterate in the former is 545,177, as against 241,834 in the latter; and this not including the vast number of illiterate freedmen in the South, who would make the disproportion still greater. So that the South outnumbers in illiterate the most unfavorable portions of the North more than two to one.

"As compared with the New England States the disproportion is still more striking. At the ratio of New England the southern States should have but 34,000 illiterate persons; as it is the number is 545,177.

"The whole United States, with a population of 27,000,000, contains 834,106 illiterate persons, and of these 545,177 are found in the southern States, with a population of 12,000,000. In other words, the entire populous North contains but 288,923, while the sparsely settled South contains 545,177."

Mr. Speaker, the malignant party spirit and sectional hate that runs through this whole statement needs no illustration. They illustrate themselves, as the trail of the snake and the stench of the pole-cat mark the way of the reptile and vermin.

If the southern people are so unfortunate, why persecute and slander them? If ignorant, why exclude them from the pale of Christianity? Christ was a Nazarene, despised, spit upon, and crucified. He kept company with Publicans and sinners, his disciples were the scum of Jewish society, the most illiterate, ignorant, poor, and degraded of all the subjects of the Roman Empire. Lazarus and the blind beggar would never have been accepted as fit Christians for follow-

HO. OF REPS.

Freedmen's Bureau—Mr. Chanler.

39TH CONG....1ST SESS.

ship with these "illuminati" and latter-day saints of fanaticism. Sir, the necessity of a representation of the people of the South was never more necessary or evident than at this time. Such wholesale misrepresentation of the South as discussion on this and similar bills has elicited is unbefitting in those who indulge in it, as it is unjust to the people of the North, who are desirous of sealing their great victories over the South with a generous forgetfulness of the past and with magnanimous trust in the honor of the people of the South for the future. The Union preserved, the people's wish made perpetual in the bonds of sympathy, honor, and mutual interest—tyranny and usurpation of extreme military and despotic powers by the General Government cannot effect this.

MOTIVES AND PLANS OF THE REPUBLICAN PARTY.

Sir, the people of the North are not fairly represented by such sentiments as have been uttered in this debate and on kindred subjects.

Mr. JULIAN, in the House of Representatives, January 29, 1866, said:

"Let us not make enemies and outlaws of four million people, among whom no traitor or sympathizer with treason has ever yet been found; who were eager to help us from the very beginning of our struggle, and as soon as we were ready gladly furnished nearly two hundred thousand soldiers to aid in saving the nation's life; and who, if allowed just what our hands will be found in the future, as they have been in the past, our effective auxiliaries and most faithful friends."

Mr. DONNELLY, in the House of Representatives, February 1, 1866, said:

"There are certain measures upon which the dominant party seem agreed. They are:

"1. The amendment of the Constitution prohibiting the payment of any debt contracted in furtherance of the rebellion.

"2. The amendment to confine the basis of representation to those actually represented in Congress.

"3. The passage of the bill now under consideration, enlarging the powers of the Freedmen's Bureau."

Mr. BOUTWELL, in the House of Representatives, said, in urging the necessity of giving the right of suffrage to the negro, (extracts taken from National Anti-Slavery Standard of February 3, 1866:)

"I declare, after the gravest deliberation and the calmest reflection, and I say it with sorrow, looking upon the country, rent by opposite opinions on this question, that, without such a measure as I suggest for the southern States, this Government cannot outlast those who are now in the vigor of manhood. Why and how will it fail?

"It will fail and fall from the fact that by restoration without this all-essential guarantee we put into the hands of our enemies in the South two weapons, the blows of which we shall be powerless to parry. One is the assumption by the Government of a vast and overwhelming weight of indebtedness, to be followed by a foreign war. We see to-day how difficult it is to restrain and control the people of this country in their desire to take just vengeance for the wrongs inflicted upon them by England and France. Suppose the power of this Government was intrusted to the hands of the late slaveholders, the men recently engaged in rebellion. Does any man believe that they are restored to their right mind, that they will give an ardent support to the Government? All the testimony is that they are as alien and hostile to this Government as ever, and that they only seek an opportunity to strike a deadly blow.

"What will be said of us, not by Christian, but by heathen nations even, if, after accepting the blood and sacrifices of these men, we hurl them from us and allow them to be the victims of those who have tyrannized over them for centuries? I know of no crime that exceeds this; I know of none that is its parallel, and if this country is true to itself it will rise in the majesty of its strength and maintain a policy, here and every where, by which the rights of colored people shall be secured through their own power—in peace the ballot, in war the bayonet."

Mr. SUMNER, in his speech delivered at Worcester, Massachusetts, September 14, 1865, says also:

"Irreversible guarantees cannot be obtained by pardons. It is enough to state this proposition: for all must see at once that rights will be very uncertain if they have no protection except in the gratitude of a pardoned rebel. A jail-delivery is not a guarantee. Such a breaker would be impotent against the malignant sea. Without accepting absolutely the dogma of Cardinal Mazarin, that men are governed more through hope than through gratitude, it is clear that, until security is won, we cannot afford to part with any influence or agency through which control may be established. Mercy is a beautiful prerogative, exercised always with inexpressible delight; but on this account we must guard against its fascination, and not, in the generous luxury, imperil a whole community. This is very clear. A pardon is in form an act of grace, but in reality a letter of license. This is all."

And again:

"Therefore, I insist, do not put political trust in that man who has been engaged in warring upon his country. I do not ask his punishment. I would not be harsh. There is nothing humane which I would reject. Nothing in hate. Nothing in vengeance. Nothing in passion. I am for gentleness. I am for a velvet glove; but I wish the hand for awhile of iron."

MOTIVES.

Poisoned springs, Mr. Speaker, are at once the curse of the victim who uses and of the wretch who defiles God's blessing. The motives of the men who cry war! war! when there is no war; who seek by slander and studied misrepresentation to keep alive the sectional rivalry and anger which a fierce civil strife very naturally may have created; or who seek to revive the causes of bitter and party feeling which gave rise to that civil strife now victoriously ended by this Government; or who, from personal hatred to the people of the South for real or imagined wrongs done to themselves, would enlist the bad passions of a whole nation in a policy which may punish the southern people, by fixing such tyrannical and degrading laws as this and the kindred measures put forward under the name of national guarantees; who, while quoting the Word of God, pass acts of the devil, are as the poisoned wells, which deal death in secret, and practice revenge in the temple of God.

Sir, so base had Italian revenge become in the dark ages that the Pope, vicegerent of God, at his installation drinks not the holy wine until the officiating priest has tasted the chalice. Sir, this spirit of sly and politic revenge is hostile to the spirit and character of a free people. "The gloved hand" which the Republican leader would use conceals a poisoned ring, such as wicked tyrants used to destroy those whom they seemed most to love. Away with this hypocrisy and pretense! Again declare open war, and call out the armies of the Republic to fight like brave and free men.

Cease poisoning the wells of our national life and the sacred chalice of Christian love. If you will be tyrants, at least be brave and honest, and do not claim to seek security for the nation while laboring for the perpetuity of the Republican party and the perpetration of personal revenge.

No free people looks calmly on the exercise of tyranny or of an unconstitutional power, even though administered by its own Government and in the name of its Representatives. The people of the North love liberty and cherish all the safeguards our fathers threw around it, as embodied in the Constitution. Such measures as this and such arguments as I have just quoted belong not to this age and people. They are foreign to the spirit of civil and religious liberty. They are feudal, inquisitorial, imperial. They belong to the councils of Herod and Caesar, and come not from the teachings of the divine Master. They spring from devilish hate. They rank with the accursed acts of the Pharisee who loosened Barabbas and scourged the Saviour. The thief upon the cross would have died unforgiven and doomed but for the forgiving spirit of the crucified God. Are they who thus preach hate and persecution, who try to keep alive the flame of civil war in the hearts of the people, fit representatives of the "Christian people of the North?" Out of their own mouths comes their self-condemnation. If they are not hypocrites, they are atheists; if not atheists, then demagogues, and traitors to that Union they have sworn to protect and preserve.

HISTORY OF THE FREEDMEN'S BUREAU.

The first bill of this series was introduced, the gentleman from Massachusetts informs the House, in the Thirty-Seventh Congress, by himself, under the name of "Bureau of Emancipation." He admits that it was what he calls "novel legislation, without precedent in any nation." Very naturally the distinguished chairman of the committee who had charge of the bill, Judge White, of Indiana, did not succeed in reporting it for action by the House. The bill entitled "An act to establish a Bureau of Freedmen's Affairs" was reported from the Senate in the beginning of the Thirty-Eighth Congress; but delay and debate seem to have killed the measure. And finally a committee of conference of both Houses quarreled over the distribution of patronage, being unable to decide whether the War Department or Treasury Department should have the profits of the scheme. The consequence was, an independent bureau, with a head communicating directly with the President, and resting for its support upon the arm of the War Department. This bill was also defeated. Another conference committee was chosen, and a bill attaching the bureau to the War Department, and embracing refugees as well as freedmen in its terms, was agreed upon and approved March 3, 1865. "That bill is now the law."

When the bureau was first organized it was represented that it would be self-sustaining. That representation has proved untrue; and now large appropriations are called for to keep the bureau alive. A scheme introduced under the popular plea of economy is now costing the country from eleven to twenty-eight million dollars per annum, with untold expenses in the future. Now, sir, how did this bureau come to be so costly?

First, in supporting an army of idle negroes with food, homes, and all the comforts as well as necessities of life.

Secondly, by transporting them from point to point at the option of the ignorant and improvident negro who might choose to take a trip North, East, West, or South.

Third, by transporting a few white refugees and supplying them with temporary shelter and absolute necessities of life. Lands, houses, cattle, farm stock of every kind, farming implements, guns, powder, shot, libraries, household furniture, finery of every sort were distributed or allowed to the negro slave, while the poor white man was driven from his home and land, to which he had a right and title, that he might become a public pauper and live on the cold charity of the Government, or be transported away from the homestead which he was forced to surrender to the negro. Negroes were brought from distant sections of the country to squat on the lands of loyal white men and innocent minors, widows, and orphans who had nothing to do with the war. Now that the war is over the whites are left to take care of themselves, and the blacks are to receive the benefits of the bureau.

This present bill is to secure the protection of Government to the blacks exclusively, notwithstanding the apparent liberality of the measure to all colors and classes.

The character of the bill if not the prejudices of race would prevent the white man from degrading himself to the condition of a public pauper or modern serf of the soil dependent on the Government through the Secretary of War.

General Howard's report establishes the fact that the present bureau gave most of its aid exclusively to the negro freedmen. I insert the words of that report to show the practical effect of the bureau has been exclusively for the negro:

"Of Transportation.—As soon as the war closed, white refugees from every part of the South sought, immediately, to return to their former homes."

"As early as May 30, I made provision as follows: 'Loyal refugees who have been driven from their homes will, on their return, be protected from abuse, and the calamities of their situation relieved as far as possible. If destitute, they will be aided with transportation and food when deemed expedient while en transit, returning to their former homes.'

"This order was approved by the President, and my requisitions were honored by the quartermaster's department. In consequence of abuses it was found necessary, subsequently, to restrict the order to cases where humanity evidently demanded the transportation. About two thousand and eighty-five whites, men, women, and children, were transported from different portions of the northern States to the South. This work has now nearly ceased. The same principle applied to colored refugees. The total number transported, men, women, and children, is one thousand nine hundred and forty-six.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
BUREAU OF REFUGEES, FREEDMEN,
AND ABANDONED LANDS.

WASHINGTON, November 24, 1865.

SIR: In accordance with General Orders, No. 145, War Department, as follows:

[General Orders, No. 145.]

WAR DEPARTMENT,
ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
WASHINGTON, October 9, 1865.

Whereas certain tracts of land situated on the coast of South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida, at the time, for the most part vacant, were set apart by Major, General W. T. Sherman's Special Field Order, No. 15, for the benefit of refugees and freedmen that had been congregated by the operations of war, or had been left to take care of themselves by their former owners; and whereas an expectation was thereby created that they would be able to retain possession of said lands; and whereas a large number of the former owners are earnestly soliciting the restoration of the same, and promising to absorb the labor and care for the freedmen—

It is ordered, That Major General Howard, Commissioner of the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands, proceed to the several above-named States; and endeavor to effect an arrangement mutually satisfactory to the freedmen and the land-owners, and make report. And in case a mutually satisfactory arrangement can be effected, he is duly empowered and directed to issue such orders as may become necessary, after a full and careful investigation of the interests of the parties concerned.

By order of the President of the United States:

E. D. TOWNSEND,
Assistant Adjutant General.

I proceeded to Charleston, South Carolina, reaching there October 17. After conversing with General Saxton, assistant commissioner, and with the land-owners, I resolved to go to Edisto as soon as the people could be convened at some central point. Thursday, October 19, accompanied by several officers, and the representative of the Edisto planters, Mr. William Whaley, I met the freedmen at a large church on the island. The rumor had already reached the freedmen that I proposed to restore the lands, and evidences of dissatisfaction and sorrow were manifested from every part of the assembly. I explained what I believed to be the wishes of the President, as set forth in his interview with me just before leaving Washington, and as embodied in my instructions above recorded. The people chose a committee of three of their number, and to them I submitted the propositions to which the land-owners were willing to subscribe. The committee said that on no condition would the colored people be willing to work for their former owners under or worse as before; but, if they could rent the lands of them, they would consent in other respects to arrangements proposed. Some would work for wages, but the general feeling seemed to be that they ought to be allowed to rent the lands.

By a unanimous vote, it was agreed that the matter be left to my decision as to whether restoration should be made, and as to the conditions.

After careful consideration I deemed it advisable to take course as follows:

1. To constitute a board of supervisors, in which the Government, the planter, and the freedmen had each a representative, for the adjustment of contracts and cases of difficulty.

Each land-owner was required to sign an obligation, after which the order of restoration was to be issued. Here follow the order, obligation, and order of restoration referred to:

[Special Field Orders, No. 1.]

WAR DEPARTMENT,
BUREAU OF REFUGEES, FREEDMEN,
AND ABANDONED LANDS,
CHARLESTON, S. C., October 9, 1865.

The agent of this bureau on Edisto Island will immediately take measures to constitute a board of supervisors for the island, to consist of himself and two other citizens, one to be selected by the land-owners or their agents, the second by the resident freedmen or their agents.

This board will aid in making contracts, and will adjudicate all difficulties that may arise between the whites and the freedmen, or among the freedmen themselves, extending only to offenses committed in which the penalty does not exceed imprisonment at hard labor for a period of one month, or a fine not to exceed $100. All other cases of crime will be referred to competent civil or military authority.

Should a police force be deemed necessary by the board, the bureau agent will, as heretofore, make requisition upon the military authorities. Appeals from the decision of the board to the assistant commissioner or Commissioner of the bureau may be made.

Pursuant to instructions from the President:

O. O. HOWARD,

Major General, Commissioner.

A. P. KETCHUM,

Captain 128th U. S. C. T., and A. D. C.

I have the honor to submit this report for the consideration of yourself and the Executive, under whose express orders I was acting.

It is exceedingly difficult to reconcile the conflicting interests now arising with regard to lands that have been so long in the possession of the Government as those along the coast of South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida. I would recommend that the attention of Congress be called to the subject of this report at as early a day as possible, and that these lands, or a part of them, be purchased by the United States with a view to the rental and subsequent sale to the freedmen.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

O. O. HOWARD,

Major General, Commissioner.

Hon. E. M. STANTON, Secretary of War.

From these extracts it will plainly be seen that black freedmen and not white refugees were the special care of the bureau.

The white refugees were few in number and received no land from the Government. The period during which they received aid by transportation ended with the date of the report, or was rapidly doing so. "The supervisors" appointed were not instructed to aid the poor whites of the South, of whose destitute condition we hear so much, and of whose ignorance and semi-barbarism gentlemen express such holy horror.

POOR WHITES.

Of the poor whites of the southern States, Mr. Speaker, the people of the whole Union have reason to be proud. From them as a class, if gentlemen will insist upon making that distinction, have sprung some of the noblest natures and brightest intellects this country has produced—Andrew Jackson, Crawford, Clay, Pettigrew; and Andrew Johnson, the present Chief Magistrate of this Union, has the proud distinction of having risen from the poorest of the poor whites to be the ruler of this Union. And, sir, much of his mercy, wisdom, and patriotism is to be traced to the sympathy he deeply feels for the poor white man of his own section, as well as for the poor and lowly of every section and every land or race.

But to continue with General Howard's report:

This bureau, as now established, has been used by land speculators, small traders, and mischievous persons of every sort and phase of fanaticism, to disturb the whole South and put obstacles in the way of the glorious work of reconstruction. General Howard says, in his report, now in my hand:

"My impression is, that many speculators, who desire to cheapen the lands, helped on these stories. The freedmen became suddenly very averse to making any contracts or agreement with the property-holders for the coming year. Even the correction of false reports does not always produce a willingness to enter into contracts. My agents have striven to disabuse the minds of the freedmen of impressions so detrimental to their interests, urging them to see places of support, and aiding them to get fair wages. My objection to the system I have been obliged to adopt has been its tendency to check individuality, not sufficiently encouraging self-dependency; but in process of time, as property shall change hands and the larger estates be broken up, the necessity for so generally applying contracts will be obviated. Meanwhile education, unhindered, will work wonders to stimulate individual enterprise. The results of our present system of free labor will appear in my remarks upon each State, and more fully in the reports of the respective assistant commissioners."

The practical working of the scheme as a means of fixing the negro to any one place, system, or rate of wages was abortive. Idleness incurable, a rapacious longing and covetousness for the land on which they had squatted, without any capacity, skill, or will to work it for the general welfare, all appear in the frank and soldierly report of General Howard. He says:

"With regard to prices of labor, as I anticipated, experience has shown that it is better to leave them to be regulated by the demand.

"Minimum rates might serve to protect the freedmen in many cases, but in scarcely any place could he have exceeded those rates, after they were once established.

"By fixing prices for the able-bodied, it is impossible to discriminate sufficiently with regard to the difference of skill and ability among that class.

"Finding the plantation negroes inclined to leave their homes and go to the cities, villages, and military posts, with no good prospect of work or support, I deemed it best to have the agents at those places adopt a system like the ordinary intelligence office, and use every effort in their power to procure good places where they could find support, in whole or in part, for those who then came together.

"Industrial schools, established by benevolent associations, were encouraged to aid in the absorption of this class of refugees.

"Government farms, under charge of officers of the bureau, and those farms that had been set apart or allotted, according to the laws, have subserved the purpose of absorbing the surplus population.

Still, however, there were authentic complaints of idleness, for which no remedy seemed to exist. I directed that the vagrant laws of the respective States, so far as they applied to whites, be extended to freedmen; where this law authorized corporeal punishment, it was modified by the assistant commissioner.

"The wording of the law establishing this bureau gave rise to the idea that the lands of disloyal owners would be divided among the freedmen.

"Soldiers, colored and white, and others, at one time spread and doubtless magnified the same report, till the belief became quite prevalent in the interior of the southern States that the Government intended, at Christmas or New Year's, to effect this division."

SOUTHERN LETTERS.

Mr. Speaker, the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts has read to the House an extract from a letter given him by the Speaker, and written by a negro, asking for protection from Congress. Sir, in the same spirit of affording protection to all classes and colors of men who may need it, and from an earnest desire to lay before the country a reliable statement of the true condition of the South, I have collected from most trustworthy and honorable persons at the South, who know what they write to be true, and who, whatever may have been their political errors, now sincerely desire a restoration of the Union and its perpetuity to the latest period of recorded time. If I suppress the names of the writers, I will be willing to show the original letters and signatures to any gentleman who may ask me. The first letter is from a major general in the late rebel army, and for some time a prisoner in Fort Warren:

CAMDEN, SOUTH CAROLINA, January 26, 1866.

DEAR SIR: Your favor of the 24th ultimo only reached me this morning, and though perhaps too late for your purpose, I respond immediately to your inquiries. First let me say that I have always felt grateful for your sympathy and kindness to me when in prison, and your generous efforts to procure my release. The liberal sentiments of yourself and others at the North entirely revolutionized my feelings and opinions of your people, at least such of them as were not under the rule of a blind fanaticism, which, under the garb of virtue, seems to cover the most malignant purposes toward us. Before I knew by personal contact that the good people of your section were as just, generous, and pure as the good among ourselves, I did not distinguish between you, but held all responsible for the crimes of the worst class. I say "crimes," for so we regarded the acts of sectional hostility leveled at us. I also freely confess that my prejudices against the radicals themselves have somewhat diminished by discovering that they were capable as individuals of acts of personal kindness, while they sought to ruin us socially and civilly as a people. A friver interchange of social intercourse between the two peoples would have prevented that harsh judgment on both sides which resulted in the recent conflict, and perhaps led to a gradual, peaceful, and wise system of changes, which would have been best for all parties concerned, as far as we can see; but it is in vain that we mourn over the past. Let us turn to the consideration of the present and the future, which alone concerns our duty.

I returned home in August last, and found the negro civil and orderly, but idle and restless; no more concerned about his future than the stalled ox, feeling perfectly secure of being fed and lodged by his former owner until January, and equally confident that then he would acquire equal rights, social, political, and proprietary, with the white man. Nay, since he only felt the power of the military, with its rigid police and localized judiciary, as a protection to him against the power and dominion of his former master, whose liberties alone it restrained, many were confident that the whites would be entirely deprived of all property and right, and that they would be the proprietors and rulers of the country. While the negro was intoxicated by these delusions, fostered as they were by the system of rule adopted over the country, and the misrepresentations made by many who were connected with it—though I am glad to say but in few instances by any in authority—the white man was correspondingly depressed. During the harvest season it became evident that unless these views were changed both races would be made victims; that famine, ruin, anarchy, and violence would ensue. Then there was a change of system. Negro troops were removed from the interior, officers who were doing mischief by their fanaticism were removed, the negro was told by those in authority that though they would be protected in the enjoyment of their emancipation from the dominion of man, yet that they, in common with all men, were yet under the imperious rule of the great law of labor; that they could acquire no property but by their own industry and economy; that the white man would be protected in his property; that to secure employment they must establish themselves in the confidence of the proprietors of the soil; that unless employed by them, they themselves must perish; that from their idleness the past year they would have but a pittance in hand at January; that in the whole State they had not made bread enough to feed the people for six months; that only the credit and the means of the planter could save them from starvation; that to secure any advantage from these, they must contract for another year; and that they could only hope for an improvement in their condition at the end of this year as a result of their own industry.

But little was said on the subject of political rights, but in the main they were encouraged to believe that in the future they might hope for the attainment of equal rights with the white man. At first it did not appear that these teachings had much effect. They still looked forward to a sort of millennial state at January, and many of our planters were utterly despairing up to the end of the year. In the last weeks of the year the crops were divided, when the negro learned the first lesson in the alphabet of self-dependence. The idler found that for every day lost from his work during the year he lost a corresponding part of his share of the crop; that on plantations where the hands had been industrious and steady in their labor they received fair remuneration, while on those where the negroes were idle they received little or nothing. Some were able to furnish their families with necessities and comforts, and even with the means of festivity and merriment at Christmas, while others had to face the future with nothing to meet its necessities. They realized, also, their responsibilities as heads of families. The laborer who had no family was furnished, if industrious, with a competence for a year, while the head of a family, equally industrious, with the same amount in hand, had to first provide for his dependents.

The negro is not much of a reasoning creature. In the language of one of our State judges of the olden time, "he never knew the agony of thought," until now; but these things set him to thinking. The result was that after two or three weeks of harmless but very foolish dissipation, most of them went back to their old employers and contracted for the present year. In nearly all cases of which I have heard, they are working with a will, a cheerfulness, and attention to the general interest of the place which was not surpassed under the old system. It is true, the owners of many plantations have refused to take any but the best, most intelligent, and industrious of his people. The idle and vicious were refused. These last have either been employed as laborers in other than agricultural employments, or are seeking day labor in the towns.

This discipline is teaching the negro another idea, that there is such a thing as character, and that it has a practical influence upon his welfare. There is growing out of these new ideas an appreciation of a fact which I have endeavored to impress upon both white and black—that their best interests are identical; that what is best for one is best for the other; that mutual confidence and good will are essentials to the well being of both. The tendency is in that direction, and, if let alone, by the end of the year there will no longer exist any general distrust between the races, but mutual confidence and kind feeling arising from a sense of mutual dependence.

The only apprehensions I feel are, first, from the continuance of the garrisons and the Freedmen's Bureau among us. The negro will not entirely trust the white man so long as he sees that we are not trusted by the Government to which he looks as his own and only protector and as a stern ruler of the white man. I do not mean to say that there is at present in this part of the State any improper exercise of authority by the military, but under the circumstances their presence alone engenders distrust on the part of the negro, and prevents his feeling his dependence upon the good will of the employer.

A second cause of apprehension I have arises from the presence and teaching of preachers and teachers among us who are entirely ignorant of the real feelings and true interests and character of both races, and bitterly hostile to the whites, and weakly sentimental on the negro. To this influence may be added the circulation of papers published here and at the North which, under the guise of maintaining the Union and vindicating the rights of humanity, openly advocate the despoiling of the white to endow the black race, the disfranchisement of the white and the right of suffrage to the black, malign and traduce us, sow the seeds of distrust and prejudice, and even advocate an appeal to arms to assert what they call the rights of the blacks if they cannot otherwise be obtained.

The third and last cause of apprehension is involved in the question of the disposition of the island lands. For several years during the war they were occupied by the Federal armies. They were thickly peopled with slaves when first occupied, being among the best lands in the State. To these were added many thousands of absconding negroes from all parts of the State. They were treated with more consideration than whites would have been under the same circumstances, and by the end of the war had come to regard themselves as a favored class, the peculiar care of the Government, while they were taught to believe their former masters were very devils incarnate, who had justly forfeited not only property but life itself by their rebellion, which was a fit termination to the career of wretches whose hands and souls were stained with the crime of slavery.

Is it astonishing that now, when the white man here is conquered and completely under the heel of every soldier, white or black, these people set themselves at defiance, though armed with the President's pardon; that they should endeavor to inculcate the same spirit of defiance and disregard even of the authority of the Government upon all the negroes of the State? In some cases they have established a sort of military government of their own; established guards, and permit no white man to land on the island without the consent of the head man, in some cases defying the passport of the commander of the department. This will indicate to you the condition of the sea-coast of South Carolina and Georgia.

How can we do anything toward making the negro in the interior contented and happy, settled in his intentions and plans for the future, when he has before his eyes always this demoralizing example of his neighbors? If the lands of the sea-coast are turned over to the negroes how can we convince them that they have no right to those of the interior? Where is the line to be drawn? If we were only let alone, the negro would soon become a good citizen, industrious, happy, prosperous, peaceable, and orderly. His condition would constantly improve; prejudices on both sides would be removed, and we would have a peasantry of which any country might be proud. But so long as we are subject to interference between us a third party, who is here avowedly because we are not to be trusted to maintain the rights of these people, distrust will increase, dissensions arise, discontent, confusion, and despair involve both races in ruin. But the negro would be the victim unless the white man was forced by the power of the Government to yield the country to his African master. Just as you diminish the confidence of the proprietor in negro labor, just so far do you displace the negro by the white laborer.

It was formerly believed that the white man could not labor in the summer on the rivers and swamps of the South, but the experience of the war and the campaigns of the northern armies, and their labors in mid-summer in the most unhealthy regions, have reversed our theories upon this subject. Should negro labor fail this year by reason of their demoralization, next winter will bring to our doors thousands of foreigners to till the soil. Upon some of our plantations the negroes are offered one half the crop, finding their own food and clothing. Upon most of them the wages are fixed at a third, and they are found their provisions. Upon one of our large plantations here the wages are one third, the laborer being furnished with a house and garden, pasturage for a cow and calf, fire-wood, a peck of meal, and two and a half pounds of bacon per week. With industry the laborer's share of the crop will be in a good year from two to three bales of cotton and forty to fifty bushels of corn, besides peas, potatoes, fodder, &c., worth in current funds from three to four hundred dollars. With such inducements as these offered the German or Irish laborer how long would it take to supply the South with white labor? And what in that case would be the condition and destiny of the negro?

A great inducement to employ white labor instead of colored, is the necessity of referring all questions arising between the whites and blacks to a military one-man court for adjudication. Our civil courts are allowed to exercise jurisdiction over all cases between white men, and this gives a feeling of security in regard to those contracts which, under the present system, contracts with negroes cannot have. I think our people, as a general rule, greatly prefer the negro labor, because they are more accustomed to it, because it is a trained labor, and they know it will succeed if they can induce its faithful application; but this preference must give way before the insecurity attending it unless the Government will change its system and leave the white man and the negro face to face to work out their own destiny under the Constitution. As to the capacity of the negro for self-government you may form as good an idea as I. They are at present entirely ignorant of letters and wholly untaught in political science. If the next generation were trained and educated with a view to prepare them for the right of suffrage, I do not know that any one could say that they would not be almost as well qualified as the lowest class of foreigners after five years of residence here. Whether it would be desirable to extend the right of suffrage to either class in those States in which they would have a majority of two to one is a question which it is not worth while to answer. The negro is the most tractable and most easily governed of all the peoples of earth. He would always be the prey of the designing in politics, and would never be capable of competing with the Caucasian in the race of intellect. For myself I would rather concede the right of suffrage to the negro, including all their children and women, than to continue under the absolute rule of those who now control the affairs of the country in Congress. I do not attribute any importance to political rights in comparison with civil rights, and would yield anything of the former to secure the latter. I am not afraid to compete with any one in the management of the negro vote if we are only left to ourselves. The employer at the South would control the votes of his laborers more perfectly than the mill-owners of Lowell; and capital here in matters of that sort would pull together at the same end of the rope.

I have thus hastily thrown out my views on this comprehensive subject, and conclude that there is nothing to fear for the future prosperity of white and black in the South if they are only let alone. In this view I am free to confess I differ from the great mass of our people. They are generally distrustful of the negro in his present condition. They doubt that he can ever be induced to work, and forget that his motives than those of force may develop even greater energy and activity. But they are becoming more hopeful and are generally disposed to give the system a fair trial.

As for the white man's disposition to obey the laws and submit to the authority of the United States, there can be but one opinion. All he asks is permission to live and enjoy the accumulations of his capital and labor, the security of his person, and the sanctity of his home. He wants peace—subject to these privileges he is willing to yield everything else. He has submitted, and now submits daily to every conceivable interference with the rights and liberties he once enjoyed. Men and ladies of the highest position now yield precedence in the highway to their former slaves without question, and gentlemen do not even resent the rude jostling of the negro or the soldier, yielding without remonstrance, even though his wife or daughter may be the object of the indignity. All this is not from personal fear or a craven spirit, but to avoid misconception and a further persecution of his country. Can there be higher evidence of his readiness to obey the rule to which he is subjected?

I know there is an impression prevailing that there is a spirit of lawlessness and violence still prevailing in the South, but it is founded on fallacy. In the district in which I live, since August I have heard of but one case of violence upon a single negro. Yet statistics of crimes against negroes are collected and arrayed against us. Every trial before the military and provost courts is returned and placed on file in Washington city, and are there examined by Mr. SUMNER and his friends. Coming as they do from all the South, they constitute the statistics of violence against four million people. In the aggregate they appear to be numerous, and are construed to indicate a universal disposition to defy the authority of the Government and laws. Take the statistics of crime committed in four millions of your own operatives, and see if they would not outnumber ours. There are ten thousand negroes in this district. During the last six months there has been no trial of a white man, except for a single act of violence against one of them. Can your statistics show a fairer record? Consider in this connection the fact that all police is in the hands of a people partial to the negro and prejudiced against us, and that there is a provost court always open, and you will then be able to give the argument its full force. I know, from being a member of the Legislature of this State, that there is nowhere in South Carolina one purpose or thought of disloyalty, and that our people are ready to do anything which men may honestly do to disarm the prejudices against them. And to prove their loyalty, the fixed opinion here is that the Government is supreme, and that he is a madman and a fool who would take issue with it.

The next letter is from a northern lady, who married at the South, and has labored zealously, bravely, and wisely to aid this Government in the noble work of peace and reconstruction. My personal experience of the skill, tact, and courage of this widow, struggling to preserve the patrimony of her orphan children from the rapacity of land thieves, water thieves, and thieves of every color and kind, enables me to assure the House that not one of them, had he been present, but would have felt that the negro was the master and favored child of fortune in comparison with this white woman, almost impoverished, in danger of violence, with the title to her children's estate in jeopardy, and without the means of securing the commonest necessities of life. The guerrillas robbed her of her farm stock, the negroes eat up her provisions and refused to work for a crop. The costly culture of rice, with miles of dikes and ditches, requires constant attention; the idle and ignorant negroes forced the carpenter to neglect the dikes' flood-gates and field works necessary to protect the land from inundation, and secure a crop for their own support for the coming year. The negro had been told by the preachers and Freedmen's Bureau people that the land belonged to them, and that the white men were to be driven from the State; that the Government would give the negro food, clothing, land, and money. Such, sir, are some of the practical workings of this bureau.

WHITE HOUSE, NEAR GEORGETOWN, S. C.,
January 11, 1866.

DEAR SIR: Yours of 24th December reached me yesterday; there is no mail to Georgetown, nor no post office, which will explain the delay. You ask me to give an opinion relative to the present status of the black race in my neighborhood, with my personal experience as to their disposition to obey the laws regulating labor in the South.

Nothing can be more unsatisfactory to the true friends of the negro than his present attitude. A formidable combination exists to accept no contracts and do no work on the land. Accordingly up to this date not a sod has been turned or the slightest preparation made for planting the crop in March.

I cannot find out what it is the negroes are driving at, except it be to disgust and weary out the planters, so as to cause them to abandon their lands in despair. Early in December I offered to all my former slaves to hire them in a body for good wages and bacon, i. e., six dollars a month to the men, eight pounds bacon, and one pound tobacco, equivalent to ten dollars. It was refused with contempt, and the declaration that they would never hire for money wages. So matters now stand—no prospect of getting in our lands or making crops while we are dependent on negro caprice. What is occurring now may logically be inferred as the course to be expected at every critical stage of planting and reaping. That they have secret advisers we know, and also in my own case I know that my negroes are willing to enter into an arrangement for part of the crop, but they dare not do so at present. I regard the Freedmen's Bureau as entirely responsible for the conduct the negroes are pursuing, and whatever public speeches they may make for buncombe, their secret agents hold very different language to the blacks, based on the conviction that Mr. SUMNER's policy must prevail, and all these lands be given to the negroes. As to any disposition to obey laws regulating labor, in no instance have the blacks shown any sense of responsibility to abide by their contracts—they simply ignore them. The United States authorities in Georgetown are acting with prudence and judgment, endeavoring to restore law and order, but the area is too vast and their numbers too limited to be as efficient as the exigencies of the case require. All men's eyes and hopes rest on white immigration as the only means of insuring persistent and willing labor. What is to become of the blacks if these plans are carried out I cannot tell; they desire to live as landed gentry, and to be consumers, not producers. This state of things, I fear, must have a violent ending. The blacks appear to be in that condition which may ripen into crime. Idleness is the root of all evil, and it will prove so here, I am sure. The races can only live side by side by both respecting and carrying out the laws. You ask as to the condition of the white race, and their disposition to obey the laws. The very scanty crops made this year will in most cases barely be sufficient for seed, leaving no portion for sale. Of course the planters are very much embarrassed, without capital or credit, and naturally very desponding, seeing the probability of another short crop, and eternal confusion and struggling again in 1866. They are singularly patient, and accept the situation quietly and heroically; in no instance have I seen or heard of the slightest indisposition to obey the law. Indeed why should there be. Mere policy would dictate that course, even if honor did not bind them to it. The most cordial relations exist between the troops in Georgetown and the militia; they have been acting together of late as guards and couriers, and the effect has been to efface all lines of difference and bring about the best understanding. I have given this very imperfect sketch to go as early as possible. The remedy for all these ills may be found in inducing the negro to work—in nothing else.

The next letter is from a son of the Protestant Episcopal bishop of South Carolina. He has a large experience in the treatment of negroes:

CAMDEN, SOUTH CAROLINA, January 5, 1866.

DEAR SIR: Your letter of the 24th ultimo has just been received, and I hasten to reply and give you such information as I am able on the points suggested.

The present and future of the black race is a subject that has been exercising us greatly, and a problem that we have not yet been able to solve. The negro is remarkable for two things: his docility and his disinclination to labor of any kind. I think the ability to do nothing is more fully developed in him than in any living animal. Our experience of the past year is not encouraging for the future. It has been impossible to induce him to labor efficiently, and I know of but one or two instances in which they have not violated their contracts, either by refusal to work or by unauthorized absence; the consequence of which is that now, at the beginning of the year, it is estimated that there are not more than provisions enough in the State to supply the inhabitants for six months. On my father-in-law's plantation, where there are three hundred negroes, little or no cotton was made, and not corn enough to supply the plantation for the year to come. Their thieving propensities, too, have increased with the increased facilities for stealing, and a large proportion of the stock has been killed by them. Too alarming an extent have such depredations been carried, that it has been found necessary to keep the hogs and cattle constantly under guard. And this plantation has been, perhaps, one of the most orderly and best conducted in this neighborhood. It was found also very difficult to induce them to harvest the crop after it was made, and thousands of bushels of grain have been left to rot in the fields. What I have stated is not the experience of one man, but the concurrent testimony of all the planters of the State. At this time the planters are endeavoring to make arrangements for the year; but the freedmen almost universally refuse to contract, or require such terms as are impossible to be acceded to. I have heard them in many instances say "that they had provisions enough to go on for some time, and that they positively would not work for any man." And the impression generally is that they will idle away their time and do nothing as long as their supplies last, (they have just received their proportion of last year's crop,) and will only go to work when necessity forces them to it. They have an inordinate desire to own land, or at least to plant for themselves, and applications are constantly made to the planter to rent land. This cannot be done, however, as no security can be given for the payment of the rent, and experience does not warrant the idea that the negro will work diligently and industriously even for himself. And again, he has not the means of planting for himself, neither provisions for the year, nor utensils nor animals with which to plant.

This is a gloomy picture; and I must confess that to my mind our future is anything but bright. Still, I do not regard the experience of last year altogether conclusive. I do not know that we can take it as a criterion for the future. The negroes last year were highly elated by their new-born freedom. Their minds were inflamed by the ignorant soldiery constituting the garrisons throughout the country, and by fanatical newspapers circulated among them merely for political purposes, entirely misrepresenting the condition of things, and inducing them to believe that the lands and property of the whites were to be divided among them; thus begetting the idea that freedom consisted only in exemption from labor, and not that it is the privilege to vote for themselves and to enjoy the fruits of their labor. Still, notwithstanding all this, they have conducted themselves with commendable propriety, indicating no disposition to violence, and indolence and thieving being their chief faults, which I hope in time may be overcome, when the evil influences which have been exercised upon them shall have passed away.

Those who have been apparently most zealous for the welfare of the negro have in truth been his worst enemy. His best friend will be found to be the old master, who has lived with him, understands him, and is willing to raise him as much as possible from his present condition of ignorance and degradation. The intelligent mind of the South sees no way of making available for useful purposes this large proportion of our population without elevating him by means of education. The planters are all anxious to give the system of freed labor a fair and earnest trial for another year, but few are sanguine as to its results. The greatest difficulty in the way is the impoverished condition of the country. If the negro will work at all, it will be when he is paid weekly or daily wages, and his lost time constantly deducted, thus bringing before him the result of his indolence. But the fewest possible number of men in the State are able to do this, and the only resource left to them is to give a share of the crop. This is too remote an inducement to procure from them constant and patient labor, and up to this time I have not heard of a single plantation on which they have contracted to remain.

The utter prostration and destitute condition of the country show clearly how earnestly, and with what an honest purpose the southern people enlisted in the disastrous war from which they have just emerged, and with the same earnestness and honesty have they taken upon themselves renewed obligations to the national Government. I think it a remarkable fact, and one proving how law-abiding and order-loving are the people of this State, that after a war of four years, after the disbanding of large armies, with only military law to restrain, and that to be enforced by a mere nominal garrison in each district, we have not heard of a single case of highway robbery, and very seldom of personal violence of any kind. And an individual may travel through the most thinly inhabited portion of our State in perfect security. Rest assured, sir, that the people of this State have accepted with all sincerity the condition of things, and as they were true to the last to principles which they had long cherished, and deemed of vital importance to their welfare, so will they be true to a Government which has so far acted toward them with moderation, discretion, and wisdom. Their earnest desire is once more to be admitted into the councils of the nation, and to have a voice in the enactment of such laws as may be necessary for their future security, and for the restoration of their beloved country from the utter desolation and ruin that now exists. The integrity of the Union will never again be threatened by the southern States. Of this the North can require no greater security than is afforded in their entire helplessness and prostration, from which they will not recover for generations to come. The bone of contention has been taken away. Slavery is dead forever, and could not be restored if desired. The earnest endeavor of this State will be to elevate the social condition of the negro, and by a full, fair, and honest experiment to decide the question, whether he can be governed by reason, as he has been by coercion, and he made a useful member of society. To this end our Legislature has passed a code of laws giving them almost every privilege of the white man. That of suffrage they are not yet ready for, nor are the body of the people yet willing to accord it to them. The northern peoples should not insist upon our giving up at once our prejudices while they adhere to theirs. Time, the great softener of all things, may produce great changes, and the negro may be found capable of taking a much higher position in the social scale than that which is now accorded to him; but my firm conviction is that he must go down before the relentless energy of the Anglo-Saxon. I send you some papers containing the code above mentioned. I hope sincerely that you may prove successful in putting down fanaticism and prejudice, and in effecting the restoration of our members once more to the Halls of Congress.

With high regard and esteem, yours, respectfully,
J. M. DAVIS.

COLLECTOR'S OFFICE INTERNAL REVENUE,
THIRD DISTRICT OF SOUTH CAROLINA,
COLUMBIA, S. C., January 15, 1866.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your letter of inquiry as to the condition of the negroes in this section, and their disposition to work and obey the laws, &c., I would say that as a general thing the negroes are orderly and well behaved, but do not show much disposition to work. Their idea of freedom seems to be the privilege of doing nothing. They are only mindful of to-day and do not think of to-morrow. The idea had got very current among them that lands were to be distributed among them by the Government. They feel disappointed about this. I find, however, that a great many are offering now to go to work who before refused, and I think were it not for the evil effects produced by the mischievous agents of the Freedmen's Bureau, that the negroes would soon all see the folly of attempting to get along without work. This bureau has caused a great deal of mischief by its course. It has inculcated erroneous ideas of the views of the Government into the minds of the negroes, and the agents have in a great many instances spoken one way to the whites and another to the negroes. This has made them lose the confidence of both, and much evil has resulted from it. As to the disposition of the whites, there is no doubt but that it is far better than anybody could ever have anticipated. General Grant has given a true and correct account of the exact state of things. There is a general, not only acquiescence, but active desire on the part of all to cooperate with the Government in wiping out the past and working together for the future. I feel perfectly convinced that the admission of the southern Representatives would be the inauguration of a new era of prosperity. You of the North who have not been down here to witness the actual state of things can have a very poor conception of the general prostrate condition of this section and the actual state of destitution that almost all are in. Families who counted their income by thousands, now are almost in a state of starvation. I believe that in this place not less than six or eight common street carts are driven by gentlemen who before the war owned property valued at $250,000, and who now support their families on from one dollar to one dollar and fifty cents per day, which they get for a load of wood or other hauling. What makes it worse, all are in this condition or almost so; there are none with means to help the others.

Yours, very truly,
JAMES GIBBES,
Collector Third District of South Carolina.
JOHN W. CHANLER.

The last letter I shall present to the House is from the late presiding officer of the Senate of South Carolina, now a judge on the bench of the highest court of that State:

SUMTER, SOUTH CAROLINA, January 4, 1866.

DEAR SIR: Your letter of the 24th ultimo did not reach me until yesterday.

The subject-matter on which you desire information is full of difficulty and surrounded by so many conflicting views that it is not an easy task to arrive at an opinion which one would accept as just and true.

During the whole war the slave population demeaned themselves in a quiet and peaceful manner. Though our male citizens were absent in the army, and the large majority of whites at home were women and children, still they exhibited no indication of antagonism, or even restlessness. They worked with spirit although they knew that the products of their labor, in large proportions, contributed to the support of the confederate army. They went cheerfully to the sea-coast to aid in the erection of batteries and fortifications, and [though] in close proximity to the Federal forces, with available opportunity of escape, it was a rare thing that one failed to return to his home on the expiration of his term of service. With the entry, however, of the Federal forces during the war, a change appeared to "come over the spirit of their dreams," and wherever the United States military appeared, even only marching through the country, not only did they, to a great extent, perceive and appreciate the new influence, but in numbers they abandoned their old homes and associations, and in many instances their children, to follow their new fortunes, as they supposed, led by their deliverers, carrying with them all the spoils on which they could lay their hands, even if confined to them in a trustful capacity. Many who had better understanding, and more sense than the others, remained, saying that if they were to be free they would prefer to be at their old homes, and near their masters, who they thought would befriend and aid them. Those, however, who did remain, from the moment that of active wrong, still were sullen, impertinent, and altogether idle. After the authorities compelled them to contract for plantation work for the last year, on really good terms to them, they were so regardless of orders and instructions that all obedience was at an end, and the result was that, although they had a direct interest in the crop, but little, comparatively, was made. In many instances the ink was scarcely dry on the contract before its terms were violated, and no kindly advice, or threat of punishment by the provost court, could induce them to the pursuance of a course which was demanded, as well by the engagements which they had in writing assumed, as by a sense of their own benefit and welfare. Employers were generally yielding and quiescent, for various reasons, and forbore to trouble the authorities with complaints which were apparently not of much consequence in themselves, but when considered in relation to their influence on the crops, were serious and important. They had been told by the soldiers, and had heard reported from speeches of persons in high authority, that they were to have lands given to them, and this idea of sudden acquisition of property for which they had not toiled seemed to be almost the only one which absorbed all their consideration. Things thus continued until nearly the close of the year. Wrapped up in this conceit of soon possessing lands, they declined making contracts for the coming year, and appeared to prefer contracting with any one rather than with their former masters—though not inclined to contract at all—under the idea, I suppose, that they would not be regarded as really free unless they left the service of their former owners.

At the incoming of the new year, although they became satisfied that they were not to get land from the Government, they still appeared to be chary of contracting, and are now wandering about from place to place, with no settled views, hoping that something better may "turn up" for them. Of course there are, here and there, exceptions to the class thus referred to. In some instances you may find them reasonable, and disposed to do that which is right, and to make such provisions for their families as would be dictated to them by a proper sense of duty.

Whether in the South crops can be raised by voluntary labor of the colored people is an experiment which remains to be tested; and it will take more than a year to solve it. The delirium which possesses the freedmen, induced by their sudden freedom, must pass away, and must be succeeded by the sober second thought of cool and uninfamed judgment. These people have always had some one to think for and to take care of them; to guard them against the cold of winter and the heat of summer; to supply them not only with food and clothing, but with medical attendance, and to teach them, in fact, how to take care of themselves. My apprehension (I trust not well founded) is that they will not work during the present year, even if they make engagements; for it appears, beyond doubt, that they cannot be impressed with any regard as to the observance of a contract, even after they assume it. When this is the case, what can you expect as the result of labor, when that labor can only be secured and compelled through the medium of a contract, which one of the parties thereto holds in utter disregard? Education may do something, but the fruits of this culture can only be made apparent in time to come. In the interim, what is to become of the tree? It must live, and nothing can be looked to for its preservation but its proper culture and training by the white man, under the kind aid of Providence. To this end I feel satisfied that our whole people will contribute, inspired by the duty which they have assumed in their renewed obligation to our common country, the United States. I do not mean to say that here and there you may not find a stubborn spirit who cannot recognize things as they are, and who, smarting under the sudden loss of his property, can only appreciate, by being taught, the duty which he owes to this new class of society, the freedmen. These instances, I am glad to say, are rare.

Our people, as a mass, I am gratified to acknowledge, are not only resolved, but ardently so, to yield a perfect obedience to the proper authority of the United States. Whatever wrongs they supposed they suffered, they trusted to the arbitrament of the sword. If it is a bitter umpire, it is, however, a decisive one. As such they feel and recognize it. The award has been against them, and they accept the new condition of things not only as a necessity, but as the terms of a conquest, to which they acceded. They have thus pledged their honor "to stand the hazard of the die," and to that honor they will be true. I regard the people of this State as disposed, to as full an extent as are those of New York or Ohio, to yield a ready acquiescence to the authority of the General Government. Our futures are now one, and so must be, and are, our hopes. Our efforts will be to contribute all in our power to the permanent happiness and prosperity of our common country.

Hon. J. W. CHANLER.

We have from these letters a statement of the white man as to the condition of things at the South. The practical working of the Freedmen's Bureau is there impartially and honestly given. The honorable gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROUSSEAU] in his argument to-day against this bill confirms, from personal experience, all that has been stated through these letters.

Now, sir, it seems to be a proper question for the philanthropic element of this House to ask who are the downtrodden sufferers in the southern States. Are the poor whites or the poor negroes most in need of charity, protection, and support by the General Government? Time, common sense, and the development of truth will remove the difficulties and dangers which now balk the work of reconstruction. I have confidence in the President of this Union, and in the honest patriotism of the masses, North and South. Had I not such confidence the future of this country would to my mind be a sad one. Sickly sentimentality and pseudo-philanthropy will never restore harmony, sympathy, and friendly intercourse between the different sections of the country. As a specimen of the course pursued by some of the United States officers in charge of the Freedmen's Bureau, I insert the following, taken from the Boston Commonwealth, February 3, 1866. The only public schools of Charleston formerly used for the poor white children have been taken possession of by the Freedmen's Bureau for the black children. With that explanation the address of the brave general will be more fully appreciated:

"FAREWELL TO GENERAL SAXTON.—The colored people of Charleston and vicinity gave General Saxton a very touching instance of their love and appreciation on the occasion of his leaving that department. Resolutions were passed and several articles of table use, in silver, presented, purchased from their voluntary contributions. The children of the colored schools added a copy of the Bible, a prayer and hymn book, and a photographic album. Addresses were made by Rev. J. C. Gibbs, Samuel Dickinson, formerly a slave, a Mr. Coffin, and General Saxton. The school children sang several appropriate hymns. The general's address was as follows:

"My friends—Men and women of Charleston—Children of the public schools—Fellow-citizens of the United States of America: I thank you for this beautiful and unexpected testimonial of your affection. I know how ill you could afford it, and therefore it is a thousand times more precious to me than would be those gifts which the rich, out of their abundance, give to successful heroes. I have heard how those little school children dropped in their mits, all that they had, to give me a parting gift of affection; and while it pains me to take aught from them, still, remembering that it is more blessed to give than to receive, I feel proud and happy to be the recipient of this gift, which I shall treasure always; and, when my work on earth is ended, if worthy to receive it, it may be the brightest jewel in my crown.

"In the four years I have spent in South Carolina, I can truly say that I have tried to be faithful to the defenseless ones committed in so large a measure to my keeping. God in His infinite wisdom only knows how I have fulfilled my trust. I accept this beautiful testimonial as the verdict of your approval.

"In saying a last good-bye, I have only to ask you to overlook my errors and short-comings, and to give me your blessing and your prayers. We all have our trials, even in this day-dawn of liberty, when the whole horizon seems lighted up with bright hopes for freedom. But we must strive to bear them bravely, so that if we have the cross we may be fit to wear the crown of glory. I have no words to express my feelings to-night. I can only say I thank you, and bid you a last good-bye."

CHARACTER OF THIS BUREAU.

The present bill is a step further in the direction of usurpation and unlawfulness which gave rise to the original bill of the Thirty-Seventh Congress. The original bill was limited and sectional, the creature of a war policy, and by a reason-consistency put under the control of the Secretary of War. That necessity has ceased with the war. This bureau is now to become a land office for the sale and renting of public lands, for regulating labor, and controlling, or rather excluding, foreign immigration. It will spread its net over the whole Union to catch the unwary or intimidate the cautious laborer who may wish to settle on the public lands. It will strike at the root of our national wealth and political economy by interfering with the question of wages and labor in every State where it may be established. It has failed to be a benefit to either white or black man or to meet the expectations of its friends in any valuable degree of usefulness. It is not only not self-supporting but wasteful, and promotes dishonesty and monopolizes land speculation.

OBJECTIONS.

There are many objections to this bill already fully presented and urged by strong arguments by the members who have preceded me. I have not heard all the arguments advanced, but so far as my knowledge of the debate goes the objections to the bill have not been met by the friends of the measure.

From my own point of view, I object to the bill as unnecessary, unconstitutional. It usurps powers fatal to representative government; it is partisan in its character; it interferes with legitimate trade; checks and diverts immigration by special legislation; it strikes at State limits and State sovereignty; it seeks to control the relation of labor and wages to the injury of white labor throughout the Union; it will control the sale and rent of lands by executive interference; it overrides State laws regulating property and protecting vested rights; it establishes an unconstitutional, unwarranted court of judicature of doubtful powers and of a dangerous precedent; it overrides civil government by military dominion; it destroys the muniments of common law, and violates the express provisions of the Constitution, which secures to every citizen a fair and impartial trial by jury; it makes the negro a slave again to the local commissioner, who has an arbitrary power over the most sacred rights of person and property; it is made to regulate the interests of the people of the South who are not represented here in the manner to which they are entitled under the Declaration of Independence and the provisions of the Constitution, which assert the inalienable right of the governed to be represented in the administration of Government; it is exclusive in its character, surrendering lands, and providing homes, clothing, and food for the black man alone, at the expense of the white laborer, who has to earn his wages, land, and support by the sweat of his brow; it promotes idleness, the parent of every vice and crime; it is not philanthropic, but partisan, sectional, and subversive of all the principles of well-ordered society; it establishes a class distinction fatal to the dignity of labor, through the local land agents, who can become the petty chiefs of the ignorant and docile negro subjected to their control; it stirs up the natural antipathies between the races, should any white men so far degrade themselves by accepting the condition of temporary serfdom established by this bill; it entails great and unnecessary expense on the Government at a time when the strictest economy should be the practice of the Government more than at any other period, in face of the immense national debt.

The bill does not meet the requirements of the freedmen. Three million acres set aside for the purpose of this bureau would settle three hundred and seventy-five thousand persons out of four and a half millions, or about one person in twelve of the whole number. If these four and a half millions are consolidated in one body it is practical colonization, and should be left to the same laws which regulate the migration of the white race. If the black race are to be scattered over different portions of the States named in the bill at the will of the local agents, the conflict in every relation of life must spring up between the white and black settlers, against the fatal consequences of which the bill will be no protection. Nor can any amendment to the bill protect the refugee, whom it would invite to struggle single-handed against a "sea of troubles."

The bill is too indefinite as to time, and leaves the culture of cotton, which is one of the main sources of national wealth, without security and without any certain prospect of improvement. In one word, while the bill proposes to regulate labor by stringent provision, it practically throws labor in the southern States into greater agitation than it has ever before known. It disturbs the relations which free, intelligent labor has always established for itself. The bill protects ignorant black labor against a fair competition with the white immigrant.

I will endeavor to present the objections to this bill more in detail, section by section, even at the risk of repetition.

AN ACT TO ENLARGE POWERS OF FREEDMEN'S BUREAU.

Section one strikes down State limits.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the act to establish a Bureau for the Relief of Freedmen and Refugees, approved March 3, 1865, shall continue in force until otherwise provided by law, and shall extend to refugees and freedmen in all parts of the United States, and the President may divide the section of country containing such refugees and freedmen into districts, each containing one or more States, not to exceed twelve in number, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint an assistant commissioner for each of said districts, who shall give like bond, receive the compensation, and perform the duties prescribed by this act and the act to which this is an amendment; or said bureau may, in the discretion of the President, be placed under a Commissioner and assistant commissioners, to be detailed from the Army, in which event each officer so assigned to duty shall serve without increase of pay or allowances.

Section two will establish military dominion in place of State governments.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner, with the approval of the President, and when the same shall be necessary for the operations of the bureau, may divide each district into a number of sub-districts, not to exceed the number of counties or parishes in such district, and shall assign to each sub-district at least one agent, either a citizen, officer of the Army, or enlisted man, who, if an officer, shall serve without additional compensation or allowance, and if a citizen or enlisted man, shall receive a salary of not less than $500 nor more than $1,200 annually, according to the services rendered, in full compensation for such services; and such agent shall, before entering on the duties of his office, take the oath prescribed in the first section of the act to which this is an amendment. And the Commissioner may, when the same shall be necessary, assign to each assistant commissioner not exceeding three clerks, and to each of said agents one clerk, at an annual salary not exceeding $1,000 each, provided suitable clerks cannot be detailed from the Army. And the President of the United States, through the War Department and the Commissioner, shall extend military jurisdiction and protection over all employes, agents, and officers of this bureau in the exercise of the duties imposed or authorized by this act or the act to which this is additional.

Section three will keep up a vast and expensive commissary department in time of peace, laying useless burdens on our over-taxed people, interfering with legitimate trade, and establishing a monopoly of the provision market of all domestic stuffs and of implements of agriculture.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of War may direct such issues of provisions, clothing, fuel, and other supplies, including medical stores and transportation, and afford such aid, medical or otherwise, as he may deem needful for the immediate and temporary shelter and supply of destitute and suffering refugees and freedmen, their wives and children, under such rules and regulations as he may direct.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the President is hereby authorized to reserve from sale or from settlement under the homestead or preemption laws, and to set apart for the use of freedmen and loyal refugees, male or female, unoccupied public lands in Florida, Mississippi, Alabama, Louisiana, and Arkansas; not exceeding in all three million acres of good land; and the Commissioner, under the direction of the President, shall cause the same from time to time to be allotted and assigned in parcels not exceeding forty acres each, to the loyal refugees and freedmen, who shall be protected in the use and enjoyment thereof, for such term of time and at such annual rent as may be agreed on between the Commissioner and said refugee and freedman. The rental shall be based upon a valuation of the land, to be ascertained in such manner as the Commissioner may, under the direction of the President, by regulation prescribe. At the end of such term or sooner, if the Commissioner shall assent thereto, the occupant of any parcels so assigned, their heirs and assigns, may purchase the land and receive a title thereto from the United States in fee, upon paying therefor the value of the land, ascertained as aforesaid.

It proposes to found a negro State and organize a war of races, in which the General Government is pledged to defend the black race at the cost of the white man's blood and money. While the bill is too indefinite to protect or to be just to the individual governed, it gives arbitrary power to the Commissioner greater and more dangerous than that exercised by the slaveholder or the overseer. It allows the Commissioner to control the rate of rents of land throughout the district and State, which is fatal to fair trade, and can easily be used to hinder white immigration. Practically, the monopoly of the land of the States where this bureau shall operate will be in the hands of the Commissioner or his friends, who professedly and by the very nature of this bureau, will give the preference to black freedmen over loyal white immigrants. Now, who are loyal refugees alluded to in this bill? How does this bill extend the benefits of this bureau to them? What rights are secured to them by its provisions? General Howard's report clearly states the fact that this bureau is for the black and not for the white man. It does not even provide for the black man who was free before the President's proclamation. By the policy of this bill the white citizen has been debarred of his preëemptive right to the Government lands, so clearly fixed in the course pursued toward the Indian tribes.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the occupants of land under Major General Sherman's special field order, dated at Savannah, January 16, 1865, are hereby confirmed in their possession for the period of three years from the date of said order, and no person shall be disturbed in or ousted from said possession during said three years, unless a settlement shall be made with said occupant, by the owner, satisfactory to the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau: Provided, That whenever the owners of lands occupied under General Sherman's field order shall be entitled to restoration of said lands the Commissioner is hereby authorized, upon the agreement, and with the written consent of said occupants—to procure other lands for them by rent or purchase, or to set apart for them out of the public lands assigned for that purpose in section four of this bill, forty acres each, upon the terms and conditions named in said section.

General Sherman's field order No. 15 comprehends those lands situate on the sea-coast of South Carolina south of Charleston, and the abandoned rice fields for thirty miles from the sea. The rice fields have been restored under circular No. 15 from the bureau, and a great part of Edisto, James, Johns, and Wadmalaw Islands have been restored under orders from General Howard, that vacant plantations, and those with only a few freedmen, should be restored at once, the freedmen being provided for elsewhere—say one half of the above islands. Hilton Head, Port Royal, and St. Helena, are, according to the opinion of Attorney General Speed, under the direct tax act, and not within the purview of the order, and not under the control of the bureau, and never were. So then, so far as South Carolina is concerned—and the territory is smaller in the other States—the land in question is only a moiety of Edisto, Wadmalaw, Johns, and James Islands:

Edisto containing about.....	Acres.
The others, say, Wadmalaw.....	30,000
Johns and James Islands.....	30,000
	40,000
One half to be restored at once under existing orders.....	100,000
Leaving as in question in the whole territory,	50,000

On Edisto at a very late investigation there were not more than 2,000 freedmen on that island, of which sixty-seven had certificates, making 2,680 acres. From the same on James, Johns, and Wadmalaw, there were not more than one hundred certificates, 4,000 acres, making a total on all the islands of 6,680 acres. The islands can more than absorb the labor on it: in fact there is no danger, if the negroes will contract, but what there will be plenty of work for them. General Sherman intended his order as a temporary resting-place for persons who were following his camp, and not to make grants of these lands. Under the confiscation act of Congress the President was empowered to pardon as well as under the Constitution.

WASHINGTON, February 2, 1866.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of February 1, and, in compliance with your request, I inclose herewith a copy of field order No. 15, of 1865, with this brief history of the origin and reasons for making it:

Hon. E. M. Stanton, Secretary of War, came to Savannah soon after its occupation by the forces under my command, and conferred freely with me as to the best method to provide for the vast number of negroes who had followed the army from the interior of Georgia, as also of those who had already congregated on the island near Hilton Head, and were still coming into our lines. We agreed perfectly that the young and able-bodied men should be enlisted as soldiers, or employed by the quartermaster in the necessary work of unloading ships and for other army purposes; but this left on our hands the old and feeble, the women and children, who had necessarily to be fed by the United States.

Mr. Stanton summoned a large number of the old negroes, mostly preachers, with whom he held a long conference, of which he took down notes. After this conference he was satisfied that the negroes could, with some little aid from us, by means of the abandoned plantations on the sea islands and along the navigable rivers, take care of themselves. He requested me to draw up a plan that would be uniform and practicable. I made the rough draft, and we went over it very carefully. Mr. Stanton making many changes, and the present orders No. 15 resulted and were made public.

I knew, of course, we could not convey the title to land, and merely provided possessory titles to be good so long as war and our military power lasted. I merely aimed to make provisions for the negroes who were absolutely dependent on us, leaving the value of their possession to be determined by after events or legislation. At that time, January, 1865, it will be remembered that the tone of the people of the South was very defiant, and no one could tell when the period of war would cease; therefore I did not contemplate that event as being so near at hand.

I am, with great respect, your obedient servant,
W. T. SHERMAN, Major General.
To ANDREW JOHNSON, President of the United States.

It is evident from the above that possession in a legal sense never was given by General Sherman's order. It was a temporary arrangement, made in time of war, for the purpose of disposing of the large mass of negro slaves who were living on the army rations and obstructing military movements.

There is no possession requiring any process of law to oust except it be as trespassers.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner shall, under the direction of the President, procure in the name of the United States, by grant or purchase, such lands within the districts aforesaid as may be required for refugees and freedmen dependent on the Government for support; and he shall provide or cause to be erected suitable buildings for asylums and schools. But no such purchase shall be made, nor contract for the same entered into, nor other expense incurred, until after appropriations shall have been provided by Congress for such purposes. And no payments shall be made for lands purchased under this section, except for asylums and schools, from any moneys not specifically appropriated therefor. And the Commissioner shall cause such lands, from time to time to be valued, allotted, assigned, and sold in manner and form provided in the fourth section of this act at a price not less than the cost thereof to the United States.

Another monopoly: the bill by this section tends to control all sale of lands within those districts, and practically prevents purchases by any party not in the bureau or within the influence of its policy.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That whenever in any State or district in which the ordinary course of judicial proceedings has been interrupted by the rebellion, and wherein, in consequence of any State or local law, ordinance, police or other regulations, custom or prejudice, any of the civil rights or immunities belonging to white persons, including the right to make and enforce contracts, to sue, be parties, and give evidence, to inherit, purchase, lease, sell, hold, and convey real and personal property, and to have full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings for the security of person and estate, are refused or denied to negroes, mulattoes, freedmen, refugees, or any other persons, on account of race, color, or any previous condition of slavery or involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, or wherein they or any of them are subjected to any other or different punishment, pains, or penalties for the commission of any act or offense than are prescribed for white persons committing like acts or offenses, it shall be the duty of the President of the United States, through the Commissioner, to extend military protection and jurisdiction over all cases affecting such persons so discriminated against—

Overrides the State laws regulating property; establishes an unconstitutional court of doubtful jurisdiction and of dangerous powers; disturbs the even course of justice by the strong arm of executive interference and military usurpation.

This gives the bureau the character of an inquisition to inspect, reform, amend, or abolish the whole judicial codes of every State in the Union.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That any person who, under color of any State or local law, ordinance, police, or other regulation, or custom, shall in any State or district in which the ordinary course of judicial proceedings has been interrupted by the rebellion, subject, or cause to be subjected, any negro, mulatto, freedman, refugee, or other person on account of race or color, or any previous condition of slavery or involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, or for any other cause, to the deprivation of any civil right secured to white persons, or to any other or different punishment than white persons are subject to for the commission of like acts or offenses, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and be punished by fine not exceeding $1,000, or imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both; and it shall be the duty of the officers and agents of this bureau to take jurisdiction of, and hear and determine all offenses committed against the provisions of this section, and also of all cases affecting negroes, mulattoes, freedmen, refugees, or other persons who are discriminated against in any of the particulars mentioned in the preceding section of this act, under such rules and regulations as the President of the United States through the War Department shall prescribe. The jurisdiction conferred by this and the preceding section on the officers and agents of this bureau shall cease and determine whenever the discrimination on account of which it is conferred ceases, and in no event to be exercised in any State in which the ordinary course of judicial proceedings has not been interrupted by the rebellion, nor in any such State after said State shall have been fully restored in all its constitutional relations to the United States, and the courts of the State and of the United States within the same are not disturbed or stopped in the peaceable course of justice.

Destroys the muniments of common law and violates the express provisions of the Constitution, which secures to every citizen a fair and impartial trial by jury.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

A suggestion as an additional section—a new suit of clothes with brass buttons, stamped with the letters of the alphabet, so that each negro who runs may read and enlighten.

MONOPOLY OF SOUTHERN LAND.

To the people of the district which I have the honor to represent on this floor the establishing of anything like monopoly is in the highest degree offensive and oppressive. A large majority of my constituents earn their bread by the sweat of their brow; all of them are working men, in the large sense of the word, and an idler is not tolerated or respected among them. Many of them are of foreign birth, and without any means of competing with the United States Government in a control of the sale and rental of public lands in the South or anywhere.

It is clearly my duty, as it is my pleasure, to protect them openly and fearlessly against the injustice of this plan of monopoly, and, if possible, preserve to them all their privileges as citizens against the unfair administration of the laws enacted by this Congress in favor exclusively of the negro.

Mr. Speaker, the eye of capital has much speculation in it just now as it squints toward the fat lands of the South. There are many well-ordered schemes on foot to secure the control of the ancient dominion of old King Cotton. The lords of shoddy have exhausted the field of battle and now look for other ampler verge and scope for their operations. Yesterday it was the fashion to make contracts, to-day it is the proper thing to make constitutions, which may clear the way for these patriots, whose cry now is, "To-morrow to fresh woods and pastures new." The President in his message has given the people a timely hint of the future plans and enterprise of capitalists when he says:

"Our Governments springs from and was made for the people—not the people for the Government. To them it owes allegiance; from them it must derive its courage, strength, and wisdom. But, while the Government is thus bound to defer to the people, from whom it derives its existence, it should, from the very consideration of its origin, be strong in its power of resistance to the establishment of inequalities. Monopolies, perpetuities, and class legislation are contrary to the genius of free government, and ought not to be allowed. Here, there is no room for favored classes or monopolies; the principle of our Government is that of equal laws and freedom of industry. Where ever monopoly attains a foothold, it is sure to be a source of danger, discord, and trouble. We shall but fulfill our duties as legislators by according 'equal and exact justice to all men,' special privileges to none. The Government is subordinate to the people; but, as the agent and representative of the people, it must be held superior to monopolies, which, in themselves, exist never to be granted, and which, where they exist, must be subordinate and yield to the Government."

Mr. Speaker, let us hope that this House will sustain the President in his patriotic and constitutional course in thus protecting the laboring classes and the whole people against the interested acts of a few.

That these plans are now beginning to take shape, I infer from the documents which I quote to the House:

"General William L. Burt, late of Governor Andrew's staff, has started on a tour through the South, with a view to aid the operations of the American Land Company."—Commonwealth, February 3, 1866.

The design of the "United States Mutual Protection Company" is the occupation, by loyal citizens of the northern States, of desirable plantations in the various southern States lately in rebellion, thereby infusing into them a healthy and loyal element, and, at the same time, promoting the pecuniary interests of the patriotic men who shall be instrumental in effecting this work.

Assurances of the approval of the objects of this company have been received from the different Executive Departments of the Government, including the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, &c., and such effective aid in carrying them out as they can lawfully furnish; and nothing remains to secure the complete success of the enterprise but the hearty cooperation of the loyal citizens of the northern States.

LAND MONOPOLY.

Now, sir, the question of vital importance in all this discussion is, whether in the repopulation and restoration of the South the labor is to be white or black.

I will here read an extract from the speech of the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. DONNELLY,] delivered on February 1:

"Immigration moves only in the direction of prosperity. The amount of immigration to a country is a fair indication of the number of advantages it enjoys. If you hand the South over to themselves; if you permit the oppression of the freedman; if you permit the reestablishment of slavery under a new name, you will shut off immigration as effectually as it was shut off in the old days of slavery. The northern man would not be welcome there. The European would not go there to labor in competition with a wretched and degraded race."

I am in favor of white workmen, and oppose this Freedmen's Bureau bill because it makes an unjust discrimination against them. I wish to lay all the facts of the case before the country, and to let the labor of the country know what capital is about. Fair play to all sides and hands off is all the white man wants of his Government; competition, skill, and pluck will do the rest.

United States Mutual Protection Homestead Company.

Repopulation of the South; the great industrial question of the age; facts and figures.

Beyond a doubt the most important question ever presented to the civilized world is, how the industrial condition of the southern States, lately the theater of a sanguinary war, can be reestablished upon a firm and prosperous basis.

The interest in this question is not confined to those States or to the United States. It extends to every civilized nation, and to every town, hamlet, and individual of those nations. Inasmuch as the supply of cotton, tobacco, rice, sugar, and molasses depends upon their successful cultivation in those States, and as the price of these productions depends upon the quantity produced, every individual, as such, who wears cotton fabrics or consumes these productions has a deep personal interest in this question. The consumer of cotton fabrics is now compelled to pay exorbitant prices over what he paid in 1860, because cotton is now worth from forty cents to one dollar and fifty cents per pound, while in 1860 the same article was worth only from six to twenty cents, and the reason of the high price of cotton is to be found in the fact that since 1860, when the product of that year in those States amounted to over five million bales, the amount produced has been nominal; and so of all other productions of those States; and yet their capability to produce the crop of 1860 is not diminished, except in the disorganization of their industrial system. The economists of the North, who have paid but little attention to this question, will be astonished at the immense productions of those States in 1860, as shown by the eighth census reports.

Alabama.

Alabama had under cultivation 6,385,724 acres of land, and produced:

Live stock, value.....	$22,096,977

While Louisiana alone produced 221,761 hogheads of sugar, and 13,439,772 gallons of molasses.

The cash value of purchased lands in these States in 1860 was:

Alabama.....	$175,824,622
Georgia.....	157,072,803
Florida.....	16,435,727
South Carolina.....	139,652,508

Mississippi.....	326,631	218,315,500
Arkansas.....	111,115	55,517,500

The great question now is to provide for these States an efficient industrial system, to take the place of the one we have destroyed—to provide an industrial system which shall produce the amount of cotton, tobacco, rice, sugar, and molasses raised in 1860, for the want of which a universal cry of distress ascends from the nations and all people. The cotton crop of the South in 1860 was 5,385,897 bales, while the entire crop of this year will be overestimated at 1,000,000 bales.

In 1860 the
Tobacco crop was, pounds.....434,183,561
Sugar, hogheads.....234,382
Cane molasses, gallons.....14,563,563
Sorghum molasses, gallons.....6,681,185
Rice, pounds.....187,167,662

Not one fifth of this amount will be produced this year; and when it is considered that the cultivation of these products has been almost entirely abandoned for the last four years, the importance of immediate action upon this question cannot be overestimated.

A wise policy, inaugurated at once by the capitalists of the North and by the land-owners of the South, will reproduce the crop of 1860 in three years. At the expiration of President Johnson's Administration, in 1869, this immense wealth, destroyed during the four years of war, may be restored and the wants of the world again supplied. The people of the South have taken the initiative by offering to sell their lands at nominal prices, or lease their cultivated lands at reasonable rates for a term of years. They invite, in good faith, northern and foreign emigration. Let northern capitalists and the northern people respond with like liberality, and the reestablishment of a healthy industrial condition will result in a prosperity unequalled in the history of any country.

This industrial question of the South is also very intimately connected with the currency and finances of the country. Of the 5,386,897 bales of cotton produced in 1860, not over 1,500,000 bales were consumed in this country, leaving for exportation 3,886,897, which, at ten cents per pound, furnished $155,475,880 to supply the place of specie in our foreign exchange, and which, if produced this year, at the present prices, say forty cents per pound, would supply the place of $621,903,520 of specie which now goes to pay for importations.

The balance of trade must be paid in specie, unless paid in cotton which is to Europe the same as specie; and if that additional amount of specie could be retained at home it would tend greatly to strengthen the paper currency of the Government, and probably avoid altogether the much-dreaded financial crisis.

Of the 22,443,897 acres of cultivated lands in the above-mentioned States, probably not over one half has been cultivated this year, and cannot be cultivated for years to come without the aid of capital and labor. To be drawn from beyond their limits. From reliable information, it is fair to conclude that at least five million acres of these lands are now subject to purchase or lease, with the right of purchase at from five to twenty dollars per acre; the rent from two to five dollars per acre. As an incipient step toward attaining this most desirable result of reestablishing the industrial system of these States, and in contemplation of rendering efficient aid, a temporary organization was made of gentlemen, principally in this city, in August last, forming a company under the name of "The United States Mutual Protection Company for Encouraging Settlements in the Southern States," of which Hon. Alexander W. Randall, First Assistant Postmaster General, was elected President, Dr. John Trimble, Secretary, John R. Elvans, Esq., Treasurer, having a general office at 273 F street, Washington, D. C.; C. A. Stevens, Esq., general agent. The object of this organization was to combine such influences as would tend to bring together the land-holders of the South and the capitalists and labor of the North. This company have issued and widely circulated two circulars, of some fifteen pages each, setting forth the objects of the organization and the advantages resulting both to the land-owners of the South and the capital and labor of the North, and it has further been widely circulated by the press all over the North.

The company has already many applications from southern land-owners for tenants, and some five hundred families are ready to move South in the month of January next. There is a universal interest through the North in this enterprise, as it affords protection and the prospect of an easy and rapid accumulation of wealth.

It is contemplated by the company to make settlements of fifty families in a location, thereby securing mutual protection, schools, and religious worship. The company further contemplate securing a charter from Congress at an early day in the present session, with a capital of $3,000,000, and a large number of the most prominent capitalists in New York, Boston, and Chicago have intimated their desire to participate in this corporation. It is the intention, after a permanent organization shall be effected, to make advances of means to parties owning plantations, and who are not at present able to cultivate their lands without assistance, as well as to assist persons of small means from the North who are desirous of settling South. A number of large land-owners and men of influence from various parts of the southern States are also ready to unite in the company, and make common cause in this great work of reanimating the industrial interest of their beautiful but unfortunate southern land.

It will be observed in this advertisement of the United States Mutual Protection Homestead Company, special attention is drawn to the period of time at which the President's Administration ceases.

I need not dwell on the plain principles of political economy which give the control of the wealth to that country or section which has the largest exports at command; nor to the evident advantage to the cotton-spinners of this country to have the mastery of the cotton-growing section and the labor of that section. In my opinion, this Freedmen's Bureau bill tends to the monopoly of the producing lands of the South, as well as to control the labor which may be introduced or maintained on those lands. The effort of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Elliot] to push through this House a bill for excluding from registration many hundred thousand tons of American shipping, in the interest of New England alone, is a fair type of what the whole country has to look for from that quarter.

So far as these schemes tend to develop the national resources, national harmony, and national greatness, consistently with the welfare of the people, first the white race and then all others, I am not opposed to them. But so far as they are mere monopolies, I denounce them as dangerous and unpatriotic.

Sir, with one more reference to the President's message in relation to this and all kindred measures, I close my remarks.

This bureau is eminently a military bureau. I have given its history; and the absorption of this bureau by the War Department fixes its character and future control.

MILITARY CHARACTER.

The President in his recent message draws attention to another important feature in the matter of reconstruction, namely, emigration:

"I found the States suffering from the effects of a civil war. Resistance to the General Government appeared to have exhausted itself. The United States had recovered possession of their forts and arsenals; and their armies were in the occupation of every State which had attempted to secede. Whether the territory within the limits of those States should be held as conquered territory, under military authority emanating from the President as the head of the Army, was the first question that presented itself for decision.

"Now, military governments, established for an indefinite period, would have offered no security for the early suppression of discontent; would have divided the people into the vanquishers and the vanquished; and would have envenomed hatred, rather than have restored affection. Once established, no precise limit to their continuance was conceivable. They would have occasioned an incalculable and exhausting expense. Peaceful emigration to and from that portion of the country is one of the best means that can be thought of for the restoration of harmony, and that emigration would have been prevented; for what emigrant from abroad, what industrious citizen at home, would place himself willingly under military rule?"

Now, sir, the words of the President are words of wisdom and of truth on this subject.

Our people are not willing to live under military rule.

This bureau is under military rule. It proposes to perpetuate and strengthen itself by the present bill.

It founds an "imperium in imperio" to protect black labor against white labor.

It excludes the foreign immigrant from the lands given to the native-born negro.

It subjects the white native-born citizen to the ignominy of surrendering his patrimony, his self-respect, and his right to labor into the hands of negroes, idle, ignorant, and misled by fanatic, selfish speculators. We have heard a great deal from the political wiseacres on this floor who follow the lead of the executive member from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] and we have also heard the report of Generals Howard and Sherman on the same subjects. Now I will add an extract from General Grant's report on the condition of the South and leave the verdict to the people:

"Conversations on the subject, however, with officers connected with the bureau lead me to think that in some of the States its affairs have not been conducted with good judgment or economy, and that the belief, widely spread among the freedmen of the southern States, that the lands of their former owners will, at least in part, be divided among them, has come from the agents of this bureau. This belief is seriously interfering with the willingness of the freedmen to make contracts for the coming year."

* * * "The effect of the belief in division of lands is idleness and accumulation in camps, towns, and cities. In such cases I think it will be found that vice and disease will tend to the extermination or great reduction of the colored race. It cannot be expected that the opinions held by men at the South for years can be changed in a day, and therefore the freedmen require for a few years not only laws to protect them, but the fostering care of those who will give them good counsel and on whom they can rely."

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of some sort of bureau for the negro, who is a foreigner and a ward of our Government just as the Indian tribes have, to regulate their relations with this Government.

There is no necessity of a special military bureau of this character at this time. The necessity for it ceased with the war. I insert here references to the valuable work of Story on the Constitution and Curtis's History of the Constitution in relation to the treatment and policy of our Government toward Indian tribes, rather as a suggestion to the honorable chairman of the committee who has charge of this bill, without much hope that it will be accepted as a hint for a change of his policy in this matter.

The preemptive right in the soil is in the white race. The sovereignty of this Government springs from and belongs to the white race exclusively. The negro race, freed from slavery, have become the wards of the Government, and are to be treated in their relations to us by a system similar to that established by the Government in its intercourse with the Indian tribes. For the policy of the United States Government toward Indian tribes, see Story's Commentaries on the Constitution, volume two, pages 540-542, and Curtis's History of the Constitution, volume two, pages 325-367.

On the question of the preemptive right of the United States to Indian lands being a barrier to protect the Indian, see United States Statutes-at-Large, volume one, page 138, section four, chapter thirty-four.

Reconstruction.

SPEECH OF HON. C. DELANO, OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 10, 1866,

On the political condition of the States lately in rebellion.

Mr. DELANO said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I propose to examine the following question: what is the political condition of the States lately in rebellion?

Four years and more of war has produced great changes in the social condition of the insurrectionary States, and has materially affected the political relations heretofore existing between them and other States of the Union. These mighty changes cast upon us the momentous question which I propose to consider. The importance of this question has never been equaled by any subject presented to an American Congress since the formation of our Government. In my opinion, upon its proper solution depends not only the peace and prosperity, but the existence of our country. Differences of opinion in regard to the condition of these States and as to the best manner of restoring them to their normal condition in the Union, must be expected. These differences are not merely natural, but necessary. Our forefathers in forming this Government, and in framing the great fundamental law for its control, encountered like differences of sentiment in regard to the great organic law which they had undertaken to make; but with a proper respect for the judgment of each other, and in a spirit of concession and conciliation, they entered upon their work, and accomplished it harmoniously. Let a like spirit animate this Congress. Let a proper appreciation for honest differences among each other, or between ourselves and other departments of this Government, prevail. Let us all be forbearing toward those from whom we ask a like exercise of charity, and I sincerely believe we shall be able to adjust the great measures before us, for the best interest and with the approbation of our common constituents, in such a manner as to make solid the foundations of our Government. Thus the present threatening clouds will pass away, and universal peace and harmony be restored.

I propose to analyze the condition of public opinion upon this question as it seems to present itself in this House.

First, there is a class of persons who insist that the insurrectionary States are not only in the Union, but that they are States in the fullest sense of the term, having a right to demand representation on this floor. I do not know whether this class is willing to admit Representatives still seething in treason and rebellion, whose hands are red with the blood of our slaughtered countrymen, who are yet unwilling to yield submissively to the great decisions of the war; but whether or not they are so willing I do not belong to this class of politicians. I believe these States are in the Union and that they possess the right of local and domestic legislation; that their proper relation with other States has been so interrupted and changed as to deprive them of the absolute right to demand the admission of members to this floor without conditions and proper qualifications for membership.

Reconstruction—Mr. Delano.

Secondly, it is insisted by another class that these States are dead, in the condition of conquered provinces, subject to be governed by Congress in all respects as any other Territory. I have no faith in this theory. I do not believe the States have been destroyed, nor that they may be held as conquered Territories, and I propose to lay before this House and the country, briefly as possible, my reasons for opposing this theory.

The distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] in opening the debate upon this subject, announced the startling proposition that these States are dead! It was put forth, manifestly, as the theory which was to guide the majority of this House in their deliberations and legislation in the important questions of reconstruction. The sagacity and influence of the honorable gentleman who made this announcement are acknowledged and felt in this House and throughout the country. His capacity to understand the remote consequences of any position he assumes, and to trace those consequences to their full extent and influence no one appreciates more fully than myself. I was, therefore, naturally and necessarily alarmed to see this proposition coming from an acknowledged leader of the House at the opening of this debate, under circumstances justifying the apprehension that it was to guide and lead this House to its final conclusion upon the subject.

I make these observations to justify myself in giving so much attention, as I shall give, in these remarks, to what has been said by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. That I may do the gentleman no injustice, I make the following quotations from his speech of December 18, 1865. Of the States lately in rebellion, he says:

"They have torn their constitutional States into atoms, and built on their foundations fabrics of a totally different character. Dead men cannot raise themselves; dead States cannot restore their own existence as it was."

Then, referring to the Constitution, he quotes from the third section of the fourth article the following:

"New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union."

And proceeds thus:

In another place in the same speech he says: "To prove that they are and for four years have been out of the Union for all legal purposes, and being now conquered, subject to the absolute disposal of Congress, I will suggest a few ideas and adduce a few authorities."

The learned gentleman then proceeds to show that the confederate States, during the war, were an independent belligerent, and were so acknowledged by the United States and by Europe, and were, therefore, precisely in the condition of a foreign nation with whom we were at war; citing, in support of this position, several writers on the law of nations and the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. Further references seem needless to show the position of the gentleman on this subject.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania was soon followed by my honorable colleague [Mr. SHELLABARGER] in an able and elaborate speech which appears to sustain, substantially, the same views. That I may do my colleague no injustice, I will quote a passage from his speech, showing that he considers the insurgent States as having lost the rights and powers of government, and that the United States may and ought to assume and exercise these lost powers. Here, I may remark that I might quote many other passages to the same effect, but the one I am about to produce seems sufficient.

My colleague asks, what is before Congress? And answers it thus:

"It is, under our Constitution, possible to, and the late rebellion did in fact so, overthrow and usurp in the insurrectionary States the loyal State governments as that during such usurpation, such States and their people ceased to have any of the rights and powers of government as States of this Union. And this loss of the rights and powers of government was such that the United States may and ought to assume and exercise local powers of the lost State governments."

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Mr. Speaker, I certainly would not interrupt my colleague but for the remark that he made prefatory to that one in which he introduced an allusion to myself. That prefatory remark compels me either to arise for the purpose of explanation or else to acquiesce in what is a mistaken interpretation of what I said.

Now, had he completed the sentence, a part of which he read, he would have found that in attributing to me the position which I understood him to attribute to me, he does me unintended injustice. I will complete the sentence, only adding that which is material for the explanation that I desire now to make. I must read the whole sentence so as to introduce and give the effect of the part omitted. It reads:

"It is under our Constitution possible to, and the late rebellion did in fact so, overthrow and usurp in the insurrectionary States the loyal State governments as that, during such usurpation, such States and their people ceased to have any of the rights or powers of government as States of this Union."

Notice that I say "during such usurpation"—

"and this loss of the rights and powers of government was such that the United States may and ought to assume and exercise local powers of the lost State governments, and may control the readmission of such States to their powers of government in this Union."

Now, here is the part of the sentence to which I desire to call attention—

"subject to and in accordance with the obligation to guaranty to each State a republican form of government."

Now, sir, my proposition is that it was the governing capacity or property alone that was overthrown, and that that state of things has intervened and occurred to make it the duty of the Government of the United States, not to hold these people as conquered Territories, but to restore to them republican governments, and that we cannot hold them, therefore, as conquered Territories, but that that holding is subject to that guarantee to which I alluded in the last part of the sentence. I know my distinguished colleague will do me the justice to give me the benefit of the last and important part of the sentence.

Mr. DELANO. Now, Mr. Speaker, before noticing the gentleman's remarks any further, I will ask him—because that will settle the question without attempting to interpret what he has said heretofore—whether he believes that Congress has a right, under any provision of the Constitution, to exercise power over these States as Territories, or, in his own language, "to exercise local powers of the lost State governments" under the present state of facts, and as things now exist? This question, if answered directly, will bring the gentleman to an issue, and I shall understand him.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. Mr. Speaker, I reply to the gentleman's inquiry by saying that I do hold, as I stated in that sentence, that there has occurred in the rebel States that state of things in which they have lost their "practical relations to the Government of the United States," if I may be permitted to adopt the language of our late and lamented President.

I care not whether you call that being in the Union or out of the Union.

There is no need of our falling out here about mere dialectics.

My proposition is that, where a loyal State government by rebellion has been utterly swept away, there does revert to the United States during that hiatus in the State government (if you will pardon the expression) such amount of local control over the States as will enable the United States to render effectual the provision of the guarantee clause of the Constitution, and such as will enable the United States first, to take care of the people during that interim, and next, and as speedily as practicable, to restore and reestablish a local State government, republican in form, within the State, which was never destroyed, and cannot be until the Constitution is overthrown.

Mr. DELANO. I thought, Mr. Speaker, that I did not misunderstand my colleague; I still think so.

Once had an acquaintance, the president of a railroad company, of whom it was said that he had a peculiar faculty of deciding against those whom he wanted to decide against by "letting them down easy." Adopting that illustration, I feel that my friend does come to the very consequences of the gentleman from Pennsylvania; although I admit he does not step off the precipice into the abyss by one single leap, but, as he explains himself here to-day, he "comes down easy."

He is, then, in favor of this Congress exercising local powers of legislation for these States. He does believe (and that is the whole theory of his speech) that the powers of these States are overthrown and lost. If he is correct, then the gentleman from Pennsylvania is right, and the States as political organizations are "dead." They are without law, and chaos reigns, until Congress shall establish law for them.

This places them in the power of Congress, subject to be governed as Territories and insidiously opens the door to rule and govern, confiscate and destroy, as effectually as the gentleman from Pennsylvania can desire.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. May I ask my colleague a single question?

Mr. DELANO. Certainly.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I am permitted, Mr. Speaker, through the courtesy of my most excellent colleague, to ask him a question, for which privilege I am obliged to him.

I wish to ask the gentleman whether he holds that in that very condition of things, which by sad history we know has existed in those States, during which loyal State governments have not in fact been in existence, the United States can exercise no control locally for the purposes of protecting the loyal people there and restoring State governments as soon as possible?

Mr. DELANO. If the gentleman will be patient I shall answer this question fully, it being one of the questions I propose to examine during my remarks. That I may not seem to evade it, however, I will say here, while passing, that in their present condition I do not believe they are so destitute of the powers of government as to authorize the United States to "exercise local powers of the lost State governments," as my colleague expresses it.

This theory of dead States was rested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania upon the proposition that during the war we granted to the States in rebellion belligerent rights; that we thereby acknowledged them to be foreign territory and a foreign Power, whereby we subjected them to the laws of conquest; that, having conquered them, they are now held as provinces, subject to our will and pleasure. No respectable author upon the law of nations maintains the doctrine that the acknowledgment of belligerent rights during a civil war converts the insurgents into a foreign nation. Vattel says, page 424:

"When a party is formed in a State who no longer obey the sovereign, and are possessed of sufficient strength to oppose him; or when in a republic the nation is divided into two opposite factions, and both sides take up arms, this is called civil war."

39TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Reconstruction—Mr. Delano.

HO. OF REPS.

"The sovereign, indeed, never fails to bestow the appellation of rebels on all such of his subjects as openly resist him; but when the latter have acquired sufficient strength to give him effectual opposition, and oblige him to carry on the war according to the established rules, he must necessarily submit to the use of the term civil war."

On page 425 he further observes:

"This being the case, it is very evident that the common laws of war, those maxims of humanity, moderation, and honor already detailed in this work, ought to be observed by both parties in every civil war."

Following this argument, the Supreme Court of the United States, in the prize cases, says:

"The laws of war, as established among nations, have their foundation in reason, and all tend to mitigate the cruelties and misery produced by the scourge of war; hence the parties to a civil war usually concede to each other belligerent rights; they exchange prisoners, and adopt other courtesies and rules common to public or national wars."

Further authorities are needless to show that granting belligerent rights to the insurgents did not convert them into a foreign nation, nor their territory into foreign States. The insurrection was gigantic, requiring great numbers and large means to subdue it. Its duration and vicissitudes during its progress required flags of truce, exchange of prisoners, and "other courtesies and rules common to national wars." To this extent the rebels were treated as a belligerent Power, and to this extent only. They were thus treated because humanity and the law of nations demanded it, in mitigation of the cruelties and evils produced by the scourge of war. Our extensive coast bordering the States in insurrection would have furnished the insurgents a foreign intercourse so valuable in sustaining the rebellion had it not been subjected to a blockade as to render such a measure for the time being a necessity. Is it legitimate, then, to conclude that these necessary measures dictated by humanity, and resorted to in obedience to the laws of nations in order to mitigate the cruelties of the insurrection and shorten its duration, converted the insurgent territory into a foreign nation? Clearly not. This process of reasoning has been answered by the following inquiry, if correct, what becomes of the right and power of the Government to punish treason? For traitors are transformed into foreign foes, and the treason of insurgents is converted into legitimate war of an alien enemy by this rapid logic of belligerent rights.

Seeing the gentleman thus hard pressed, my esteemed colleague, [Mr. SHELLABARGER,] imitating Achilles when the Greeks were in distress, comes into the conflict, if not with new armor, at least with new arguments, and suggests that the Supreme Court has decided that "it is a proposition never doubted that the belligerent party who claims to be sovereign may exercise both belligerent and sovereign rights," and he proceeds to assert as conclusions from the decision of the Supreme Court, first, that the rebel States acted as States in organizing the rebellion; secondly, that all their citizens were thereby made enemies; thirdly, that though enemies they did not become foreign States, so that when we take them back we must pay their debts; fourthly, that the United States may exercise over these people both belligerent and sovereign rights. Before referring to what my colleague said on this point, I call the attention of the House to the following additional remarks of the court in the prize cases, from which he has quoted:

"All persons residing within this territory are to be treated as enemies, though not foreigners."

"But in defining the meaning of the term 'enemies' property, we will be led into error if we refer to Flota or Lord Coke. It is a technical phrase, peculiar to prize courts, and depends upon principles of public policy as distinguished from the common law."—Prize Cases, 674.

Thus it will appear, by the authorities introduced by my colleague in order to relieve the gentleman from Pennsylvania from the difficulty growing out of his assertion that the insurgent district had become a foreign nation, that the revolting States did not convert their people into foreign enemies, in the common-law definition of the term, and hence by their overthrow we do not inherit their debts. My proposition is therefore established that the granting of belligerent rights as an act of humanity did not place the parties at war in the same relations as nations foreign to each other. Thus are torn up, root and branch, the premises and the conclusions of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. And thus also is established the power of the United States to grant belligerent rights and maintain sovereign authority, whereby she was enabled to crush the insurrection, to save the Union, to guaranty republican governments in the insurgent States, and prevent these States from becoming foreign territory with alien enemies as inhabitants.

The fearful consequences resulting from this theory that the States are dead must not be overlooked. Several months ago I heard the key-note of this policy coming from the gentleman from Pennsylvania, in a speech delivered in Lancaster county. It was then proposed, according to my recollection, to confiscate the property of the late confederate States, and dispose of it, in part for the payment of the public debt, in part for the settlement of the emancipated blacks, and in part to increase the pensions of those who suffered in the late war. I was shocked at this scheme of universal confiscation, and felt as if America would lose her reputation before the nations of the earth if we should adopt it. It rests on the theory of "dead States and conquered provinces." I have a profound respect for the ability and the patriotism of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and I will not say that it is his purpose to push his theory to all the terrible consequences which appear to me to be its natural and inevitable fruits. Should it be carried to this terrible extent, I can imagine nothing which this Congress has the power to do that would be fraught with so much danger to the country or be likely to bring so much reproach upon our good name. Why, sir, the Duke of Alva executed the decrees of a bigoted and brutal master while ruling in the Netherlands, and thus carried misery and suffering among an oppressed and downtrodden people. But this gigantic scheme of plunder, if carried out to its full extent, as I understand it, would far outstrip the desolation and ravage caused by the cruelties which I have referred to, and would make the ghost of the noble Duke blush at his own timidity and confess that he was not a plunderer fit to provide for the reconstruction of the rebel States of America! Crossing the English Channel and contemplating Cromwell's famous settlement of Ireland, you behold an extensive scale of plunder and devastation which shocks the sense of justice and fires with indignation the bosom of every honest and philanthropic man; and yet, Mr. Speaker, all that fearful ravage fades into insignificance before the scheme proposed for our adoption in these States lately in rebellion. You say they are dead! And already, I fear, you have excited the appetite of that class of creation who desire to feed on their remains. They hear the watchword and swell the chorus, "dead States and conquered provinces." There are birds of prey which wing their way through the blue sky seeking the remains of something dead. There are quadrupeds who delight to feast their appetites on the carcasses of the dead, and if you solemnly declare the annihilation of these States, rendering it necessary to govern them by your own action, the new patronage thereby created, the innumerable appointments to governorships, judgeships, and other profitable places for the gratification of ambition and avarice, will, I fear, fill the land with political cormorants eager to satisfy their appetites on the remains of dead States. I cannot therefore sanction this policy. If I stand solitary and alone, I will never, no never, sanction it. I will not attempt to govern these States on the ground that they have lost "their local powers."

Mr. STEVENS said he was absent from the Hall when the gentleman made allusion to him, and he wished now to observe that he never held the doctrine that the southern States were dead, but had argued that it made no difference whether they were in or out of the Union as to the question of reconstruction. He held that these States were organized, but organized under another Government besides our own, but still States. The gentleman mistook his position as to confiscation. He did not advocate a general sweep, but that the lands of a large number of the rebels ought to be confiscated, in order to meet the expenses incurred by putting down the rebellion and to increase the pensions of soldiers.

Mr. DELANO. My recollection is that the gentleman, in his speech at Lancaster, said that four thousand millions of money might be made out of confiscation, and the money distributed in the way stated. But I am now glad to know that the gentleman has abandoned, if he ever held to, the theory of "dead States and conquered provinces," and that he rejects the policy of a "general sweep" in confiscation. If we must have any confiscation, the less we have the better shall I be pleased. It is a relief to learn that a "general sweep" is not demanded.

In the course of my argument, hereafter, I will endeavor to define what a State is, as we understand it in the United States, not what it is as defined by Vattel or Grotius or other writers on the law of nations; for, in my judgment, there is a material difference though not an entire dissimilarity in the cases. Then, sir, I will endeavor to show that the late insurrection devolved upon the General Government the duty of preserving the State governments in the insurrectionary districts. I will further attempt to show that the Federal Government accepted this duty and has performed it, thus fulfilling her constitutional engagement.

Then, sir, I will insist that the legislation of Congress, the acts of the Executive, and of the Executive Departments, under the laws of Congress, have uniformly, from the commencement to the close of the war, recognized the conflict as a war to save the States, not to destroy them. And I will attempt to prove that these acts of recognition are final and conclusive in favor of the existence of the States, according to the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Luther vs. Borden, 7 Howard.

WHAT IS A STATE?

In our complex system, and while speaking of a member of the Federal Union, I will venture to define it thus: a political organization, proceeding from the people, having a written constitution defining its powers, created for the purpose of establishing law and order within certain fixed territorial limits, and having also a fixed and constitutional relation with other like States, whereby the Federal Union is established.

Here, mark it, the State appears in a twofold capacity. First, as a political organization for local government. Second, as an integral part of that greater Government, the United States, which was created by our fathers in order to "establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty." Each of these qualities or characteristics ought to be kept prominently before our minds in this discussion, because they must each be dealt with, each having been brought under the influence of the insurrection. We shall see, I think, that one of these qualities or characteristics may be assailed, and may suffer without necessarily destroying the existence of the other; because it is a rule of humanity, pervading all Christian civilization, that destruction shall stop when the necessity for it ceases.

Having thus defined a State, and attempted, very briefly, to exhibit its twofold nature, I ask what duty, if any, did the late insurrection devolve upon the Federal Government?

WHAT WAS THE DUTY OF THE UNITED STATES AFTER THE INSURRECTION COMMENCED?

The fourth section of the fourth article of the Constitution of the United States provides that—"The United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion," &c.

It is proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, under this clause, to find authority for governing "dead States," now no longer States, but Territories. Nothing to my mind seems more illogical, not to say absurd. If dead, they are not States, and have no governments to be guarantied. If Territories, held by conquest, at the will and mercy (forgive the word) of the conqueror, and you desire to convert them into States, then observe the third section of the fourth article, and you will find explicit and undoubted authority to proceed—

"New States may be admitted by the Congress into the Union."

Very slight attention to the history of the fourth section of the fourth article will, I think, sustain my view of the section. The framers of the Constitution intended to guard against the return of any State to an aristocratical, monarchical, or any other form of government not republican. They also designed to guard the States against invasion and domestic violence.

When it is remembered that at the close of the Revolution there were not wanting persons who thought republics insecure, unstable, and liable to degenerate into anarchy, it may be seen at a glance why the wisdom of those great men who devised our Constitution made it the duty of the Federal Government to guaranty, to secure, to each State a "republican form of government." All the States were interested in having each State rest upon republican principles. Mr. Madison, in the forty-third number of the Federalist, while explaining this clause, holds the following language:

"In a confederacy founded on republican principles, and composed of republican members, the superintending Government ought clearly to possess authority to defend the system against aristocratic or monarchical innovations. The more intimate the nature of such a union may be the greater interest have the members in the political institutions of each other, and the greater right to insist that the forms of Government under which the compact was entered into should be substantially maintained."

Pursuing this subject, in the same letter, Mr. Madison says:

"Where else could the remedy be deposited than where it is deposited by the Constitution?"

And then, after answering some objections that might be urged against giving the General Government this right and power of guaranty, he uses the following language, which indicates that his mind was inspired with a vision of the emergencies and calamities through which the nation has passed. He says:

"If the interposition of the General Government should not be needed, the provision for such an event will be a harmless superfluity only. But who can say what experiments may be produced by the caprice of particular States, by the ambition of enterprising leaders, or by the intrigues and influence of foreign Powers?"

Upon this clause in the Constitution guarantying to each State a republican form of government I am willing to rest all the powers exercised by the United States in crushing the late insurrection. The confederate States had, prior to the rebellion, governments republican in form. These governments had been recognized by the General Government and they had received the sanction of the people. The insurrection sought to change these governments in their relations to the Union and to consolidate the insurgent States into a confederacy resting upon an aristocracy, odious in principle, repugnant to liberty, and shocking to humanity! It was the duty of the Federal Government to resist, and, if possible, to prevent the consummation of this nefarious, anti-republican scheme. She accepted this duty. She accepted it in behalf of the loyal and nonrevolting States; but more than this, she accepted it in behalf of the loyal minorities that still remained in the insurgent States. The parent Government was not deaf to the cry of this minority, nor could she be, so long as she acknowledged the great duty imposed by the Constitution. I am not without authority on this point, which, in certain quarters, commands more respect than it does from me. I therefore refer to the one hundred and twenty-ninth section of volume one, Bishop's Criminal Law, which says:

"When for any reason, as for instance when a State has passed what is termed in these days an ordinance of secession, there ceases to be within the State a government under the Constitution of the United States, the 'guarantee' mentioned in this section of the Constitution attaches, and the 'United States' becomes obligated to give the State a republican form of government."

This opinion fully supports my construction of the clause in the Constitution under consideration, and hence I have quoted it, because I agree that it is right, except in so far as it asserts that by an ordinance of secession "there ceases to be a government within the State under the Constitution of the United States." This assertion is a fallacy, and I doubt if there can be found a lawyer in this House who will attempt to sustain it. Can an illegal and void ordinance carry a State out of the Union? And what if this ordinance be followed by the organization of another government within such State? This new government is illegal, unconstitutional, and void, and the simple duty of the General Government in such cases is to sustain and guaranty the old, the legal, the republican government previously existing and constitutionally created. Why, sir, there were once two conflicting governments in Rhode Island—the Dorr government, and the old and legal government, or one created under and by the old charter government, and the United States, recognizing her power and duty under the Constitution, interposed, and guarantied the rightful and legal government of Rhode Island; and this was done by the act of the President of the United States, who, acting under powers conferred on him by an act of Congress, dated February 28, 1795, recognized the constitutional government, and took measures to call out the militia to support the lawful authority of the State.

This act of the President was held by the Supreme Court as settling the question, which was the lawful government in the State; and thus was fulfilled, in that case, by the United States, the duty of guarantying to Rhode Island her rightful government. I may refer to this case again before closing, to exhibit its bearing upon another branch of the subject.

I have already shown that Mr. Bishop admits the duty of the United States to guaranty to each State a republican form of government. Now, let us follow him a little further, and observe, understandingly, what he says. In section one hundred and thirty-two, volume one, he remarks:

"Except, therefore, for the clause guarantying republican governments to the States, the United States might, if it chose, after a State has committed what is called an act of secession." * * * "Legislate for it forever to the exclusion of any subsequent State legislation. But the clause under consideration provides that the United States shall guaranty to the State a republican form of government. Therefore, as soon as the guarantee is executed, the right of legislation which the United States received from the defunct State government flows out to the new State government."

All this I find, sir, in Bishop, side by side with the passages from this author referred to by my honorable and learned colleague, [Mr. SHELLABARGER.] Here, sir, I find my theory fully sustained. First, that when the States seceded and set up new governments it was the constitutional duty of the United States to put down the insurrection, restore the rightful authority, and thus guaranty their republican governments. This the Federal Government has done. She has fully completed the work, thanks to our skillful generals and our brave volunteers; and whatever may have been the condition of the insurgent States during the rebellion, now that it is crushed and the guarantee performed, according to Mr. Bishop the right of legislation which the United States received from the defunct States during the insurrection flows into the new State governments. There, sir, it remains, reanimating, energizing that which had been suspended, not destroyed. There let it remain, giving power, authority, supremacy, within constitutional limits, until the sunlight, as well as the gentle dews and genial rains, shall cease to warm and render fruitful our mother earth.

I must again refer to Mr. Madison to show what might and ought to be done under this clause of the Constitution in behalf of minorities when efforts shall be made to destroy lawful State governments. He was answering supposed objections to the clause under consideration. See No. 43 of the Federalist. He said:

"At first view, it might seem not to square with the republican theory to suppose either that a majority have not the right or that a minority will have the force to subvert a government. But theoretic reasoning in this, as in most other cases, must be qualified by the lessons of practice. Why may not illicit combinations be formed as well by a majority of a State, especially a small State, as by a majority of a county or a district of the same State? And if the authority of the State ought, in the latter case, to protect the local magistracy, ought not the Federal authority in the former to support the State authority?"

And the author adds these significant words, that deserve to be remembered:

"Besides, there are certain parts of the State constitutions which are so interwoven with the Federal Constitution that a violent blow cannot be given to the one without communicating the wound to the other."

It is clear that when the lawful State governments are assailed the duty of the United States is to interpose, and thus perform her obligation set down in the Constitution to "guaranty" to each State a republican form of government. She may interpose to put down a small rebellion, a local sedition about whisky in Pennsylvania, or she may interpose in behalf of a small minority, and against a wide-spread, gigantic combination and conspiracy which, expanding in its proportions, spreads treason into half the Union and evokes an insurrection which, embracing half the States, threatens with alarming danger the nation's life, and calls for war, distinct, open war, to crush it. In either case the object is the same—to guaranty to each State its true republican government.

DID THE UNITED STATES ACCEPT THE DUTY OF GUARANTYING THE STATE GOVERNMENTS IN THE INSURRECTIONARY DISTRICT, AND HAS SHE PERFORMED IT?

The entire action of the Government is an affirmative answer to this question. But there is one prominent and important fact standing out in such bold relief in behalf of this proposition that I am compelled to direct the attention of the committee to it for a moment.

On the 22d of July, 1861, the House of Representatives adopted what is called the Crittenden resolution. This resolution declared—"That the present deplorable war has been forced upon the country by the disunionists of the southern States now in revolt against the constitutional Government, and in arms around the capital; that in this national emergency Congress, banishing all feeling of mere passion or resentment, will recollect only its duty to the whole country; that this war is not waged on our part in any spirit of oppression, nor for any purpose of conquest or subjugation, nor for the purpose of overthrowing or interfering with the rights or established institutions of those States; but to defend and maintain the supremacy of the Constitution, and to preserve the Union with all the dignity, equality, and rights of the several States unimpaired; that as soon as these objects are accomplished the war ought to cease."

This resolution passed the House by the unusual majority of one hundred and twenty-two against two; and two days later the same resolution, offered in the Senate by the now President of the United States, passed that body by a vote of thirty against five. This resolution is the solemn assertion of the United States, by both branches of its Legislature, that the war was prosecuted, not to oppress, not to conquer, nor to subjugate, nor to overthrow, nor to interfere with the rights of the States, but to defend, maintain, and preserve the Union with all the dignity, equality, and rights of the several States.

39TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Reconstruction—Mr. Delano.

Ho. of REPS.

Mr. Speaker, can anything be clearer than the truth of my proposition? Did not Congress hereby and herein declare that we accepted the war in order to make good the duty of guaranteeing the State governments with all their dignity, equality, and rights unimpaired? Was this resolution a deliberate falsehood? Was it a solemn farce? Was it a legislative lie? Or was it a high and national manifesto to the world and to the insurgent people as to the purpose, object, and end for which the nation engaged in war? I shall blush for my country if she now renounces her solemn opinion; thus expressed, and crucifies State institutions which she undertook to save. I observe, sir, with no little astonishment that my honorable colleague [Mr. SHELLABARGER] voted for this resolution. I will not pursue this proposition, but will apply, for a moment, principles to facts.

The seceding States passed ordinances of secession. These were null. They formed new political organizations, which not being recognized by the United States were illegal and void. Then they rose to arms and submitted the issue to the God of battles.

The Federal Government, recognizing her rightful power and assuming her constitutional duty, accepted the challenge, girded on her armor, and went out in behalf of laws, constitutions, and the downtrodden minority in the insurgent States. The result of this fearful, long, and bloody arbitration is before the world. It is now history. And, sir, what is the verdict of history thus written in blood? It is that the Union is saved; that the States are saved; and that we are to-day, as we ever have been, one, one nation, unsevered, undivided. This verdict, sir, has been vouchsafed us as a people by the power and mercy of Him who holds the stars in His palm, and who causes the wind to blow where it listeth. This verdict has been sealed by the blood of three hundred thousand martyrs for liberty. It has been prayed for by many mothers whose last son has been given to secure this blessing, and by many widows whose cheeks were furrowed by tears while offering up the prayer.

And shall we now, sir, deny the result? Is the flag of our country to be desecrated by taking from its folds eleven stars? I pray God, the breezes of heaven may never, never unfurl before my eyes the banner of my country with a single emblem of entire and perfect unity wanting upon its folds.

Pause, then, and consider well before you say that any State is dead, and is no longer an integral part of this Union. It is a terrible conclusion, and dangerous to reach. It leads to fearful consequences.

Sir, if the authors of this theory do not contemplate these harsh results, certain it is, if we adopt their reasoning, we start upon a road that leads to the end I have pictured, and then, I fear, it will be too late to interrupt our course.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I desire to ask the gentleman a question, with his permission.

Mr. DELANO. The gentleman may propound his question. I will not say whether I will answer it or not.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. My colleague has defined very clearly what he conceives to be a State. He admits the right of the majority of the people in each State to change its form of government, and also the right and duty of the national Government to guaranty to each State a republican form of government. I wish to know whether he intends us to understand that when our armies marched into the South, we were, on the fall of the rebellion, to maintain the governments we found established by the people in each of said States, which were not, as I conceive, constitutional State governments; or were we to maintain the old governments, which the people by their own act had abolished?

Mr. DELANO. Mr. Speaker, I do not claim to be a very clear-headed man; I do not make any such pretension. But if I have been so muddy as to lead anybody to believe that I was arguing that this Government should guaranty the authorities that the rebellion set up in the States, I am very sorry for my ignorance and for my incapacity to express myself. I was trying to show that the United States Government was bound to guaranty, as the Constitution requires, the old governments which had been admitted to be republican in form; that the Government went out there to take off this cursed incubus of secession, to lift it from the minorities, to allow those loyal minorities to rise up and become the power of the country, under the old governments and the old constitutions.

Mr. SPALDING. Will my colleague allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DELANO. I will yield for a question.

Mr. SPALDING. My colleague has quoted Bishop. I would ask him if he has seen an essay by this same Mr. Bishop, recently published in the papers, and called "The Right Way?"

Mr. DELANO. I think that sometimes he is in the wrong way.

Mr. SPALDING. Has my colleague seen that essay?

Mr. DELANO. I have seen it, but do not read it always. As for Mr. Bishop, I think a great deal of him as a criminal lawyer. As a constitutional lawyer I do not think so much of him. I have quoted him only because he has been referred to by others as authority.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I would like to ask my colleague another question.

Mr. DELANO. Very well.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. If these eleven States had merely changed their form of governments, according to the prescribed rules of their constitutions, in such a way as to amount to practical secession, and the great body of the people had acquiesced in that change without making war upon the nation, how, under his theory, are we to guaranty the minority a republican form of government in said States, if the minority do not petition for it?

Mr. DELANO. If the rebellion had succeeded?

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. No, sir; if they had not fired a gun.

Mr. DELANO. I do not know that I understand the gentleman.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. If the majority of the people in the eleven rebel States had, in pursuance of their organic State law, changed the forms of their State government, and the great body of the people had acquiesced in that change, and no war had been made by them, no gun fired, how, under the theory of my colleague, could the Government guaranty to those States a republican form of government?

Mr. DELANO. If they had attempted such a thing as that without war, it would have been the duty of the national Government to do just what they have done in this instance; not to recognize those illegal acts, but to guaranty the old governments, as they did in the case of the State of Rhode Island. That would have been our duty, as I understand it.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. But if there is no minority petitioning for redress, no one claiming the existence of a constitutional State government and the interference of the national Government for their protection, under his theory, how is a republican form of government to be guaranteed, how is the authority of this nation to be maintained over its own territory?

Mr. DELANO. The House will see that I have no time in my hour to discuss mere abstractions, mere hypothetical cases, that never had an existence. I am now endeavoring to deal with facts as they are, with things as they have transpired, and not with hypothetical cases, cases which have not arisen. And in answer to my friend from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] he will allow me to quote the text, "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof."

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I move that the time of my colleague be extended for fifteen minutes, or until he concludes his remarks.

No objection was made.

Mr. DELANO. I tender my sincere thanks to the House for this extension of my time, and for its courtesy to me.

WHAT HAS CONGRESS AND THE EXECUTIVE DONE DURING THE PROGRESS OF THE REBELLION TOWARD RECOGNIZING THE INSURGENTS AS STATES?

Here, allow me to ask, when did the rebelling State expire? I should be glad to learn when the vital spark became extinct, so that the attending physician might say "Dead!" Prepare for the funeral; henceforth we have Territories! At what time, sir? If the hour of the day has not been noted, pray give me the month or the year of their departure to the tomb of Territories.

I find, sir, by reference to your statutes, that on the 5th of August, 1861, Congress assessed a direct tax of $20,000,000 annually upon the land of the United States, and apportioned the payment to the seceding States, as follows:

Virginia.....	$937,550 66½
North Carolina.....	576,194 66
South Carolina.....	363,570 66
Georgia.....	584,367 33
Alabama.....	529,313 33
Mississippi.....	413,084 66
Louisiana.....	385,886 66
Tennessee.....	669,498 00
Arkansas.....	261,886 00
Florida.....	77,522 66
Texas.....	355,166 66

Total.....$5,154,541 28½

By the ninth section of this act the President was authorized to divide each State into convenient collection districts. The fifty-third section provides that each State may collect and pay its quota in its own way. The forty-sixth section provides that if any State therein named, after assuming to pay its proportion of such tax, shall fail to do so, the Secretary of the Treasury may proceed to collect the same under certain rules and regulations.

Again, sir, by an act of Congress approved June 30, 1864, about one year, sir, before the total overthrow and destruction of the insurrection, this act of 1861 is recognized, the first annual assessment is enforced; but further assessments are suspended until another law, demanding the same, is enacted.

Yet, again, by the act of July 1, 1862, to provide internal revenue, the President is authorized to divide the States respectively into collection districts, and to appoint revenue officers for the same. And, acting under this law, the President has proceeded, and as I understand is now proceeding, to collect revenue in these States, treating them as States under your legislation and by your authority. And, sir, as if to leave no room for doubt, this act of July 1, 1862, was amended but still left so as to regard the insurgent States as States, by an act passed March 7, 1864. Has Congress, indeed, power to decide this question? Then she has decided it by a series of unbroken, uninterrupted legislative recognition of the eleven confederate States, so called, as real, legitimate, existing States in the Union.

I ask my learned colleague to review his theory of "destroyed States," or, in his milder language, of States that have "lost their powers." He is too sound a lawyer and too candid, also, in view of all these facts, to assert the death and destruction of eleven members of this Union.

But, Mr. Speaker, the evidence does not close here in reference to the recognition of these States as members of the Union, as States in the Union. By an act of Congress, passed April 20, 1818, provision is made for the publication of the laws of the United States, and for other purposes. The second section of the act referred to provides that when the State Department shall have been officially notified that any amendment which heretofore has been or hereafter may be proposed to the Constitution has been adopted, according to the provisions of that instrument—

"It shall be the duty of the Secretary of State, forthwith, to cause the said amendment to be published," specifying the States by which the same may have been adopted, and that the same has become valid."

Now, sir, I ask the members of this House, what duty is here devolved upon the State Department? Is it not to determine when the amendment is ratified, and by whom ratified? Must he not, does he not, necessarily, by the powers conferred upon him, recognize as States in the Union those members of the confederacy whose ratification is relied upon as adopting the amendment in conformity to the provisions of the Constitution?

In the case in 7 Howard, before referred to, it is said that when Congress empowered the President to call out the militia to suppress insurrection, it thereby authorized him to decide which was the rightful government, and that his decision recognizing one or the other of two conflicting governments was conclusive. How, then, can it be denied that here is a power conferred upon the State Department to recognize these governments in the States where, for a time, government was simply suppressed, not destroyed; where it was obstructed in its functions, not overthrown in its existence? And now, that the power suppressing it is removed, removed, too, by the General Government in the discharge of her great constitutional duty, the State governments rise again, and their powers are resumed; and as they become once more potential they speak, and among the first utterances are words which delight every patriot and philanthropist, for they say that "neither slavery nor involuntary servitude shall longer exist except for crime." These noble words, officially declared, spoken in a sovereign manner and as a sovereign State should speak, are heard, officially heard, and the seal of emancipation and universal liberty is fixed.

Mr. Speaker, I trust we have no dead States, no conquered Territories, but that all are living powers, sovereign within their respective spheres but obedient hereafter and forever to that higher and greater sovereign, the Union, whose love embraces all her children, whose heart is so large and whose arm so strong that she can cherish, defend, or punish. In order that there be left no room for doubt as to the power of Congress to recognize these rebel States as States, and to confer such power on the President or Secretary of State, I here refer to the case of Luther vs. Borden, 7 Howard's Reports, where, while discussing the fourth section of the fourth article of the Constitution, Chief Justice Taney says:

"Under this article" * * * "it rests with Congress to decide what government is the established one in a State. For, as the United States guaranty to each State a republican government, Congress must necessarily decide what government is established in a State before it can determine whether it is republican or not."

Then, referring to the clause relating to domestic violence, the Chief Justice adds:

"So, too, as relates to the clause in the above mentioned article of the Constitution providing for cases of domestic violence. It rested with Congress to determine the means proper to be adopted to fulfill this guarantee. They might, if they had deemed it most advisable to do so, have placed it in the power of a court to decide when the contingency had happened which required the Federal Government to interfere. But Congress thought otherwise, and, no doubt, wisely; and by the act of February 28, 1795, provided that 'in case of an insurrection in any State against the government thereof it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to call forth such numbers of the militia of any State or States as may be applied for as he may judge sufficient to suppress the insurrection.' By this act the power of deciding whether the exigency had arisen upon which the Government of the United States is bound to interfere is given to the President." * * * "If there is an armed conflict," * * * "it is a case of domestic violence, and one of the parties must be in insurrection against the lawful Government. And the President must of necessity decide which is the government and which party is unlawfully arrayed against it before he can perform the duty imposed on him by Congress."

Thus the court came to the very clear, logical, and satisfactory opinion that the action of the President, under the act of Congress before mentioned, by which the government of Rhode Island, adverse to the Dorr government, so called, was recognized, was a final and conclusive decision in favor of that government, and such a decision as could not be reviewed or reversed by any authority whatever.

What, sir, is so much needed at this hour as to rebuild and reanimate the desolate South? Her towns in ruins! her fields lying waste! her resources destroyed! her labor paralyzed! She needs peace, rest, and the fostering arm of a friendly Federal Government. Much, I know, she has sinned, and much, too much, of error and wickedness, at least of anger and bitterness, yet remains. But time, patience, charity, and forbearance will soon bring her to see, I trust, that justice toward her emancipated blacks and loyalty to the Union are necessary to happiness and prosperity in the future. We must develop the resources of the South. Her cotton crop of five million bales, in 1860, is estimated at one million for the next year, and her sugar crop in similar proportions. We need, sir, and we must have, a productive, prosperous South, for it will strengthen our finances, give stability to our public credit, aid us in paying our national debt and sustaining our national faith. Hence, I repudiate all theories that tend to keep down her industry, her resources, and her hopes.

Mr. Speaker, I do not often reason from my fears, but during this debate our fears have been appealed to in order to influence our judgment; and this has been done by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.] He presumes that a return of members from the late confederate States will place the power of this House in the hands of copperheads. Then he imagines repudiation of the national debt, assumption of the rebel debt, &c. Sir, I have no toleration for those who have persistently opposed the Government these long years of strife, sacrifice, and danger. I am not here, to-day, to assert their cause. God forbid! I am considering questions which may, when settled, have a lasting influence upon the destinies of my country. I will not turn aside from my honest judgment upon this question to strike an enemy or to reward a friend. But, sir, let me suggest an argument for the fears of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, if, indeed, "his name is liable to fear." Suppose you establish, so far as this House can settle the question, that the insurgent States are dead and are to be governed indefinitely as Territories. Do you expect a united Republican party upon that decision? If you do, your hopes are as delusive "as the baseless fabric of a vision." You will find, sir, a united South, a united "copperhead" party, and a divided Union party. You will go into the next presidential canvass, possibly, in this condition. And it requires no great stretch of imagination to see by the united southern vote and a divided northern vote that a presidential candidate of the so-called Democratic party may have a majority of the Electoral College, counting the Territories, the eleven seceding States. What follows, sir? You deny the right of these southern Territories to vote, but they assert their right to do so; and take care that the majority in some of the northern States does not also assert it. And then comes a strife for the executive chair. How will it end? In civil war again; more blood, more graves! More widows, more taxation! More anarchy, more dead States! God only knows where, or in what, such a conflict might end. Such a result is precisely what the dissatisfied alienated people of your Territories may desire if treated with cruelty and injustice, and, although I do not predict it, yet I see in an ultra and extravagant treatment of this question, danger of such a result.

Mr. Speaker, those who have followed the thread of my remarks, will have observed that I claim the war to have been waged on the part of the United States for the purpose of saving the States as political organizations. Hence, during the entire conflict, the Government, by her acts of legislation, by her presidential proclamations, by her acts of executive administration, has treated the insurgents as States; and thus has been fulfilled the duty of guarantying to the people a republican form of government where revolt and anarchy for a time existed. The insurrection being subdued, order returns; and, under the advice of the Executive, the people have submitted to a new state of things, resulting from the war, by amending their former constitutions so as to conform to universal emancipation. These things having been accomplished, the States resume their natural functions, so far as they are within the first branch of my definition of an American State. That is, sir, they establish law and order within their prescribed territorial limits, they exercise local powers of their State governments. Immediately their connection with the General Government is in part resumed; and certain relations naturally and necessarily spring into life by your acts of Congress between these partially restored States and the United States?

What are these relations? Why, sir, your post-office laws, your courts of justice, your whole revenue system is now in full and complete force, and generally in active operation over and in these States as States. And these things have been done; Sir, they are the necessary and direct fruits of the laws passed by Congress. By denying to them now the capacity of States, we reverse our whole history; we repeal our past policy; and really, sir, we subject ourselves to deserved reproach for insincerity and injustice, if not for cruelty and inhumanity.

What, then, remains to be done? The admission of these States to a representation in Congress, it seems to me, is about all that remains to a perfect restoration of the Union. Now, sir, no one will deny, who reflects calmly and speaks candidly, that the perfect restoration of these States to their natural condition, so that once more it may be truly said that every planet in our political system revolves in its proper orbit, is a consummation to be desired by all. We shall never be what we should be until this end is reached. But, sir, desirable as it is, we must not rush to its attainment with mad zeal and unadvised haste. That which remains to be done, in my view of this subject, is exclusively with Congress—placed there by the Constitution. Are we bound to admit here to membership, without conditions, without inquiry, whomsoever and whatsoever is sent here by one of these States that has, of her own accord, for four years, withdrawn her representation and denied her connection with the Federal Government? Clearly not, sir. And is there any absurdity in the idea of a legitimate State in the Union and yet having no representation in Congress? I am not able to see any. Ohio may withdraw her representation here and refuse to send another for years. Is she thereby a dead State? Would such an act deprive her of her own constitution and laws, rob her of a Legislature for domestic purposes, or prevent her, as a State, from the operation of all proper Federal legislation? Clearly not.

Hence, when one of these States comes back and asks admission to this floor for her Representatives, I do not ask myself, is this a Territory? because I think I have power to say to this State, by your own act you severed this relation; you did it without cause, and during your absence, and while you have been endeavoring to destroy this Union, great changes have occurred, and I shall require of you two things before I shall vote to restore you to representation here. First, you must send loyal

SENATE.

Representatives and show your obedience to the Constitution and laws. And secondly, some proper assurance that in your capacity as a State for local and domestic purposes you will conform to those great principles of justice which lie at the basis of our Government, and which require that all men shall be secure in their lives, their liberties, and in their pursuit of happiness. I am now, sir, speaking of principles secured to all, because I feel that the results of this war have cast upon this nation a great duty toward the emancipated race; and humanity requires of us the performance of this duty—not rashly, nor in a spirit of revenge under the impulse of past injuries, but under that higher and nobler feeling which calls for justice to all men.

PLAN FOR REORGANIZATION.

Resting upon the principles which I have attempted to sustain during these remarks, I propose to inquire, is any State now ready to have her representation admitted into this Congress, and thus become fully restored to her natural position and relations in the Union? I answer yes, Tennessee; loyal, long-suffering, but ever-faithful Tennessee. She has, by her legislation, guaranteed to the emancipated race every right enjoyed by the white man except the right of suffrage. The right to testify in courts, to sue and be sued, to marry, to acquire and convey property, have, as I understand, been secured to the black race. She has disfranchised rebels who sought to overthrow the Government. She has sent here, as Representatives, loyal men who are ready to take the oath required before admission. These men, I understand, have, during the rebellion, either been refugees from their homes, to avoid death at the hands of traitors, or they have been fighting in the Union armies for the life of the nation. Some of them bear honorable scars from wounds in battle, while defending our common country.

Mr. Speaker, let this House consider these things. Let it be remembered how nobly Tennessee has struggled to preserve the heritage of a free people. Do not forget—for this nation will not—how gloriously Tennessee has acted during these long years of desolating war. She has, in her geographical position, stood upon the frontier of rebellion. There, sir, she has remained, faithful, brave, and loyal to the last. Beset with foes from within and without, she stood, like a wall of granite, between the insurgent and loyal States, receiving and hurling back the bloody surges of rebellion.

And that noble son of Tennessee, the President of the United States, who has endured more, suffered more than it is in the power of man to express, whose conduct during this fearful struggle has been the theme of praise from every loyal tongue in the Union, shall he be longer regarded as an alien and a foreigner?

Shall we not, sir, in view of all these things, open the doors of the Union and receive with joy and thanksgiving, back to the family mansion, these men from Tennessee? I hope so, and I think so, for, sir, it seems to me that justice as well as the voice of the country demands it. Let it be done, and let it be done quickly. Thus we shall give an example to the other States, particularly, of our desire to commence the work of rebuilding and readjusting this Government.

In my judgment, Arkansas is likewise prepared to be received, and we can safely bid her Representatives welcome. This much accomplished, we could safely delay the other States for a more complete preparation, keeping there all the military power necessary to preserve order. I would further provide, by all necessary legislation within constitutional limits, for the security and protection of the colored race.

Thus we shall say to the other States, come; come and be welcome; but before you come submit to the laws and obey them cheerfully; provide for the emancipated race, and do it willingly. Elect and return loyal men as Representatives—men who desire to support and who will not betray their country. Come to us as Tennessee comes, with loyal hearts, determined to obey the laws, and our arms are open to receive you. On this basis, sir, we can restore in due time our native land to the glorious position which of right belongs to her.

I believe that a calm, resolute, and patriotic effort on this basis will soon bring all parts of this great empire into harmonious and prosperous relations. Then, sir, we shall have set out anew upon the great mission of civilization that the Almighty has commissioned us to undertake. Our progress in physical, moral, and intellectual development will be accelerated beyond all past history in any part of the world. We shall become an example of the beneficence and power of self-government that will be felt and acknowledged by all civilized peoples on the globe; and if we prudently adhere to the maxim of our fathers, and do not attempt to propagate our institutions except as their excellence shall commend them to a voluntary adoption by other nations, we shall do such a work on earth as no nation has ever accomplished before, leaving for the world a history that will light the pathway to those who come after us seeking to realize the blessings of liberty.

Apportionment of Representation.

SPEECH OF HON. GEO. H. WILLIAMS, OF OREGON,

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

February 15, 1866.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, having under consideration the joint resolution (H. R. No. 51) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States—

Mr. WILLIAMS said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: Much discussion has taken place here and elsewhere as to the legal condition of the States lately in rebellion, which I shall call for the sake of brevity, if for no other purpose, rebel States; and I propose at this time, with the indulgence of the Senate, to submit some views which I entertain upon that subject, to which I shall add some suggestions as to the proposed constitutional amendments. I have no written speech to read, and I shall not therefore aspire to beauty of expression or elegance of style, but hope that any defects of that kind which may appear in what I have to say will be made up by the practical nature and aptitude of my remarks.

I have the honor to be one of the so-called committee on reconstruction, and I presume, therefore, it will not be proper for me to discuss to any considerable extent the condition in fact of the rebel States; but I suppose I shall be safe in following the example of the experienced Senator from Maryland, [Mr. JOHNSON,] who is also on that committee, and confine what I have to say chiefly to the legal aspects of the question.

Philosophers and statesmen, so far as I am acquainted with their writings, find it necessary before they begin their essays or arguments to define the terms which they propose to use, so that as they proceed they can understand each other and arrive at an intelligible, if not a satisfactory, conclusion. No little confusion, in my judgment, has grown out of this discussion by the use of terms and expressions which are intended but do not describe the existing state of things with sufficient clearness and certainty. When Senators affirm that the rebel States are in the Union, that expression does not exactly describe their condition; for the State of New York is no more than a State in the Union, and everybody recognizes a wide difference between the condition of the State of New York and the condition of the rebel States. When Senators affirm that the States are out of the Union, they use an expression that is true of Canada and Mexico, but when applied to the rebel States it cannot and does not mean what it does when applied to the countries that I have just named. To be a State within this Union, to use the exact language of the Constitution of the United States and adopt its meaning, not only implies the existence of a State, but it necessarily implies the existence of certain relations between that State and the General Government. Rhode Island, in 1790, two years or more after the Constitution of the United States was formed and had gone into operation, was a State as much as it is today; but it was not a State within this Union, for the relations had not then been established between Rhode Island and the Federal Government which are necessary to constitute a State in the Union. Growing out of these relations are certain rights, some of which appertain to the General Government, and some of which appertain to the States, and when any State of this Union violently and forcibly disrupts those relations, it divests itself of the rights which depend upon those relations for their existence. To the preservation of these relations peace is a necessity. They were made in peace. They were intended to be supported and maintained by peaceable means and measures, and when a war occurs between a State and the General Government, a state of things is necessarily produced which is inconsistent with the existence, or at any rate with the operation, of those relations.

I make no distinction between a State and the people of a State. What is a State but an aggregation of individuals within certain boundaries, organized into a political body? When many or few persons assail the authority of the United States in a disorderly and tumultuous manner they constitute a riot, an unlawful assembly, or an insurrection, but when the majority of a State, coercing the minority, adopt the State organization, and, acting through that State organization, rebel, there is war between that State and the Federal Government. I say that there is no practical difference between a State and the people of a State, because a State is simply the political designation of certain people within a geographical division of the country. Can a State be anything else than it is made to be by the people? What are the laws of a State but the expressions of the popular will? What is a State organization but an invention to ascertain, to express, and to execute the will of the people, or a majority of the people? Take the State of South Carolina, for instance, and I shall refer to that State for example in what I have to say. Suppose all the people in that State were or are rebels, can the State, in the nature of things, be anything else than a rebel State? Go into that State and you find a man and he proves to be a traitor; you find another man, and he proves to be a traitor, and so you go through the entire State and find all the people traitors; but when this mass of treason is organized into what is called a State, then it is claimed by some that loyalty is begotten, that the creature entirely under the control of the creator is not what the creator desires it to be. I do not say, Mr. President, as a matter of fact, that all the people in the State of South Carolina are traitors, but I do say that a majority of the people of that State, compelling the minority to submit, did seize upon the State organization and convert it into an embodiment of their views and wishes, so that it became in point of fact the mere incorporation of the individual traitors in that State.

Sir, there is political treason as well as legal treason; and political treason, it seems to me, is quite as dangerous to the country as legal treason, because it is distinguished by no definite shape or form. Political treason can give shapes to Proteus and colors to the chameleon. When Satan, as I have read, was defeated in his attempt upon the throne of the Most High, he and his followers were hurled over the battlements of heaven upon the blazing plain below, and there he assembled around him his discomfited hosts and besought them to accomplish "by guile and fraud what force effected not." I express no opinion upon the subject, but is it not possible that the conspirators who brought this country to the brink of ruin by the late rebellion, and who have been restored to their former places of power and influence by an unlimited exercise of the pardoning power, may be now contriving and conspiring, as did their great prototype, to accomplish by "guile and fraud what force effected not?" Has the Government, I ask, no power to protect itself against treason unless it comes in the panoply of arms? Is it true that treason is not as much to be dreaded and feared when it approaches the Government as did the arch deceiver our frail mother in the garden, with soft and gentle words, as when it comes with all the pomp and circumstance of war? Is the arch enemy of mankind less to be feared because sometimes he finds it necessary in the prosecution of his wicked purposes to disguise his true character and appear as an angel of light?

Mr. President, when Senators affirm that these rebel States are States in this Union, I make no issue with them upon that allegation; I do not traverse the averment and say that these States are out of the Union; but when Senators deduce from what they have said the conclusion that these States are entitled to all the rights and privileges of States within this Union, I controvert that conclusion. I deny that these rebel States are entitled to all the rights and privileges of States within this Union. To say that a State is within the Union is of little consequence; to say that a State is out of the Union is of little consequence; but to say that the rebel States are or are not entitled to the rights and privileges of States within this Union is a practical question. That is the question now pressing upon Congress for decision. That is the precise issue before the country. Let us try and eliminate, if we can, the truth from that issue.

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Certainly.

Mr. STEWART. Taking the Senator's rule that these States are not in the Union, or are not entitled to all the rights of States, I should like him to make it a little more specific, and I ask him if he thinks Tennessee is in the Union and entitled to be represented?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask the Senator to be patient and hear what I have to say. It is impossible for me to embrace the discussion of all questions within five minutes. I will endeavor to answer the gentleman's inquiry before I conclude, as I shall probably refer particularly to the State of Tennessee.

I propose, Mr. President, in the first place to notice an argument that is always employed to maintain the proposition that these States are within this Union, or that they are States entitled to all the rights and privileges of States within this Union. It is argued by gentlemen who advocate this doctrine that the ordinances of secession were unconstitutional and void, and therefore did not affect the relation of the rebel States with the General Government, and they remain as States within this Union. This logic is plausible, but it leaves out of view one important and decisive fact. Admitting that these ordinances of secession were void in law, that is, that a court upon a question made would pronounce them unconstitutional and void, it is nevertheless true that they were operative. Every lawyer is familiar with the doctrine that a statute may be unconstitutional and at the same time it may be operative, and it may produce all the practical effects that it would if there was no doubt whatever as to its validity. Take as an illustration the law that was passed making United States Treasury notes legal tender. When that law was before Congress the opinion was expressed that it was unconstitutional. That opinion may be correct; it may eventually be so decided by the Supreme Court of the United States. But I ask, even if that decision is ultimately made, has not this law sustained the financial credit of the country through the late struggle to the same extent and with the same effect as though there had been no question as to its constitutionality? When the law organizing the Freedmen's Bureau was before this body the other day it was pronounced by eminent Senators here to be an unconstitutional act. Suppose they are correct in that opinion, but this law goes into operation, and everybody acquiesces in its validity for three years or five years, and it is then repealed; will not that law during the time of its operation have accomplished all that it would if no question had been made as to its validity?

Now, sir, these ordinances of secession may not absolutely have dissolved the legal relations between the States and the General Government, but they produced a practical dissolution. Take, to illustrate, a case where a husband and wife quarrel and separate; their home is abandoned, their family broken up, their children scattered, and reduced to indigence and want, all concerned are humiliated and disgraced; still, in law, the man and the woman are as much husband and wife as they ever were, but the practical effect of their separation is just as disastrous as though the legal relation was severed at the time their personal association ceased.

I say, then, as to these ordinances of secession, that they were contrary to the Constitution and were without right in law, but they were practically operative in the rebel States because they were received and accepted by the people upon whom they were intended immediately to operate, and as to those people they had the power and effect of valid ordinances.

Sir, are we to assume in the view of the history of the last four years that these ordinances of secession were mere nonentities? Pursuant to these ordinances State governments were organized in eleven States; they combining and confederating together organized a confederate government, and that confederate government for four years, with more than a million bayonets, sustained its existence and carried on a war that made this nation tremble from its center to its circumference. Is it true, then, that these ordinances were mere nothings? Is it true that with all our mighty armaments of war we were simply nullifying what in themselves were perfect nullities? I suppose it is well known to every Senator that there is a doctrine in the law which recognizes a distinction between a de facto officer or Government and a de jure officer or Government. Acts of a de facto officer or of a de facto Government are regarded as valid although they may not legally originate or exist. These governments, whatever may be said as to the question of right, were de facto governments, and I do not concur in the opinion that was expressed the other day by the honorable Senator from Michigan [Mr. HOWARD] that a man who was compelled by one of these governments to bear arms against the United States was guilty of treason. I say that if any man under one of these de facto governments, in order to save his own life, was compelled to bear arms against the Federal Government, he was guiltless of treason in that act, and there is no tribunal in my judgment in Christendom that would punish him for crime under such circumstances. Acts derive their criminality or their moral character from the intent with which they are committed. Homicide may be murder or it may be justifiable, depending upon the intent of the person who commits the act, and certainly if there be no intent to commit the crime of treason no man can be justly punished for a necessary or involuntary commission of the act.

Let us suppose that under one of these rebel governments, in 1862, a law was passed providing that conveyances of land should be valid without any witnesses, when the law of the State prior to that time was that two witnesses should be necessary to the validity of a deed. Suppose under that law a man conveyed his land to another, and received an equivalent therefor, I ask, notwithstanding this law was passed by a rebel Legislature and the conveyance made under it, if all respectable courts would not hold and recognize that as a valid conveyance, one by which the title was transferred from the grantor to the grantee?

Suppose, to illustrate still further, that the people of the United States should elect a man President who was only thirty years of age, when the Constitution requires that he shall be thirty-five years old; that would clearly be an unconstitutional election; but suppose he should enter upon and continue in the discharge of the duties of the office until the expiration of his term, I ask if the acts of that Administration would not possess the same validity that they would if the President had possessed the qualifications required by the Constitution?

I accept this position with all its legal consequences; and I say that as to persons who were living in those States and who have suffered from the calamities of the late war, without respect to their private feelings or predilections, they must share the fortunes of the governments under which they lived. When a man went into the State of Virginia to live, he took that State as a man takes his wife, "for better or for worse;" he took that State with all its blessings and advantages in a time of peace, and he took it with all its disadvantages and evils in a time of war. Although I do not say that there is not some case growing out of the ravages of war in the rebel States constituting a claim against the United States which can be recognized, I say that I have never yet heard of or seen a claim of that kind that I would consent to allow; and I put my objection upon the ground that the people residing in the rebel States during the war were de facto the subjects of a foreign Power, and though they are to be commiserated for their misfortunes, they are not to be indemnified by the people of the loyal States for their losses. I think the people who sustained the war for the Union have expended blood and treasure enough without paying for the injuries they were compelled to inflict upon the citizens of the rebel States in order to put down the rebellion.

I know it is sometimes said that these positions will make it necessary for the Federal Government to assume the debts of the rebel States; but I answer to that, in the first place, that the Government has the power to refuse to pay them, and that is sufficient. In the second place, I do not believe that any precedent can be found where a community having rebelled against a Government, and is defeated and subdued, that the parent Government, without any treaty or negotiation, is bound to assume, or has assumed, the debts created by the defeated community in its attempted rebellion. And in the third place, while those acts that were executed may generally stand, the contracts that were made to aid the rebellion are executory and void and cannot be enforced because they were made for an illegal consideration.

Another argument that is urged, and has been repeated in the Senate, is that these States had no right to secede, and therefore they did not secede; and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] the other day put the proposition in this form: they (referring to the rebel States) said that they wanted to secede; we said they should not secede; the question was submitted to the arbitrament of war and decided in our favor. Now, with due deference to the Senator, I think he did not accurately state the issue in the war. The question was not as to whether these States had or had not seceded, but the question was whether or not they had a right to secede. South Carolina made her ordinance of secession, organized her State government, and committed the overt act of secession. But the Federal Government denied the right of that State to secede, and the question before the country and in the war was not as to what had or had not been done, but as to the rightfulness of the position assumed by South Carolina and her confederates.

Apportionment of Representation—Mr. Williams.

Numerous and forcible illustrations will occur to the mind of every Senator to prove the fallacy of this argument to which I now refer. Acts may be rightful or they may be wrongful. Booth had no right to assassinate the President of the United States, but he did it. England had no right to allow privateers to be fitted out in her ports to prey upon our commerce, but she did it. France had no right to thrust Maximilian into Mexico and support him there with French bayonets, but she did it. Russia, Austria, and Prussia had no right to trample down and divide Poland, but they did it. And so I say that these rebel States had no right to secede, but they did it, wantonly, wickedly, wrongfully did it.

Suppose that a man wrongfully takes possession of my house and I bring a suit to eject him, while the proceedings are pending in court and from the time he entered until the writ of restitution is served upon him, I ask if he is not as much in possession of that house as though he was rightfully there? Treason took possession of these rebel States, and from the time that the ordinances of secession were set up and the rebel governments were organized, the power and authority of the United States were expelled, and by the absolute possession and control of rebel authority these States were practically seceded from the Union.

All the analogies of the law sustain this position. If the Constitution be a compact, assume claim it to be, then when the State of South Carolina has wantonly and wickedly violated that compact, can she claim under it the rights and privileges which she would otherwise have derived from it? Two men make a contract, and one wantonly violates the contract, can he claim the rights he otherwise could claim under that contract? Suppose a legislative assembly passes a law conferring certain rights and imposing certain duties and obligations upon an individual, can he repudiate the duties and obligations and claim the rights under the law? Could the State of South Carolina, trampling the Constitution of the United States under her sacrilegious feet and contemning and defying the authority of the Federal Government, at the same time uno flatu claim all the advantages and benefits which she ever enjoyed under that Constitution as one of the States of this Union?

When a forfeiture occurs rights are not annihilated, but they are transferred from one party to another; and I maintain that the rights which these rebel States had under the Constitution prior to the rebellion by that rebellion became forfeited and passed into the hands of the Federal Government, and in my judgment they are to-day in the hands of the Congress of the United States. Many elaborate speeches have been made here to controvert this position, and two to which I will particularly refer, one made by the honorable Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. DOOLITTLE] and the other by the honorable Senator from Maryland, [Mr. JOHNSON], have been pronounced by those who concur in them as wholly unanswerable. I do not presume that I am able to answer those speeches, but I am certainly able to examine and I hope to do them justice. It was argued by those gentlemen that President Lincoln had said and done certain things and that President Johnson had said and done certain other things, and that the sayings and doings of these two Presidents amounted to a recognition of these States and proved that they were States within the Union, entitled to the rights and privileges of such States. Another argument was that Congress, by its legislation from time to time during the rebellion, had recognized these States as within this Union; and therefore they were not only within this Union, but were standing at our doors with a perfect right as loyal States to be represented here, and Congress had no other power or jurisdiction over the great question of reconstruction but to pass upon the personal qualifications of the men who may be seeking to represent these States in the national Legislature.

I will pass over for the present the argument derived from the acts and sayings of the Presidents, but will notice here the argument derived from congressional legislation; and, with due deference to those gentlemen who made the argument, it seems to me that they omitted to take a distinction at that point which must be recognized in order to arrive at a correct conclusion. The acts of legislation which they cite were nothing but expressions of power on the part of the Federal Government over these States; and that power was exercised and could be exercised without any acknowledgment on the part of Congress that these States possessed any rights as States of the Union. No man has ever contended, so far as I know, no matter how radical or extreme he may have been, that these States were ever beyond the jurisdiction of Congress, or that there ever was a time since the rebellion when Congress had not ample power to make such laws for them as in its judgment the circumstances of the country required.

Reference was made to the apportionment and the tax law. The apportionment law was simply an exercise of power on the part of Congress. It was intended for the future, and it was made with a view that at no distant day, and before another apportionment could be made under a new census, these States would be restored to the Union, and then there would be a law to operate and take effect within those States. So with the tax law. Taxation was levied upon these States as upon others. Congress had power to levy taxes; and certainly because these States were in rebellion, that was no reason why they should be exempted from the burdens that were imposed upon other States. Congress during this rebellion was legislating for these States, not in the way of levying taxes or making apportionments alone, but Congress was exerting unlimited power for the destruction of the property and the lives of persons within these States, in order to subdue the rebellion. Any argument derived from the exercise of power on the part of Congress over the rebel States during the rebellion proves nothing to the point, for the question is not as to whether Congress had power or jurisdiction over those States, but the question is as to the rights of the States. Power on the part of the General Government is one thing; right on the part of the State is another and different thing. Federal power may exist and State rights be destroyed; rights of the States may depend upon the existence of Federal power for their protection, but the exercise of Federal power over a State in rebellion recognizes nothing but the necessity which demands its exercise.

Authority was produced from the legislation of Congress to show that Congress had maintained its right to legislate for these States, but no precedent, no authority, was cited to show that Congress had expressed any opinion, or, in any way otherwise than by asserting its power, recognized the rights of these States during or since the rebellion. The argument derived from the legislation referred to is certainly fallacious, for if it proves anything it proves that the day the apportionment or tax bill was passed the rebel States had the right of representation in Congress. If the enactment of those laws proves that those States have that right at this time it proves that they have had that right ever since the laws were enacted. But, sir, I propose to refer to an authority to show what view the Senate of the United States has taken of the rights of these States. Bear in mind, now, that all the authorities cited by Senators to whom I have referred were as to the power of Congress, but I desire to show a decision by the Senate as to the rights of rebel States, and I refer for that purpose to a proposition which was offered by the honorable Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BROWN] to be found on page 3449 of part four of the Congressional Globe, for the first session of the Thirty-Eighth Congress. I will first read the bill, and then the vote of the Senate upon it. The bill of the Senator from Missouri was in these words:

"That when the inhabitants of any State have been declared in a state of insurrection against the United States by proclamation of the President, by force and virtue of the act entitled 'An act further to provide for the collection of duties on imports, and for other purposes,' approved July 13, 1861, they shall be, and are hereby, declared to be incapable of casting any vote for electors of President or Vice President of the United States, or of electing Senators or Representatives in Congress until said insurrection in said State is suppressed or abandoned and said inhabitants have returned to their obedience to the Government of the United States, nor until such return to obedience shall be declared by proclamation of the President, issued by virtue of an act of Congress, hereafter to be passed, authorizing the same."

Here is a bill which declares that these rebel States are incapable of choosing electors for President or of choosing Senators and Representatives in Congress until a given time. That time is not when hostilities have ceased, when the rebel armies have been disbanded, but they are to be incapable of exercising any of these rights until the Congress of the United States has passed a law declaring the rebellion at an end and authorizing the President to make proclamation of that fact.

Mr. WADE. When was that offered?

Mr. WILLIAMS. July 1, 1864. I wish to refer now to the vote upon that bill, which will be found on page 3461 of the same volume of the Globe. I will read the vote. The yeas and nays upon the passage of that bill in the Senate were as follows:

"YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Chandler, Conness, Doolittle, Grimes, Hale, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Morgan, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Riddle, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Wilkinson, and Wilson—28."

"NAYS—Messrs. Davis, Powell, and Saulsbury—3."

The honorable Senator from Wisconsin and the honorable Senator from Maryland have made elaborate arguments in the Senate to show that these States have always been in the Union and are entitled to the rights and privileges of the States within the Union, and that Congress has no jurisdiction over the subject of reconstruction except to pass upon the qualifications of the persons who propose to represent those States. The record which I have just exhibited to the Senate shows that these honorable Senators at that time were of opinion, and so declared by their votes, that these States were incapable of choosing electors for President or choosing Senators or Representatives in Congress, and that that right did not accrue to them when hostilities had ceased, as is now claimed, but when Congress should decide that the rebellion was at an end. Does not that bill clearly assume that the control of this question is in Congress. I humbly submit that so far as the acts of Senators at one time will answer what they say at another, this record, this vote, is a complete refutation of the arguments that have been adduced by them to prove that these States have all the time been in the Union, entitled to the rights and privileges of States within this Union.

This is one branch of the argument; another is derived from the policy of President Lincoln and of President Johnson. No man will go further in paying respect to the memory of Abraham Lincoln than I will. I admired him for his greatness and his goodness, for he was great as he was good. But I am not one of those who give up my opinion because some man who happens to hold a higher office than I do differs from me. I do not believe anything to be true, simply because some man, fifty or one hundred years ago, or at any other antecedent time, said it was true, when the blazing light of day around me contradicts its truth and the trumpet-tongued facts of experience are pouring their constant refutation into my ears.

SENATE.

Apportionment of Representation—Mr. Williams.

39TH CONG... 1ST SESS.

President Lincoln changed his opinion while he was President of the United States. Once he said that to issue an emancipation proclamation would be like issuing a bull against the comet; but when the subsequent developments of the war satisfied him that it was a necessity, he then issued that memorable proclamation which has made his name conspicuous in the history of human freedom and given him a high rank in the company of the immortals. I do not admit that President Lincoln's policy proves that the position which I occupy is incorrect; but on the contrary I maintain that there is no man, I care not how great his ingenuity may be, who can reconcile the policy of President Lincoln with a recognition of these States as entitled to all the rights and privileges of States within this Union. When he made his proclamation authorizing one tenth of the voters of a State to hold a convention and organize a State government, did he not in that proclamation ignore the existence of any prior State organization and even the right of a rebel State to govern itself at that time or to be represented in the Congress of the United States? Suppose that President Lincoln had issued a proclamation to the State of New York providing that one tenth of the loyal voters of that State might hold a convention and reorganize a State government, would not that proclamation have been regarded as the freak of an insane man? It seems to me that if we avoid the play upon words as to whether these States are in or out of the Union, no one can fail to conclude that President Lincoln was of the opinion, judging from the acts of his Administration, that these States, whatever their precise legal status might be, had forfeited their rights as States within this Union.

President Johnson is said to follow in the footsteps of his illustrious predecessor on this question. President Johnson says, I acknowledge that these States are in the Union, and I do not controvert that position; but I say, and defy contradiction, that President Johnson, from the beginning of his Administration to this very day, has recognized these States as having forfeited, or in some way lost, the rights and privileges of States within this Union. When he appointed provisional governors for the rebel States he recognized the want of any government there. He assumed that there was no government in those States; that those States were, to use the language of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, a clean slate on which he could commence the organization of new governments. Could President Johnson have appointed a provisional governor for the State of New York? Who will contend that he could? If not, why not? New York is a State within this Union, entitled to the rights and privileges of a State; but South Carolina, though she may be within the jurisdiction of the Federal Government, and so in the Union, is not entitled to the rights and privileges of the loyal State of New York.

President Johnson not only appointed provisional governors, but authorized conventions to form constitutions; declared what persons should vote at elections, what should be the qualifications of electors, what the constitutions when formed should contain; and so, from beginning to end, the only law in the reorganization of these States has been the will of the President. I am not complaining of what he has done, but I say that he has assumed from the beginning that these States were without the rights and privileges of States within the Union; that they were disorganized masses of people; and that everything, from the foundation up, was to be de novo a new dispensation, to be substituted for the old that existed prior to or during the time of the rebellion.

I think, therefore, that the argument which is derived from the acts of President Lincoln and of President Johnson does not prove what those Senators claim. They prove, if they prove anything at all, that these States as States became functi officio, and have not yet become able to resume their rights and privileges as States within the Union. I wish it distinctly understood that I do not refer to these acts to censure or condemn them, although I confess that I have some misgivings as to the power of the President to organize civil governments as Commander-in-Chief of the Army. I refer to these acts to show that they do not prove what those who use them claim that they do; but, on the contrary, they prove that these States, whatever may be said about their being in the Union, have not been regarded as entitled to the rights and privileges of other States. Assuming that Congress is equal in power to the Executive, I argue that Congress may do all that the President has done as to these rebel States. I mean to insist that the acts of the Executive have not excluded the jurisdiction of Congress over this question, and that Congress is not estopped by any proclamation or any telegraphic dispatch from the President, or anything done in pursuance thereof, from exercising its power and control over this great question of reconstruction. I insist that Congress is not reduced to the poor and pitiful position of meeting the Representatives of these rebel States at the door of the Capitol with no power but to respectfully inquire if they possess the personal qualifications for a seat in the Senate or in the House of Representatives.

Mr. President, much denunciation has been heaped upon Congress for hesitating about the immediate recognition of the rebel States, and I must say that in my opinion there is too much impatience everywhere upon that subject. Time has a work to do in this business which cannot be wrought out by other means. Time has an office to perform which no human expedient or device can perform in its place. Time will cicatrize the wounds that the war has made. Time will assuage the anguish of the broken-hearted and the bereaved. Time will soften the asperities and passions that have grown out of the late fearful conflict. Give time a chance to do its work. Give us time. I confess that in this matter I do need time—time to look at and consider and determine as to the wisdom, the expediency, or the justice of any proposed policy.

Let it be borne in mind, Mr. President, that in this business of reconstruction we are not engaged upon any temporary arrangement. This is not the expedient of a day. This work which we now perform is to endure. It is to bless or to curse the country for all coming time; and while we discuss the proclamations of Presidents and devise ways and means to meet the present emergency, coming generations beckon to us with their shadowy hands to look at and think of them.

Sir, it is surprising that these States have not resumed their former position in less than one year from the time they were engaged in efforts to demolish and destroy this Government? After the last British flag went down in the Revolution, notwithstanding our fathers were bound together by every tie that could bind men who were fighting in a common and a holy cause, more than seven years expired before the formation of this Union was completed. But now great impatience is displayed and many harsh epithets are hurled at Congress because within less than one year from the time these men were struggling through fields of carnage to put an end to the existence of this nation; because before the smoke of the battle has cleared away, and while their hands are yet red with the warm blood of our defenders, they are not sitting in these high seats of power and controlling the destinies of a Government which they hate and have tried to destroy. When we consider that it took these conspirators more than thirty years to concoct this infernal rebellion, and that they were for four years fighting with the desperation of madmen to accomplish their fiendish work, is it to be marveled at that six months or a year or more should pass by before these identical men are taken into the national bosom, lacerated and torn by their blows, and recognized as equals in a political brotherhood?

I have spoken, Mr. President, of the necessity of time in this business of reconstruction; that it is not desirable or safe to make too much haste, but that it is due to the magnitude of the subject that we should proceed with deliberation. Caution is the parent of safety, and in doing what we may not be able to undo if wrong it is necessary to be extremely cautious. It is more than an error to err now. To be careless or reckless at this time is to be criminal.

I desire here to apply what I have said as to the necessity of time to a proposition that has been introduced by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts as a substitute for the resolution to amend the Constitution reported by the committee on reconstruction.

Sir, I listened with profound admiration to the speech which the Senator delivered in favor of the proposed substitute. It was worthy of the subject, worthy of the occasion, worthy of the author, and when those who heard it shall be forgotten, the echoes of its lofty and majestic periods will linger and repeat themselves among the corridors of history. I cordially endorse the prevailing sentiment of that speech. I believe that the founders of this Republic intended that all freemen should participate in the political and civil rights of the country. I think the distinction which they made was not between white men and black men—that distinction is of modern origin; but the distinction which they made was between freemen and slaves.

But, sir, is the proposition of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts practicable at this time? I do not give it as my opinion, but it is an incontrovertible fact that a very large majority of the people of the United States deny the constitutional power of Congress to enact such a law. Pass that law at this session, and it becomes an issue in the next political campaign, and those who sustain it and pass it here will be committed to its support, and those who oppose it will strive to elect men in favor of its repeal. A majority of this Congress may believe in the constitutionality and expediency of such legislation, but another Congress, if a majority should happen to sympathize with the honorable Senator from Kentucky, would abrogate the law, and so the political rights of millions of people would be as varying as the capricious fortunes of the political parties of the country.

Adopt that proposition, and it will follow as a matter of course that the doors of Congress will be thrown open at once to the Representatives of the rebel States, and is there any reason to suppose that the rebel element which is now predominant in those States would not control that vote, so as to make its entire representation in Congress a representation possibly antagonistical to the peace and the perpetuity of this Union? I say frankly that I conceive it to be of more consequence, not only to the future interests, but to the life of this nation, that the rebel States should have a limited representation in Congress until the great questions growing out of the late war are adjusted, or in a sure process of adjustment, than that the negroes anywhere should immediately vote.

Sir, although there is question about it, it seems to me there can be little doubt that at this particular time the negroes of the rebel States are unfit to exercise the elective franchise. I have recently conversed with two officers of the Federal Army from Texas, who told me that there, in the interior and agricultural portions of that State, the negroes do not yet know that they are free; and one of the officers told me that he personally communicated to several negroes for the first time the fact of their freedom. Emancipation may be known in the towns and cities throughout the South, but the probabilities are that in the agricultural portions of that country the negroes have no knowledge that they are free, or only vague conceptions of their rights and duties as freemen. Sir, give these men a little time, give them a chance to learn that they are free, give them a chance to acquire some knowledge of their rights as freemen; give them a chance to learn that they are independent and can act for themselves, give them a chance to divest themselves of that feeling of entire dependence for subsistence and the sustenance of their families upon the land-holders of the South to which they have been so long accustomed; give them a little time to shake the manacles off of their minds that have just been stricken from their hands, and I will go with the honorable Senator from Massachusetts to give them the right of suffrage; and I will here express the hope that the day is not far distant when every man born upon American soil within the pale of civilization may defend his manhood and his rights as a freeman by that most effective ballot which—

“Executes the freeman’s will
As lightning does the will of God.”

I suppose that I might as well, as I have alluded to this question of constitutional amendments, refer to the proposed substitute offered by the honorable Senator from Missouri, [Mr. HENDERSON.] I confess that I was somewhat surprised the other day to hear the honorable Senator characterize the amendment which had been reported from the committee of fifteen after two or three weeks’ deliberation, and after it had passed the other House by a majority of more than two thirds, as stuff and nonsense, and say that the substitute which he proposed was sufficient in the place of all constitutional amendments or congressional legislation in reference to former slaves. I will not assail the amendment proposed by the honorable Senator in the same manner in which he attacked the report of the committee, but I will remark that the constitutional amendment which he offers as a substitute allows a State to make any discrimination that is not founded upon race or color. New York State, under that constitutional amendment, might exclude every man born in Europe from the right of suffrage or from representation, and any discrimination could be founded upon nativity, intelligence, condition, circumstances, sex, and upon anything and everything, provided that it is not upon color or race; and to adopt that amendment at this time and in this form would seem to give countenance to the charge so often made, that we are more willing to make laws and constitutional amendments for black than for white men.

I object to this constitutional amendment of the Senator from Missouri because it allows all the Indians in the States of the Union to vote. Sir, the bloodthirsty and murderous Sioux of Minnesota, the Cayuses and the Walla Walla and the Snakes, that banditti of the desert, in Oregon, and the Digger Indians of California, are all made voters by the Senator’s constitutional amendment, and invested with that high prerogative of American citizenship. Does the honorable Senator suppose that the State of Minnesota, or the State of Oregon, or the State of California would submit from choice to this degradation, if not danger of political association?

Mr. HENDERSON. I hope that the Senator will permit me to suggest, just at this point, that he is clearly mistaken in the statement that he now makes. I thought that he did me great injustice a moment ago, but I did not choose to interfere. Now, certainly he does me great injustice in supposing that I have offered an amendment which would force California, Minnesota, and other States to permit Indians to vote. As I understand, California provides in her constitution to-day that a man to vote must be a citizen of the United States; nearly all the States so provide. A man to vote in the Senator’s State must be a citizen of the United States.

The other day we declared that certain persons were citizens of the United States; but he knows perfectly well that all Indians not taxed were excluded by that bill which we propose to pass; and unless the Indians referred to are separated from the tribal authority, unless they have become indeed citizens of the State and of the United States by virtue of the law which we propose now to pass, they cannot vote under this constitutional amendment. The States need not say that they exclude the Indians in consequence of the fact that they are of a different race or color, but they may simply say that no man shall vote unless he is a citizen of the United States, and that surely will exclude every Indian to whom the Senator refers. He is certainly doing me very great injustice.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, this is a constitutional amendment, and is to endure. The law to which the gentleman refers, in the first place is not a law; it has passed the Senate but has not yet passed the House of Representatives; but if this constitutional amendment is adopted by Congress and ratified by the States taking the law as it now stands, I say it will make the wild and untamed savages of the wilderness and the desert voters in the United States.

Mr. HENDERSON. These Indians are not now citizens, and if that law is passed or repealed they would still not be citizens. They never were citizens, and no matter what our legislation is here, any State of the Union that wants to prevent her Indians from voting can do so. The Senator certainly must see the proposition.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I may misunderstand this proposed amendment, but it declares that no State shall make any discrimination on account of race or color. Now, if the State of Oregon provides that Indians within that State shall not vote it would be a discrimination on account of race.

Mr. HENDERSON. But the Senator does not understand me. I see now clearly he does not. Suppose that Oregon declares that no man shall vote unless he be a citizen of the United States, will that not exclude all the Indians in his State that he speaks of, because they are not now citizens, they are not proposed to be declared citizens by the law which we are proposing to pass, they never have been citizens, and whether we pass this law or not they will not be. Therefore Oregon need say nothing in regard to color or race, but simply say that no man who is not a citizen of the United States shall vote. That is the law of Oregon to-day; hence all the Indians he speaks of are excluded.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Citizenship in the United States, as I understand it, depends upon the will of Congress; and if the views the honorable Senator expressed the other day when he favored making all these Indians citizens should obtain in Congress, then it would follow that under this constitutional amendment they would be voters.

Mr. HENDERSON. Permit me to ask the Senator whether, if an Indian separates himself from the tribal authority, and the State taxes him, he does not believe that Indian ought to vote?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do, and that was the position I took the other day, but the honorable Senator took the position that no such distinction should be made, as I understood him.

Mr. HENDERSON. Surely not. The Senator misunderstood me. I did not propose, unless the Indian separated himself from his tribal authority, that he should ever be a citizen of the United States.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If all these explanations and annotations of the honorable Senator could accompany this proposed amendment throughout the United States, he might be able to satisfy the people that it does not mean what it says; but it is as broad and as comprehensive as the English language can make it, and it is intended to prevent any State from making discrimination between white men, Indians, negroes, or persons of any color or of any race.

I pass, however, from that objection, and I insist that the fatal and conclusive objection to the proposed substitute of the Senator from Missouri is that it cannot be adopted. All the impassioned declamation and all the vehement assertions of the honorable Senator do not change or affect the evidence before our eyes that the people of these United States are not prepared to surrender to Congress the absolute right to determine as to the qualifications of voters in the respective States, or to adopt the proposition that all persons, without distinction of race or color, shall enjoy political rights and privileges equal to those now possessed by the white people of the country. Sir, some of the States have lately spoken upon that subject. Wisconsin and Connecticut, northern, loyal, and republican States, have recently declared that they would not allow the negroes within their own borders political rights; and is it probable that of the thirty-six States more than six, at the most, would at this time adopt the constitutional amendment proposed by the gentleman?

He says that he is right, and therefore his constitutional amendment should be adopted by Congress as a substitute for the one reported by the committee. If it be always expedient it is not always practicable to do exactly right. Slavery before the rebellion was as wrong and as wicked as it ever was. It was just as right to abolish slavery in 1860 as it was in 1865. But suppose before the rebellion occurred some one had made a proposition here to submit to the several States an amendment to the Constitution abolishing slavery, would there have been the ghost of a chance for its adoption? Would not the people of the country have laughed such a proposition to scorn, and would not the honorable Senator himself have joined heartily in that laugh? He could have gone before the people, as he may now, and say “this is right,” but that would have availed nothing, for the supposed interests, to say nothing of the prejudices, of the people would have scoffed at the argument. Congress cannot by its legislation compel the people to adopt that to which the public sentiment of the country is generally opposed. The time had not then come for the adoption of the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery. It was necessary that the events of the war should educate the public mind and prepare the people for its adoption; and now, as the war has just closed, it is necessary that events should be allowed to educate the public mind before this constitutional amendment can be adopted, if it can ever be adopted, and it is not sufficient to justify us, in submitting a proposition to amend the Constitution to the people, simply to say that in our judgment it is right. Many things are right, but it may not be expedient to try to do them without any delay. It is no doubt right that the United States should claim of Great Britain reparation for the damages done to our commerce by her privateers during the late war; but would it be expedient for Congress to involve this country under existing circumstances in war to enforce that claim? To put down the rebellion was no doubt right, but suppose some madcap colonel had hurled a thousand of our heroes upon the bayonets of ten thousand rebels and caused them all to be slaughtered, would that colonel have been justified in his conduct by saying, “I was right, and therefore it was not necessary to exercise any judgment as to the ways or means to secure that right.” Are men to discard all reason, judgment, and foresight as to the means to accomplish a given end?

Suppose the honorable Senator wanted to go to New York. He has expressed great contempt here for any indirect way of attaining an object. He has a right to go to New York. Suppose that the direct route is obstructed by high water in the Susquehanna so that it cannot be crossed, but he can go to New York by a more circuitous route, would it be the part of wisdom for the distinguished Senator to rush along over the direct route into the Susquehanna and drown himself, or would it be more advisable for him to go a little way round and accomplish the object he had in view?

I object, then, to the proposed amendment because it will avail us nothing. Put it before the country and commit the Union party to it, the amendment will be defeated and the Union party overwhelmed in its support—and the control of this Government would pass into the hands of men who have more or less sympathized with the rebellion; and I say that it is of more consequence, in my judgment, that the control of this Government should remain in the hands of the men who stood up for the Union during the late war than that any constitutional amendment should be adopted by which the right of suffrage should be extended to any person or persons not now enjoying it.

I ask the honorable Senator how his proposed amendment is to be executed? The Constitution will declare that there shall be no discrimination on account of race or color if his amendment be adopted. Suppose the State of New York still retains its present constitutional provision providing that negroes shall have property worth $250 to be qualified to vote. What are you going to do about it? Will Congress make war upon the State of New York to enforce the constitutional provision? What is the remedy to the voter who is rejected? He may have the right of course to sue the judge and test the validity of the law; and it may be, at the end of a law suit, decided that he had a right to vote; but would that be of any avail to him after the law suit was ended? Besides, the decision would only apply to the individual case, and the State might still persist in the exclusion of persons on account of color or race. In that respect the proposed amendment of the committee has the great merit of executing itself. There is no escape from it. It is to be observed that the Senator's amendment is a mere limitation upon the power of the State; it does not operate directly upon individuals.

Another proposition has been submitted by the honorable Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. DOOLITTLE], as a substitute for the report of the committee, providing that Representatives shall be apportioned according to the white male electors above twenty-one years of age in the several States. I ask those who favor that proposition if it is necessary to strike out of political existence all the women in the United States and all persons under twenty-one years of age in order to reach the condition of the lately emancipated negroes? Adopt that substitute and you at once declare that more than one half of the white people of these United States shall be deprived of any right of representation in Congress for the purpose of providing for the negroes in the southern States. That violates the fundamental principle adopted by our fathers when they framed the Constitution, and it seems to me that it would be great injustice to adopt such a constitutional provision. Many good objections have been stated and urged to it. I will not repeat them; but it would operate unfairly, as it seems to me, because those States where the males exceed the females would have an undue proportion of the representation in Congress.

Moreover, that amendment undertakes to fix the qualification of voters in the several States by declaring forever that no person shall ever vote in any State, under any circumstances, unless he be a man over twenty-one years of age. Is it necessary in an amendment to the Constitution so to enact in order to meet the exigency that has grown out of the late convulsion in the country? for we all acknowledge that the primary object of all these amendments is to provide for the new state of things that has arisen out of the abolition of slavery.

Some Senators object to any constitutional amendments. Sir, lately a constitutional amendment was adopted by the people abolishing slavery, and that constitutional amendment has created a new state of things in the United States. It has abolished a vast amount of property; it has overturned an aristocratic and powerful system; it has restored millions of people who were slaves to their rights as freemen, and changed the whole aspect and condition of things in the lately rebellious States; and it is reasonable, therefore, that some change in the Constitution should be made to meet the circumstances that have grown out of this revolution in the political and social system of the South.

Mr. HENDERSON. If the Senator will permit me, I should like to ask him a question here. He says, as to the proposition of the Senator from Wisconsin to base representation on voters, that it is very unjust to exclude women and the minors in the northern States who can be permitted to vote by their respective Legislatures or by the people in the formation of their constitutions. I should like to ask him, if that be unjust, how he makes it just that the negroes who cultivate the soil in the southern States, and who are loyal men and have been loyal men, shall be excluded from representation, for he says it is more desirable that they be excluded, a great deal more, than that the negroes shall vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am not surprised that the Senator is very much troubled about the rights of women—

Mr. HENDERSON. I only quoted the language of the Senator. He said that it would be very unjust to exclude the women from representation. I only quoted his own language.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I desire to say that the constitutional amendment proposed by the honorable Senator from Wisconsin positively and absolutely strikes women and minors out of political existence, while the proposition reported by the committee does no such thing, but provides, according to the principles incorporated into the Constitution by its framers, that the States shall regulate this matter, and if they do not regulate it according to the dictates of humanity and justice, they shall be punished. The gentleman assumes that the amendment reported by the committee is equivalent, in its operation upon the negroes, to the proposition proposed by the honorable Senator from Wisconsin in its operation upon women and children; but in that he mistakes, for this proposition of the committee is intended to induce the States to confer the right of suffrage and representation upon black people by declaring that if they do not do that the States shall be without representation to that extent in the Congress of the United States.

I wish to say a word upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts—and amendment has been piled upon amendment, Pelion upon Ossa, until it is very difficult to determine exactly what is the question before the Senate; but the honorable Senator from Massachusetts proposes to amend the committee's resolution by declaring that persons of color, if States decline to allow them the right of suffrage, and so they become excluded from representation, shall be exempted from all taxation of every nature and description. I ask if that would be fair or just. Take the State of Maryland, if you please. There institutions of government are provided, courts are established, and the law is administered; public institutions of various kinds are founded and maintained, roads and bridges are constructed, all by taxation upon the people; and the negroes in that State enjoy to a greater or less extent the benefit of those institutions, and therefore they ought to pay a reasonable proportion of taxes for the blessings and benefits they enjoy from these public expenditures and institutions, though they may not be directly represented in Congress. Direct taxes are to be apportioned among the several States, and the constitutional amendment proposed by the committee proposes simply to deprive those persons who are disfranchised in the State of the right of representation; but when Congress imposes a direct tax upon a State it operates equally upon all the persons in that State, and if the State is represented, the Representatives chosen by white people are as much interested in defeating any unjust taxation as would be the Representatives directly chosen by black people. Negroes without votes would be just as well protected from direct taxes in Congress as white people with votes, but the power of the State would be reduced by subtracting the blacks from the basis of representation. I may be mistaken, but it is my opinion that the declaration which was quoted from Mr. Otis by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, "that taxation without representation is tyranny," and which was made to have great weight in the discussion, did not mean that every individual who was taxed in a community should be represented; but at that time the colonies were without representation in the Parliament of Great Britain, and Parliament was imposing taxes upon the colonies. I had supposed the meaning of that expression to be that it was tyranny for one Government to tax a State or a community or a colony without allowing that State, community, or colony representation in the Government imposing the tax. I never understood that our fathers intended to say that any Government that did not allow every man, woman, and child within its jurisdiction, whose property was taxed, a right of representation, was a tyranny.

Mr. President, the committee of fifteen have proposed an amendment to the Constitution, which has been ably supported by the honorable chairman of the committee, [Mr. FESSENDEN.] I do not propose to travel over the same ground, but I am free to say that one object I have in supporting that resolution is to deprive the rebel States while the rebel element predominates there, as it must and will for some time whether you give suffrage to the black man or not, of as much power in Congress as the Constitution and circumstances of the country demand and allow, so that the men who have saved the Union can provide lasting securities for the future integrity, honor, and peace of the nation. I also advocate the amendment proposed by the committee because it provides eventually that the negroes of the southern States, after they have learned what it is to be free, and not to be "like dumb cattle driven," may come to the enjoyment of the elective franchise. And I believe that if this constitutional amendment is adopted and put before the people, and the requisite number of States ratify it, in the southern States a party will spring up at once to advocate the extension of the elective franchise to the blacks. They will argue, "If you do this you increase the power of the State in the Federal Congress;" and that party, in my judgment, will grow and become stronger until it obtains the ascendancy, and after negroes are to some extent educated and elevated the elective franchise will be conferred upon them by the action of the States themselves.

Pass the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri, or the proposed law submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts, make it operative in the rebel States at once, and you make a line of demarkation between the white and black races; white men will constitute one political party and the negroes will constitute another; and I think it is desirable for the sake of both races that some system shall be adopted that will divide and not consolidate the white men against the black, or the black men against the white. The honorable Senator from Missouri declared yesterday that the adoption of the proposed law offered by the Senator from Massachusetts would produce a war of races in the southern States. I do not accord with that view of the subject; I believe if that law was passed to-day it would tend to build up the rebel element in the South, because the negroes at this time are poor, homeless, destitute, and dependent. They must look to the landholders for employment and for a livelihood for themselves and their families, and although they did aid the Union cause in the late war, because they expected freedom, which was to them a promised land flowing with milk and honey, I doubt very much whether these same negroes would decline to vote as their employer might indicate if they were put to the choice of doing that or being turned adrift upon the world to beg or steal or starve. I wish to say, too, for the committee's amendment, that while it is better adapted than any other to the present exigencies of the country, it adheres to two principles of the Constitution most highly prized by the fathers of the Republic, to wit, apportionment of representation according to population and the right of the States to regulate the elective franchise. The proposed substitutes launch us upon an ocean of untried experiment.

Mr. President, passing from the consideration of these constitutional amendments, allow me to make a few remarks upon one or two other topics. Much has been said here about the President's policy, and it is pressed upon the Senate as a necessity that Congress should adopt that policy. I do not know that I exactly understand what that policy is, but presume that it means generally pardon to all the men who have been in rebellion with few exceptions; the extension of the elective franchise to all those who will take the amnesty oath; the organization of State governments under the proclamations of the President; and the immediate restoration of those States to the Union by allowing them their Senators and Representatives at this time in Congress. Giving the President great credit for upright and patriotic motives in the adoption of this policy, I must be allowed—and I hope I do not violate any rule of propriety—to venture the opinion that in one respect he has made a mistake, and that is in the almost unlimited exercise of the pardoning power toward the men who conducted the late rebellion. I am anxious, and have been anxious, to coöperate with the President in the work of reconstructing this Union. I have been and am his friend. I was as active as I could be in my humble sphere to procure his nomination for Vice President upon the Union ticket. Many years ago I admired him when in the South he fought the gallant and glorious battle of the downtrodden poor against the landholding and aristocratic classes, and the measure of my admiration for him was full when I saw him stand unshaken in his fidelity to the Union in that black sea of falsehood and treachery and perjury by which he was surrounded in the State of Tennessee. I do not now advocate any substitute for the policy which he has proposed. I do not attack or assail that policy. I am not yet prepared to express any definite opinion as to the best policy to be pursued; but I desire to say, and I shall insist upon it, that the action of the President, whatever it may be, does not exclude the power of Congress to regulate the recognition or admission of the rebel States. I believe, with the light I now have, that the true policy would have been to have kept these States under strictly military governments till Congress could have convened. Congress could then have provided for the reorganization of these States according to law. Provision could then have been made for the exclusion of rebels from power and for the ascendancy of loyal men. Time could have been given for things to settle. Is it surprising that men who, for four years, have been hunting each other from mountain to swamp and back again, and trying to cut each other's throats, should not at once coalesce into political unity? There may be no blaze now, but I am apprehensive that the fire is not extinguished. The nation, no more than an individual, can take coals of fire into its bosom and not be burned.

Charges have been made and repeated upon this floor, that the Union party was disposed to keep these States in their present condition from selfish or party purposes. Is there any foundation for that imputation? Look at what transpired when the rebel armies were dispersed, when it was announced throughout the country that the great and bloody conspiracy against the life of the nation had failed. Everywhere the people of the loyal States were thrown into a blaze of excited joy, and the chief source of their gratification was the anticipated speedy restoration to the Union of the discordant and belligerent States. I make no question that some change has come over the public sentiment in this respect. What has occasioned that change? Why do the pulsations of the public heart that then bounded with joy now, like the beating of muffled drums, give sign of disappointment and sorrow? Is it because the northern people desire to protract the present state of things? Did they sacrifice their sons and their fathers and their brothers, and pour out their treasure and blood like water, to perpetuate a division, or was their object to secure a return of these States to a newly consolidated Union? Sir, when you consider what has been done, what acts of magnanimity and generosity have been extended to these undeserving and guilty people; when you consider the surprisingly liberal terms of surrender proposed by General Grant, the too generous terms offered by General Sherman; when you remember the words of Abraham Lincoln, "with malice toward none, with charity for all," which were caught up by the sympathies of the people and made a nation's voice; when you consider that pardons have been scattered by President Johnson through the camps of treason "like flower-seeds by the far winds blown;" when you consider all these acts of magnanimity and mercy and kindness on the part of the people of the United States who put down this rebellion, and then look at the manner in which these acts have been received, is it to be wondered at that doubts and fears and sorrowful misgivings to some extent have seized upon the public mind? I know that there are exceptions to what I am about to say, but, sir, "tis true, and pity 'tis 'tis true," that generally these acts, instead of being received with feelings of respect or expressions of gratitude, have been received with feelings of hatred and malice, and expressions of contempt and defiance. I know that history teaches that acts of magnanimity on the part of the conqueror toward the conquered will tend to conciliate and make peace; but it seems, sometimes, as though history was at fault as to these people, and as though there was nothing that would touch their hearts or their actions but the irresistible power of the Federal Government, the gleam of its flashing swords, and the glitter of its conquering bayonets.

Sir, I do not wish to say anything harsh or unkind of these people. I desire that they should be restored as soon as they can be with safety to the country. I should rejoice to see them coming back penitent and reformed like the prodigal son, and the nation going out to take them into its arms, saying, as did the father of old, "The lost is found and the dead is alive again." I will say, in answer to the question asked me about Tennessee, that I am inclined to the opinion that under the circumstances it would be advisable to try the experiment of speedy admission with that State. I have very little faith in theories. Opinions are as diverse among men as are the faces of those who express them. But here an experiment can be made. Tennessee is a State in which there are loyal men, in which there are rebels, and in which there are negroes. Let that State resume its position in the Union, and let the experiment there be tried as to whether rebels are disposed or not to acquiesce in the authority of the Federal Government, and accede to the loyal men the right to control; and also as to whether or not the white people there will treat their negroes in their new condition according to the dictates of humanity and justice. Try that experiment. Experiment is better than theory. That will prove whether what is said about these rebels is true or not; and if it should turn out that they maintain, after our recognition of the State, the same spirit which they displayed during the rebellion, then, sir, I am for crushing out that spirit by force, if necessary, or giving it time enough in which to die; and I give notice now that whatever I may do as to Tennessee will not bind me as to any other of the rebel States. Conditions of recognition may be necessary for all the rebel States.

Much complaint has been made here as to the course of Congress toward the rebel States, and considerable of it has emanated from the distinguished Senators from Kentucky; and while I wish to be entirely respectful, but with the view of showing in what spirit these complaints are made, I desire to say that it has been announced on this floor by one of the honorable Senators from Kentucky [Mr. DAVIS], in effect, that slavery had always existed in the cotton and sugar-growing States of this country, and always would exist, no matter what the constitutional amendments or the legislation of Congress may be upon that subject. And I respectfully call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the first man in Congress since the rebellion who has undertaken to influence its legislation by a threat of dissolution, is the distinguished Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. GUTHRIE], who reported in the Chicago convention the resolution that the war for the Union was a failure. That disgraceful declaration was trampled under foot by the loyal people of the North, while the confederacy, whose success it was intended to acknowledge, was trampled by our soldiers into the bloody mire of the battle-field. He said that the enactment of the Freedmen's Bureau bill would be a dissolution of the Union, and we could not help it. Sir, we can help it, and we will help it. Is not the terrible experience of the last four years sufficient to satisfy the Senator?

Mr. GUTHRIE. Will the Senator allow me to explain?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Certainly.

Mr. GUTHRIE. The Senator has fallen into error, and like many other Senators misunderstood what I said on that subject. I said that by the passage of the Freedmen's Bureau bill and the bill No. 61, and the other measures that were on foot, you gentlemen would accomplish or bring about what the rebellion had not done, a dissolution of the Union. It was an expression of apprehension as to the effect of your measures, which I had a right to express. It was no threat.

I am sorry the gentleman has gone back to the Chicago convention. The expression in the resolution reported there was that the Administration had failed hitherto, or during the war, to bring about a restoration of the Union by war; not that the war was a failure, but only that there had been a failure up to that time to restore the Union.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not desire to do the honorable Senator any injustice, but my attention was called to this matter yesterday by seeing in a Richmond newspaper reference made to his remark, and the paper seemed to regard that expression as some kind of authority, and alleged that if the President signed the bill organizing the Freedmen's Bureau it would greatly tend to fulfill the prediction of the Senator, and dissolve the Union. Sir, it is in vain to talk about dissolution. Let the man who dare, strike a blow at the integrity of the Union and ten hundred thousand war-worn veterans, fresh from the fields of their fame and glory, would spring to its defense. Sir, one blast upon the bugle-horn of Grant, or Sherman, or Sheridan, would make every guilty traitor in this land turn pale and tremble. [Applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. HENDRICKS.) Order!

Mr. WILLIAMS. Sir, it is worse than idle to intimate that dissolution can ever occur. To admit the possibility of such a thing here is to profane the sanctuary of a nation's hope and trust, and I want to say to that Senator what I should think he would know by this time, that secession in any shape or form is dead, and damned, and buried beyond the power or the hope of resurrection. [Applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Order!

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I have taxed the patience of the Senate too long. I will now conclude. I have to say that the way before us is not as clear as I wish it was, but the day is not so dark or the obstacles so insurmountable as they seemed to be when the fate of the nation hung in the doubtful scale of war. Patriotism, firmness, and union then, among Union men, rescued the nation from the hands of the spoilers and saved it, and if the same spirit controls now in the councils of the nation that governed our soldiers in the field, their triumph will be crowned by our success. Sir, this nation is to live and not die. God has written it among the shining decrees of destiny. Inspired by this hope and animated by this faith, we will take this country through all its present troubles and perils to the promised land of perfect unity and peace, where freedom, equality, and justice, the triune and tutelar deity of the American Republic, will rule with righteousness a nation "whose walls shall be salvation, and whose gates praise."

SPEECH OF HON. RICHARD YATES,

OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

February 19, 1866.

The Senate having under consideration the joint resolution (H. R. No. 51) proposing to amend the Constitution of the United States—

Mr. YATES said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: I send to the desk to be read Senate bill No. 106, which I introduced on the 29th January last, and in favor of which I propose to speak to-day.

The Secretary read the following bill:

A bill to protect citizens of the United States in their civil and political rights.

Whereas the Constitution of the United States abolishes slavery in all the States and Territories of the United States, whereby all constitutions, laws, or regulations of any State or Territory in aid of slavery or growing out of the same are null and void; and whereas, by virtue of said abolition of slavery, all men in all the States and Territories are citizens, entitled to all the rights and privileges of citizens, subject only to the legal disabilities applicable to white persons; and whereas, also, it is expressly provided that Congress shall have power to enforce by appropriate legislation the aforesaid power abolishing slavery, which cannot be done without protecting all citizens against all restrictions, penalties, or deprivations of right resulting from slavery, and securing to them all their civil and political rights, including the elective franchise: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled. That no State or Territory of the United States shall, by any constitution, law, or other regulation whatever, heretofore in force or hereafter to be adopted, make or enforce, or in any manner recognize any distinction between citizens of the United States or of any State or Territory on account of race or color or condition, and that hereafter all citizens, without distinction of race, color, or condition, shall be protected in the full and equal enjoyment and exercise of all their civil and political rights, including the right of suffrage.

Mr. YATES. I confess, sir, to some embarrassment in addressing the Senate at this time, and the greater because I know that the positions which I assume will be different from those of honorable Senators for whose opinions I have very great respect, and to whom it would seem becoming that one so humble as myself should defer. But, sir, the opinions which I have seem to me very important; and it appears to me that I cannot discharge my duty as a representative of the State which I have the honor in part to represent on this floor without expressing them. In doing so, it is with the conviction that this question, as was remarked by the distinguished Senator from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] the other day, is the gravest which has ever been discussed by the American Senate. The duty of this Congress, it seems to me, is one of tremendous responsibility. Our action ought not only to be effectual, but it ought to be timely and final. A mistake now will be fatal. Delays breed danger. We ought to do to-day what it will be too late to do to-morrow. It will not do to receive the rebellious States into full fellowship in the Union now, because they are not fit to come in. It will not do to keep them out, for it is dangerous to keep them out too long. We desire a restored Union. In union there is strength; but in union there is weakness if the parts, like oil and water, will not coalesce. A rope of sand will not hold together. We should aim to do what Mr. Lincoln almost always did, the right thing at the right time, in the right way, and at the right place. It should be our aim as legislators to legislate, not for a part of the country only, but for the whole country, upon principles that will stand the test of time by standing the test of impartiality, of equality, of justice, and righteousness.

And, sir, if this Congress having the power, as I believe it clearly has, by a general law to restore, through harmonious adjustment, the rebellious States, instead of fearlessly and promptly exercising that power, waits for some constitutional amendment which cannot be adopted, or which if adopted is not founded on correct principles, we shall be recreant to our duty, and we shall incur and deserve to incur the reproach of the nation and of mankind.

In discussing the bill which I have had the honor to introduce, I shall not attempt to controvert any of the principles which have been entertained heretofore by either the Republican Union party or the Democratic party so far as the jurisdiction of the States over the question of slavery was concerned under the Constitution of the United States; nor shall I controvert the proposition that the States have the power under the second section of the first article of the Constitution to regulate the qualifications of the electors in the States. I shall attempt to show, on the other hand, that by the amendment to the Constitution abolishing slavery, Congress already has the power by a general law to do all that is proposed to be done by the various amendments which have been submitted to both Houses of Congress. If we shall fail, having that power, to exercise it, then by reason of the long and dangerous delay which will occur, and by reason of the almost criminal omission on the part of Congress to exercise its plain constitutional duty, this Government is in danger of passing into the hands of a party whose action and sympathies have been opposed to the prosecution of the war for the suppression of the rebellion, who voted our glorious war a miserable failure at the expiration of four years of brilliant service, who opposed the proclamation of emancipation, who opposed the amendment abolishing slavery in all the States and Territories in the United States, who to-morrow, if they had the power, would repeat your test oaths, who would pardon Jeff. Davis, who at this very session of Congress are upon the record in opposition to the protection of the rights of the freedmen, and who stand ready now to receive in the Senate and House of Representatives Senators and Representatives-elect fresh from secession State Legislatures and from battle-fields where their hands were imbrued in the blood of our loyal countrymen.

This is the aspect of affairs as it seems to me to-day. There is only one way of salvation for the country. Your amendments to the Constitution of the United States cannot be adopted. If we have not the power now under the Constitution of the United States to secure full freedom, then, sir, we shall not have it, and there is no salvation whatever for the country. Let not freedom die in the house and by the hands of her friends.

Mr. President, the work of reconstructing a Government, of restoring rebellious States to their former condition, is a more difficult work than building up a new Government. The statesmanship which attempts to restore rebellious and shattered States to their former relations to the Government must encounter prejudices growing out of local State governments, State regulations, the conventionalities and usages of society, judicial decisions, the conflicts of Federal and State authority, and all the numerous and divergent opinions of men with regard to the fundamental rights of the citizen and the mode of securing those rights and administering the Government.

The work of our fathers, though one of sublime magnitude, as herculean as it was grand, yet was an exceedingly simple one. Though its fundamental object, to carry out their principles by the machinery of well-adjusted and regulated government, required the picked men of the world, whom God in His kind providence furnished the nation, yet the object they had in view was exceedingly plain, simple, and easy to be understood. What was that object? To establish freedom, to secure equality to all men, to secure the right of the majority to rule; or, to use the language of the present President of the United States, "to secure exact justice to all men; special privileges to none." Who will deny that these were the objects for which the Revolution was fought, and for which the Declaration of Independence was made?

These being the objects of our fathers, I do not deny that when they came to form a Government they encountered an institution which was hostile to the principle which they attempted to establish. I do not deny that in an evil hour of compromise, for the sake of concord among the States and to secure the adoption of the Constitution, they most reluctantly recognized the institution of slavery in the Constitution of the United States, as is proven by the fact that representation was denied to the colored man in the slave States except through the white electors, and the other clause of the Constitution which permitted the forcible arrest of the fugitive slave and his return to his master. But it was from no fault of the principles of our fathers that our national troubles sprang up; it was from a departure from their principles in the respect to which I have alluded. Slavery, which they supposed to be so small an element, which they supposed to be temporary in its character, which they in their hearts believed the States themselves would very soon abolish, grew from a few persons to millions in number, and the institution became so profitable and so cherished that the leaders of the South finally planted themselves upon it as the very basis and corner-stone of society and government. Two systems of government and civil society existed in the country, two systems of labor, both supported by great and powerful interests and energies, warring, jarring, antagonistic, belligerent, each striving for supremacy. Slavery, in fact, through adroit politicians, became the balance of power, and, wielded and for a time shaped and controlled the policy and legislation of the country. Slavery became almost the Government of the country, and no important question could be discussed in the country except by its relative bearing upon the institution of slavery. It doomed to ignorance, prostitution, and crime nearly four million people, appropriated the proceeds of their labor, enforced ignorance upon them by severe penalties against education, and secured obedience by the lash, the revolver, and the bloodhound. The slaveholder, rioting in wealth from the bended back and shrill agonies of the crouching slave, became arrogant and aristocratic, and learned not only to believe in African slavery, but boldly to denounce free society as a failure, and hence the condition of the poor white man of the South became scarcely more tolerable than that of the slaves themselves.

But, sir, I will not follow this history, the fierce, domineering, bullying spirit of slavery in our national Capitol, its attempt to establish itself by force upon Kansas, &c., but simply say that its front became so brazen, and its aims and demands were at such hostile variance with our free institutions, that it became evident that the two systems of freedom and slavery could not exist in the same land. And when Abraham Lincoln, the great emancipator, came before the American people to define and to assert the great proposition that this nation could not remain half slave and half free, when the slaveholders saw that the power was departing from them by the admission into the Union of new free States, when they saw that they could no longer rely upon full coöperation from their northern sympathizers, and a resolute spirit in the northern States to resist the further encroachment of slavery, then they waxed wroth, and in the pride and insolence which the system had engendered they drew the sword and struck at the life of the nation. It was under such circumstances as these that the rebel States raised the banner of revolt, ordained themselves out of the Union, fired upon our flag, and forced us into that self-defensive war which, thank God and our brave Army, resulted in the total extermination of the monster slavery, and planted our flag wherever traitor hands had pulled it down.

What was this war about? "State rights." It was a question whether the Constitution and laws of the United States were to be the supreme law of the land, or whether State sovereignty, as it was termed, was to be the supreme law. It was whether a State, at its mere pleasure and volition, had a right to secede from the Union and to establish a separate and independent government. It was State rights, which we now see resuscitated, creeping up again, and peering out from manifestoes in high quarters, and interpolated, in my humble judgment, without any proper connection, into funeral orations. "State rights," which says if Congress attempts to assert its power Kentucky will go out of the Union. "State rights," which the honorable Senator from Maryland says, if Congress attempts to regulate the qualification of electors in the States, they will claim the right to resist the act even to the point of revolution. Let me here say by way of parenthesis, God forbid we should have any more revolution; but, sir, I am here to say—not in the language of threatening, but speaking for the State which I represent, covered all over with glory as she is, having sent two hundred and fifty thousand of her brave volunteers to the field to put down the late rebellion—should traitor hands again fire on the flag, she is just as ready now as she was then to send five hundred thousand more men to crush out the fell spirit of rebellion and disunion. [Great applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. DOOLITTLE in the chair.) The interruption has been so frequent of late in the gallery that the Chair feels called upon to enforce the order of the Senate and to direct that the galleries be cleared. The Sergeant-at-Arms will clear the gallery on the right of the Chair.

The Sergeant-at-Arms proceeded to execute the orders of the Presiding Officer.

Mr. GUTHRIE. I think the applause was an inadvertence on the part of the galleries, and I would be very glad if the Chair, on reconsideration, would reverse its order. I will almost pledge myself for the galleries that the disturbance will not be repeated.

Mr. HOWARD. I hope so, too.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will submit the question to the Senate whether the order to clear the galleries shall be reversed or not.

The question being put, the order was reversed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understood the suggestion of the Senator from Kentucky to be that the order made by the Chair be reversed with the express understanding that if there is any repetition of the disturbance in the galleries the order will hereafter be strictly enforced.

Mr. GUTHRIE. That is my understanding, and I hope it will never take place again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair, therefore, under the direction of the Senate, will withdraw the order to clear the galleries, with that understanding.

Mr. YATES. Yes, sir, "State rights" is again the bugle note! "State rights," as though one refractory child in a family had the right to control not only all his brothers and sisters, but the father from whom he derived being and support. I had in the simplicity of my heart supposed that "State rights," being the issue of the war, had been decided. I had supposed that we had established the proposition that there is a living Federal Government and a Congress of the United States. I do not mean a consolidated Government, but a central Federal Government which, while it allows the States the exercise of all their appropriate functions as local State governments, can hold the States well poised in their appropriate spheres, can secure the enforcement of the constitutional guarantees of republican government, the rights and immunities of citizens in the several States, and carry out all the objects provided for in the preamble of the Constitution, "provide for the common defense," "promote the general welfare," "establish justice," and "secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and to our posterity."

Is it to be pretended now that we are to leave to thirty-six States the determination of the fundamental question of citizenship? Can it be expected that the local politicians of the States will adjust upon a right basis the relations of the freedmen? Why shall we throw this bone of contention again into the States to breed a new and dangerous agitation? If we leave these questions to an outside power, to the Congress of the United States, who exercises its power according to the Constitution and under the Constitution, even if it confers suffrage upon the freedman, all will submit and rejoice in the end. They are even now prepared to surrender these questions upon the ground of the late conquest of the Government. But if we leave them to the States, then we have no security for the citizen; we cannot have uniformity of legislation; if we give up to the States the power to decide the fundamental question of citizenship upon which the life of the Government depends, then we must expect wrangling and distinctions of classes, which may result in a war quite as bloody and as fatal as that which recently has shrouded our land in the weeds of sorrow.

Let us not commit the fearful error of our fathers by a departure from the organic principles of justice and equal rights, and sow the seeds of a future conflict of races, of future war and permanent disunion.

Mr. President, while I do not agree with all the propositions contained in the able and masterly speech of the Senator from Wisconsin. [Mr. DOOLITTLE,] yet I do agree with him in one proposition, and that is, that these States are not out of the Union. That was what we were fighting about. They appealed to the sword. They threw all they had and all they were into the contest, and they lost, and these States are still in the Union, and by the blessing of Almighty God they shall ever stay in this Union.

But I agree with our late President that this is a most pernicious abstraction. I presume that the difference between gentlemen on this question results from impressions that the legislation of Congress for their reorganization depends upon their status in this regard. It is not so at all. To illustrate: both the Senators from Wisconsin, [Messrs. DOOLIT-

TLE and HOWE,] while they disagree so widely on the question whether the States are in the Union, yet they sufficiently agree on all the questions which we are practically to consider. They both agree upon the proposition that to Congress is left the question of reopening our doors to the admission of Senators and Representatives from the rebel States. They both agree upon the other vital question, that these States are not to be permitted to resume their practical relation with the Union until they by their conduct show that they are willing to give an unfeigned and heartfelt allegiance to the Union, or that they are willing to come into the Union upon terms which shall forever settle this question, and upon such a basis as will prevent the recurrence of another war, and secure, if not indemnity for the past, at least security for the future. But, sir, we can accommodate both of these gentlemen without any trouble whatever. The States are in the Union in law; they are out of the Union in fact. So far as any legislation that we propose to apply to them to preserve our territorial integrity and submission to the laws is concerned, they are in the Union, and yet we may regard the rebellious population as out of the Union for all purposes of representation until they comply with such just requirements as we may impose for securing protection to loyal men and punishment to criminals. The case is anomalous; national self-preservation is the paramount law of our action. We have not treated them either as States in full fellowship, nor entirely as States without government.

It is simply a question of fact whether they are in a condition to be restored to all their rights in the Union or not. Upon that question I am sorry to disagree with my friend from Wisconsin, now in the chair, [Mr. DOOLITTLE,] I have regarded him as a statesman; I still so regard him; and since my acquaintance with him I have feelings for him warmer than admiration. But I cannot account for the delusion—I will take back that term, and say that he is vastly and lamentably at fault when he is willing to open our doors wide to the readmission of the rebellious States into full fellowship into the Union with their present hostile feelings to the United States without further guarantees on their part or protective legislation upon our part. Why, sir, look at the facts that boldly and defiantly stand out upon the record of southern disloyalty, and stare us like ghastly specters in the face. We see the Governor of Alabama appointing two rebel Senators judges of the supreme court but recently. We know that the only passport to southern office, to the Legislature and to Congress, is fidelity in the rebel army and in the rebel cause. We know there is a bitter and unrelenting hostility toward the freedmen who have been emancipated by the constitutional amendment, as is proven by the orders of General Terry in Virginia, General Sickles in South Carolina, General Thomas in Mississippi, and by the general order of General Grant, interposing the strong arm of military authority to prohibit oppressive discriminations against the freedmen in those States. They are as defiant in their dangerous dogma of State sovereignty as when the war began. They are clamoring for the payment of the rebel debt. They are opposing the payment of the debt incurred by the United States. They are demanding compensation for their slaves. They treat our test oath as a nullity. They jeer our glorious flag. They caricature our institutions in their theaters and public assemblages; and in their hearts they curse the day they were made to submit to the authority of the Union.

Mr. President, does that honorable Senator propose that these States shall be received into this Union, that the rebels shall be allowed to go to the polls and exercise the right of suffrage, while the loyal men who have bared their breasts to the storm of battle in obedience to the call of Abraham Lincoln, and with his promise that they should be maintained in their freedom —yes, “maintained,” that’s the word—while they are disfranchised? While the tragedies of the cruel war, traitorously provoked, are fresh in our memories and the blood of our countrymen cries to us from the ground, is my friend from Wisconsin willing to turn over the government of those States to secessionists and rebels, to the virtual exclusion and disfranchisement of the brave Union men who have borne aloft our flag amid the storm and thunder of battle? Sir, until that promise of Abraham Lincoln is redeemed, that the freedmen shall be “maintained in their freedom,” is made good to those men who wore the United States uniform, those men who rallied under the glorious folds of our old flag by the side of our brave boys and mingled their warm blood in the same current with theirs upon many a gory battle-field; those men who flashed two hundred thousand bayonets in the face of Jefferson Davis and traitors, I will never consent that those States be received into full brotherhood in the Union. They shall be vouchsafed at least every right which the rebels themselves shall enjoy.

And I appeal to you, Mr. President, I appeal to Senators, by the bloody memories of the war; by the tears of the soldier’s widow and the soldier’s orphan boy; by the sufferings and miseries and death of those brave men who in obedience to God went forth to fight the battles of the country, and whose bones now lie in unmarked graves upon southern soil; by the grand solemnities which surround the murder and memory of Abraham Lincoln; by the love we bear our country, for which they fought and fell; and by all our hopes for lasting peace and permanent Union, that now, having the power, we will plant the pillars of the Government upon the granite foundations of God’s eternal justice and upon the undying principles of individual and universal human liberty.

While I speak thus, I say to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. DOOLITTLE] that I will be as prompt as he whenever they by their conduct evince the proper spirit; whenever they show that they renounce their old ideas of allegiance to the South alone, and will give unfeigned, heartfelt allegiance to the Government, and will present to us constitutions republican in form and laws equal and impartial to all, I will join that Senator and hail the auspicious day when as of yore, on the land and the sea, and over all the States reunited, high over all, shall float the star-spangled banner.

Sir, there is one basis upon which these difficulties can be settled, and only one, and that is to return to the fundamental principles which were aimed to be established by our fathers, and to give rights to those men whom in an evil hour they most reluctantly disfranchised. Vain is the hope of the statesman, however high he may be, who expects that we can settle these questions upon any other basis than upon the basis of the principles laid down in the Declaration of Independence. If this Congress does not adopt it, the next Congress will. There is (I say it with deference in this great presence) only one salvation. If you do not seize the splendid opportunity, the next Congress will. All your amendments must fail. They lack the motive power. They are like a watch with all its machinery beautifully adapted, but without the mainspring. They are without the motive power, that living element of republican Governments, the popular will; and without that they cannot be adopted. Is it reasonable to suppose that even all the free States will adopt the amendment which has been reported by the honorable chairman of the committee on reconstruction? I simply submit the proposition, and know the answer of every gentleman. Is it reasonable to suppose that the slave States will either consent to curtail their representation one half, or that they will confer the right of franchise upon the freedmen? And in the mean time are we to keep up a standing army or Freedmen’s Bureau, with thousands of officials, to hold them in subjection to the Government? I do not say now that I may or may not vote for any of these amendments. It is not material to my proposition whether I do or not. I may vote for them in view of the one thousandth chance that they may pass. I consider the whole of them imperfect, and as postponing the period of restoration to a day far too remote for the future security and peace of the country. It is entirely immaterial so far as the position I take is concerned, for I contend that Congress has the power now as fully and as completely in every respect as it could be given to them by any amendment to the Constitution, by general law, under the recent amendment, to secure the reorganization of the Government upon the basis of justice and equality.

I believe it was the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] who said that he did not expect to wait until there was a change of heart in the southern people. I agree with him, and more than that, I say that if we wait until the southern people shall learn to love the Yankees and to hate slavery and to love the Government by whose strong arm and chastening rod they have been whipped into obedience, the time will be long, and I fear so far in the future that in the meantime our long and dangerous delay and our omission to use the power we already clearly have might result in a calamitous change of parties and in the restoration of the rebellious States in a condition quite as objectionable as when they first rebelled with all the chances and probabilities of a future war and final separation.

I hope that Congress will not attempt the impossible task of making the South love the Union, but what I do hope, and what is reasonable to hope, is that we shall remove forever the causes which have divided us, and settle all differences upon principles which will prevent any cause of quarrel or division in the future, and lay the foundation for perpetual peace and union, and which can only be done upon the principle of equality to all, and removing all distinctions of class, race, color, or any previous condition growing out of the institution of slavery.

Sir, by the bill which I presented I nail the colors of universal suffrage to the masthead—not in South Carolina or Georgia or Kentucky, but I meet the vital issue of the hour, and proclaim that under the Constitution as amended it is not only our right but our duty to extend the suffrage to every American citizen in every State, and to all the country subject to the jurisdiction of the United States.

I also wish, by way of prelude to my argument, to remark that the questions at issue are fundamental; they are organic, and we can arrive at no correct conclusions without investigating all the rights—natural, civil, and political—to which every American citizen is entitled.

It involves the settlement of several questions.

What is slavery?

What is freedom?

Who is a citizen?

Who makes, or how does a person become a citizen?

What are the rights of a citizen?

How are the rights of a citizen secured to him?

These questions are asked not in reference to citizenship in some foreign Government, not in reference to the common law, but in reference to the United States of America, where we have founded a Government upon the basis of equal laws and universal liberty. All these questions I shall not answer in detail, but all will be embraced in the positions I shall assume. I will only remark generally that in the United States, on account of the democratic features thereof, all the terms I have used have a distinctive national meaning, applicable to our nation alone. For instance, Webster, in giving the various definitions to the word “citizen,” defines that in the United States a citizen means “a person, native or naturalized, who has the privilege of exercising the elective franchise, or the qualifications which enable him to vote for others and to purchase and hold real estate.” While I admit that in law others than voters may be citizens, in this country no man considers himself a full citizen till he has the right to vote. The minor does not consider himself free, “his own man,” until he can vote. So of the foreigner; and by universal consent the ballot is recognized as the badge of the American citizen.

Since I introduced my bill, the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] has introduced a bill in which he founds the right to secure universal suffrage to all freemen in the rebellious States upon that clause of the Constitution which “guaranties to every State a republican government,” and I understand him to found his argument upon the idea that before the adoption of the amendment to the Constitution, Congress had power to enforce the provisions of that guarantee in every State in the Union. I am sorry to disagree with the honorable gentleman, for the reason I have already stated, that under the late Constitution of the United States, as I understand it, our fathers in an evil hour compromised, and recognized the existence of slavery, and that under a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States it was decided that a man who was a slave, or who was the descendant of a slave, or who was liable to be bought and sold, or who was excluded from the society of our fathers at the time the Constitution was adopted, was not a citizen, and therefore under that decision the States had the power to exclude black persons from the exercise of the right of suffrage. The Senator from Massachusetts is right, however, in presenting that clause as part of his argument, because under the amendment abolishing slavery no State constitution can be republican in form which disfranchises any citizen of the United States. The bill of the distinguished Senator is objectionable because it is partial and operates only upon the rebellious States.

All, however, turns upon the simple proposition contained in the bill which I have offered, the guarantee to all citizens of their rights under the recent amendment to the Constitution.

Then, sir, I come to the only proposition which is feasible, and which, if not adopted by this Congress, will be by the next. I say this with deference to others.

The recent amendment abolishes slavery in all the States and Territories of the United States; not in South Carolina or Georgia alone, but in Illinois and every other State, and by that amendment, as I understand the distinguished Senator from Kentucky [Mr. GERRARD] to admit—and I honor and thank him for the admission—all constitutions, laws, and civil regulations in support of slavery as a matter of course fall to the ground. Congress by this amendment attempted, what? It undertook to secure freedom to four millions of our people who had formerly been in bondage; and how? It has been asked, if slavery is already abolished and all laws and institutions growing out of slavery fall to the ground, why pass a law by Congress to enforce that provision of the Constitution? I will tell you why. Because a law is necessary by the very terms of the second clause of the amendment to give effect and operation to the clause abolishing slavery. “Congress shall have power,” to do what? “To enforce;” enforce what? Enforce the foregoing clause of the Constitution abolishing slavery. How shall it enforce it? By legislation. What sort of legislation? By “appropriate legislation.” How “appropriate?” By legislation appropriate to the end in view. What is the end in view? It is the freedom of these four million human beings, who have been emancipated into the people of the United States. My distinguished colleague asked the question, is it possible that we will set four million human beings free in the United States and will not guaranty to them the protection of their civil rights? I extend the question, and I ask, shall we set four million human beings free in the United States and not extend to them their political rights? But it is said the right to vote is a mere political right. At the hazard of being a little tedious I shall attempt to show that civil and political rights, according to the construction of the courts, are entirely synonymous. Wendell's Blackstone, volume one, page 123, says:

39TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Apportionment of Representation—Mr. Yates.

SENATE.

"And, therefore, the principal view of human law is, or ought always to be, to explain, protect, and enforce such rights as are absolute, which in themselves are few and simple; and then such rights as are relative, which arising from a variety of connections will be far more numerous and more complicated."

Does any Senator on this floor say that there is not the same duty to secure the relative or political rights to the citizen that there is to secure him in the enjoyment of his natural rights? The reason why it is made the first duty to secure to a man his natural rights is because they are first simply in order. First, natural rights from the necessity of the case, and then the relative rights, which are more numerous, are to be secured; not that one is more important than the other, no more than in the orders of the Senate petitions are to be considered as more important than the consideration of bills because they are first introduced. They are alike equally important, and it is as much the duty of the Government to secure the political rights as it is the civil rights. On page 125, Blackstone says:

"But every man when he enters into society gives up a part of his natural liberty as the part of so valuable a purchase, and in consideration of receiving the advantages of mutual commerce, obliges himself to conform to those laws which the community has thought proper to establish."

What is a civil right? It is such a limitation or extension of the natural right as is conferred by statute. That makes it a civil regulation; that makes it a civil law; that makes it a civil right. For instance, every man in a state of nature has a right to acquire, hold, and dispose of property, but when the Legislature interposes and by law says that he shall convey it by deed, or that the first deed recorded shall be evidence of title, that is a civil regulation.

Now, let me ask you whether in a state of nature, when men have organized themselves into a community, is it not the natural right of every man to have a voice in the affairs of that community? Is not that a natural right? If he confers that right upon representatives or upon somebody else to administer, and a law is passed declaring that he shall give expression to that voice by the ballot, then it becomes both a civil and political regulation at the same time. Sir, go back to the days of our colonial history, and in all our colonial assemblages, where our forefathers met to discuss the affairs pertaining to the colonies; where they fired their hearts for the great Revolution in which they were soon to be engaged, how did they decide all matters of controversy? By a show of hands. Each man raising his hand voted whether or not the measure for taxation or for public improvement or for educational purposes or for any other purpose should be adopted. When it is proposed that he shall exercise that voice by a statutory provision establishing a ballot, does it become any less a natural right? Is it any less a civil right? It is a natural, civil, and political right.

But again, to show that this is a distinction without a difference, I refer you to Blackstone, on the same page, wherein he says:

"Political, therefore, or civil liberty, which is that of a member of society, is no other than natural liberty so far restrained by human laws (and no further) as is necessary and expedient for the general advantage of the public."

The meaning of that is, that civil and political liberty are synonymous terms. Blackstone applies the same definition to both. I hope I shall be pardoned, now if I refer to a decision of the Supreme Court which is conclusive upon that point. I quote from Judge Daniels, one of the assenting judges in the Dred Scott decision. He says in 19 Howard, page 476:

"Hence it follows necessarily, that a slave, the peculium or property of a master, and possessing within himself no civil nor political rights or capacities, cannot be a citizen. For who, it may be asked, is a citizen? What do the character and status of citizen import? Without fear of contradiction, it does not import the condition of being private property, the subject of individual power and ownership. Upon a principle of etymology alone, the term citizen, as derived from civitas, conveys the ideas of connection or identification with the State or Government, and a participation of its functions. But beyond this, there is not, it is believed, to be found, in the theories of writers on government or in any actual experiment heretofore tried, an exposition of the term citizen which has not been understood as conferring the actual possession and enjoyment or the perfect right of acquisition and enjoyment of an entire equality of privileges, civil and political."

He declares it to be not only his own opinion, but that it is the universal opinion of all legal writers upon the question, that by the term citizen is meant one who is entitled to both civil and political rights.

The object of the constitutional amendment was to secure freedom to the slave and to those who have suffered from the institution of slavery. It will not be pretended that Congress ever meant to set four million slaves free, to emancipate them into freedom, and at the same time leave them without the civil and political rights which attach to the free citizen. And hence, sir, the Senate at this session have passed the bill introduced by my colleague [Mr. TRUMBULL] to protect all persons in the United States in their civil rights, and also to provide courts and laws with adequate penalties for the violation of those rights. It provides that "the inhabitants, of every race and color, without any regard to the previous condition of slavery," shall have the same "right to make and enforce contracts, to sue and be parties and give evidence, to inherit, purchase, lease, sell, hold, and convey real and personal property; and to full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings for the security of person and property." Here, sir, I contend, we have fully established the principle, and upon the same principle have full right and constitutional power to pass the bill which I have proposed, protecting the inhabitants, of every race and color, without regard to any previous condition of slavery, in all their civil and political rights, including the right of suffrage.

The Dred Scott decision is referred to, to show that the negroes are not citizens; but that decision was made under the Constitution of the United States before this amendment was adopted. That decision, overturning, as it did, the whole line of judicial authority, and abhorrent to the civilization and Christianity of the age in which we live, went so far as to say that the negro at the period of the adoption of the Constitution had no rights which a white man was bound to respect, and to lay down the doctrine that slavery could go into all the Territories of the United States, independent of popular sovereignty, of the will of the people, or of the Constitution of the United States. But, sir, that decision is wiped out; it has gone down to a kindred doom with the institution which it was intended it should perpetuate; and I now quote from the decision itself to show that under the existing state of affairs, under the constitutional amendment, the freedmen are citizens by the irresistible deductions and inferences from the Dred Scott decision itself. In the celebrated case of Dred Scott vs. Sanford, which is reported in 19 Howard, page 404, is the following language; I read from the opinion of Chief Justice Taney:

"The words, 'people of the United States' and 'citizens' are synonymous terms and mean the same thing. They both describe the political body, who, according to our republican institutions, form the sovereignty, and who hold the power and conduct the Government through their representatives. They are what we familiarly call the 'sovereign people,' and every citizen is one of this people and are constituent members of this sovereignty."

Now, sir, if that was the case, why was Dred Scott not a citizen? We shall find out. The decision then proceeds to state why negroes were not included as a portion of the people and constituent members of the sovereignty:

"Because they were at that time considered as a subordinate and inferior class of beings who had been subjugated by the dominant race, and whether emancipated or not, yet remained subject to their authority, and had no right or privileges but such as those who held the power and the Government might choose to grant them."

Is not the inference irresistible that if by any subsequent amendment of the Constitution they became a part of the people, they would be citizens and entitled to the same rights and privileges with all the other citizens of the United States? The decision goes on to quote the words of the Declaration of Independence: "We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal," &c. The Chief Justice then proceeds to comment on that clause, as follows:

"The general words above quoted would seem to embrace the whole human family, and if they were used in a similar instrument at this day would be so understood. But it is too clear for dispute that the enslaved African race were not intended to be included, and formed no part of the people who framed and adopted this Declaration; for if the language, as understood at that day, would embrace them, the conduct of the distinguished men who framed the Declaration of Independence would have been utterly and flagrantly inconsistent with the principles they asserted; and instead of the sympathy of mankind, to which they so confidently appealed, they would have deserved and received universal rebuke and reprobation."

And now what shall be said of us at this day, when they are clearly included in the terms of the Constitution, and by special clauses therein are made free people, if we fail to carry out the full spirit and fair interpretation of the Constitution of the United States with regard to this long oppressed race of our fellow-citizens? Will we not be utterly and flagrantly inconsistent if now, by the very terms of the Constitution, we are required to treat them as people and as citizens, and we fail to do so?

Mr. SAULSBURY. While the honorable Senator is on this point, will he allow me to put a question to him?

Mr. YATES. Certainly.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Under the registering law of the State of Maryland more than one half of the former voters of that State are excluded from the right of suffrage, although they have never been convicted of any crime. Many of the most prominent citizens of the State, who have never been convicted of crime, or suspected by any fair-minded man of having been guilty of crime, are excluded from the right of voting. Are those men, more than one half the former voters of the State, who are now excluded from voting in that State, citizens, or are they not?

Mr. YATES. I will answer that question in the course of my remarks, and will only make the statement now, that neither any State in this Union, nor the Congress of the United States, has power under the Constitution or under the decision of the Supreme Court to deprive a citizen of the prerogative of the elective franchise. That is the position I assume. I have but just now read from the decision of the Supreme Court, by Chief Justice Taney himself, to show that the "people" of the United States were the "citizens" of the United States. Who made the Constitution of the United States? "We the people" "do ordain and establish this Constitution." Did the Constitution make the people of the United States? No, sir. The moment a man is a freeman, by any law, by any constitution in the United States, that man becomes one of the body-politic. He passes into the body of the sovereignty, as it is termed by the decision of the Supreme Court. He is one of the people. He is one of the citizens of the United States of America; and as I shall presently show, no State, nor Congress, except by constitutional amendment, has any right whatever to deprive a citizen entirely of the right of suffrage.

SENATE.

Apportionment of Representation—Mr. Yates.

39TH CONG... 1ST SESS.

I will read further from the same decision. This decision goes on to say, on page 426 of the same volume:

"No one, we presume, supposes that any change in public opinion or feeling in relation to this unfortunate race, in the civilized nations of Europe or in this country, should induce the court to give to the words of the Constitution a more liberal construction in their favor than they were intended to bear when the instrument was framed and adopted."

"If any of its provisions are deemed unjust, there is a mode prescribed in the instrument itself by which it may be amended, but while it remains unaltered, it must be construed now as it was understood at the time of its adoption."

But it has been altered; the negro is no longer regarded as a slave or belonging to a subject race, but as the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. JOHNSON,] even, admits, he is a man, and susceptible of the highest cultivation.

It is in the light of this new estimate of the freedman that we are to consider the provisions for his emancipation now in the Constitution, and to confer upon him the full and equal enjoyment of all his rights. Sir, I do not believe our fathers had any such low estimate as was attributed to them in that decision, but that they did most reluctantly compromise for reasons before stated. I vindicate them from the black stain implied by any construction which would go to show that they meant "all men" except the negro "are created equal."

I said, I did not believe the framers of the Declaration meant to exclude any particular class or race of men, when they declared all men equal. Sir, facts are stubborn things, and no logic, not even of the most astute and profound lawyer, can destroy the force of any important fact. It is a stern, stubborn, historical fact that at the time of the adoption of the Constitution the freedmen, inhabitants of the States of New Hampshire, Massachusetts, New York, New Jersey, and North Carolina, were not only citizens of those States but possessed the franchise of electors on equal terms with the other citizens, and, sir, were not only included in the body of the people of the United States by whom the Constitution was made, but voted on the question of its adoption. Is it not strange that the framers meant to say that they were not included in the Declaration of Independence who were suffered to vote whether or not the Constitution should be ordained and established?

There is another stubborn fact which goes to show that the fathers did not design to make the distinction in favor of white men only, and that fact is this, that while the Articles of Confederation were under the consideration of Congress, on the 23d June, 1778, the delegates from South Carolina moved to amend the fourth of the fundamental Articles of the Confederation, which reads as follows:

"The free inhabitants of each of these States, paupers, vagabonds, and fugitives from justice excepted, shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of the free citizens of the several States."

They moved to amend this fourth article by inserting after the word "free," and before the word "inhabitants," the word "white;" so that the privileges and immunities of general citizenship would be secured only to white persons. Only two States voted for it, while eight voted against it, and the vote of one State was divided, and the language of the article remained unchanged and went into the Constitution of the United States without any restriction to white persons.

But whether or not the fathers meant to exclude free colored persons, the decision in the Dred Scott case was made under the Constitution before the recent amendment, and the court, in the following emphatic language, leaves the inference irresistible that the decision would be different in case of an amendment of that instrument.

I quote from 19 Howard, page 426:

"No one, we presume, supposes that any change in public opinion or feeling in relation to this unfortunate race in the civilized nations of Europe, or in this country, should induce the court to give to the words of the Constitution a more liberal construction in their favor than they were intended to bear when the instrument was framed and adopted."

"If any of its provisions are deemed unjust, there is a mode prescribed in the instrument itself by which it may be amended; but while it remains unaltered, it must be construed now as it was understood at the time of its adoption."

The meaning of this, sir, was that a slave or a descendant of a slave could not be a citizen under the Constitution as originally adopted, and that it must be so construed until the Constitution is altered. It has been altered, and conforms to public opinion of the present day, which demands the recognition of the manhood of the negro.

And there is not a word in that whole decision which, under the Constitution as altered, does not go to support the proposition that the freedman, under the amendment, stands upon the same footing of civil and political equality with the white man; subject to the same statutory disabilities, and entitled to all the rights and privileges of the white man.

Now, sir, I come to the point to which the Senator from Delaware has referred, and according to the decision relied upon especially by that Senator, the decision in the Dred Scott case, I here take the position that Congress has no power to make a citizen, except to naturalize a foreigner, or to make him a citizen by naturalization; nor has a State any such right.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Had the State of Maryland the right to enact that law? That is my question.

Mr. YATES. The State of Maryland cannot exclude any man in the United States who has in himself the inherent rights, the God-given rights of manhood and freedom. Maryland cannot do it, and Illinois cannot do it, and all the power of the Congress of the United States cannot do it, except by an amendment to the Constitution conferring upon Congress that power.

I refer next to the same decision upon the question of the rights of citizens in the several States. I admit that according to this decision every State had a right to exclude an African citizen, and the constitution of that State or the law of that State was not anti-republican in its form; but when a man becomes a citizen of the United States he cannot be excluded by any State. I read from the same decision, page 423 of the same volume, where you will see that Chief Justice Taney was trying to show that all these State laws would be unconstitutional if the negro was a citizen, that he could come into the State in spite of the power of the constitution of the State and claim the rights of a citizen, and the Chief Justice goes on to show what would be the consequences of such a construction:

"If persons of the African race are citizens of a State and of the United States they would be entitled to all of these privileges and immunities in every State, and the State could not restrict them; for they would hold these privileges and immunities under the paramount authority of the Federal Government, and its courts would be bound to enforce them, the constitution and laws of the State to the contrary notwithstanding. And if the States could limit or restrict them, or place the party in an inferior grade, this clause of the Constitution would be unmeaning, and could have no operation, and would give no rights to the citizen when in another State. He would have none but what the State itself chose to allow him. This is evidently not the construction or meaning of the clause in question. It guarantees rights to the citizen, and the State cannot withhold them."

If the Senator from Maine [Mr. FESSENDEN] were now in his seat I would show him where the penalty is for such a law as I propose. Whenever a law in any State is unconstitutional the courts are bound to enforce the Constitution. There is the penalty. We can receive them or not receive their members-elect of Congress or members of the State Legislature. There is penalty again. And now, if such legislation is not absolutely necessary, yet it is highly expedient that at least a declaratory law should be passed so that uniform construction and uniform obedience and submission to the Constitution may be secured from all the States.

Now, sir, I come to the other proposition, and it is equally clear, that neither Congress nor a State make a citizen, except that Congress may naturalize foreigners, and is founded on good sense and reason. I read now from page 419, Chief Justice Taney's decision:

"The Constitution upon its adoption obviously took from the States all power by any subsequent legislation to introduce as a citizen into the political family of the United States any one, no matter where he was born, or what might be his character or condition; and it gave to Congress the power to confer this character upon those only who were born outside of the dominions of the United States."

The decision goes on to say that therefore no law of Congress or of any State can deprive a citizen of his rights.

Sir, there was one view upon which this decision did deprive the freedman of the right to vote. What was that? It was upon the same view that a woman is deprived of the right to vote. What was that? Because he could not come to the support of and defend the Government; and I have the decision of the Supreme Court here, which is irresistible on that point. If a man can come to the support and defense of the Government, he is necessarily one of the body-politic and one of the people of the United States. I dwell upon these points at some length knowing that they are tedious, but I am making them not only for the Senate but for the country, for it is the reflex influence of our great constituency on Congress to which I look for the passage of the bill I propose. In the same volume, page 415, the Chief Justice cites the case of New Hampshire to show that the negroes were not citizens under the Constitution of the United States, and gives as a reason that they were not enrolled in the militia of the United States. Let us see what he says:

"The alien is excluded, because, being born in a foreign country, he cannot be a member of the community until he is naturalized; but why are the African race, born in the State, not permitted to share in one of the highest duties of the citizen? The answer is obvious. He is not, by the institutions and laws of the State, numbered among its people. He forms no part of the sovereignty of the State, and is not therefore called on to uphold and defend it."

The moment the United States of America permitted the name of the freedman to be enrolled on that list of immortal names who bore the banner of the Republic in triumph, and planted its victorious folds upon the battlements of the enemy, this Government, by the proclamation of Abraham Lincoln, declaring that his freedom should be maintained, and by its pledge made to the civilized world, said that he should be not only a citizen in war but a citizen in peace. I know that we are met on every hand by the argument that women are excluded from the right of suffrage. The answer to that is very easy and very plain. I am not proposing to amend the Constitution of the United States; and there is no power in the Constitution to confer the right of suffrage upon a woman. According to the spirit of the decision to which I have referred, and by the universal consent of mankind, she is not a part of the body-politic so as to exercise the right of suffrage. Now, if these gallant gentlemen are so anxious to confer suffrage on the ladies, and have them mingle in the broils of parties and elections, let them bring in an amendment, and I am not sure that I will not vote for it.

When it is asked why may she not vote since she is often a tax-payer, I answer that there are restrictions which are inevitable. Minority is such a restriction. Woman is excluded by the inevitable proprieties of the case. The ballot is in politics what the bayonet is in war. Those only who wield the sword are, by the universal consent of both ancient and modern civilization, supposed capable of wielding the ballot. We should most certainly violate the proprieties of humanity were we to compel the softer sex to take part in the bloody work of physical warfare. And yet, sir, to thrust woman into the arena of political strife is quite as abhorrent, and would be quite as destructive of her womanly qualities, as to compel her to take part in the shock of arms.

39TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Apportionment of Representation—Mr. Yates.

SENATE.

The only exception to the rule of ancient times, that woman should not bear arms, is to be found in traditions regarding the Amazons. They are represented a very warlike race of women as having deprived themselves of the right breast, that they might be the better able to wield the weapons of warfare. Would my friend from Missouri [Mr. HENDERSON] permit such an act of barbarity in the case of the elegant and majestic ladies of his State, so remarkable for their beauty and so irresistible in the fascination of their womanly charms? I know what his answer would be. Well, would he do what is worse, have her do morally what the Amazons did physically, by thrusting her into the strifes and stern conflicts of politics and elections, part with those softer, more delicate, more lovable qualities, which constitute her the ornament of society, and which, as Edmund Burke says, "inspire in man the highest and noblest passions of human life?" I am not proposing to amend the Constitution of the United States. If any of the gentlemen who propose to amend the Constitution wish to display their gallantry, let them propose to amend it in this respect. There are some reasons which are applicable to them which are not applicable to the male portion of the people. They do not bear all the burdens of the Government; do not work the roads; they do not fight in the Army.

I come, then, to the question, how is a citizen of the United States made? How does a man become a citizen of the United States? Those who were citizens of the United States at the adoption of the Constitution were the people. "We, the people, do ordain and establish this Constitution." The words "people" and "citizen" are synonymous, as I have shown. Now, sir, I show that by the amendment to the Constitution of the United States the former slave has become a freeman; his disability is removed; he is no longer one of a subject race; he cannot be bought and sold; he steps from his condition of slavery into the family of freedom, becomes one of the body-politic, and is one of the sovereign people. And, sir, if no State can make him a citizen, and if the Congress of the United States cannot make him a citizen, except through an alteration of the Constitution so as to confer upon Congress the power, then he never can be a citizen except through the operation of the recent amendment, and he and his descendants forever must be deprived of this great right of franchise. Sir, they are citizens, or they are slaves. They are subjects, or they are sovereigns. This is exclusively a white man's Government, or it is a Government for all men.

What, then, is the objection to passing the bill for which I contend? It is evident that you cannot confer freedom upon the slave without exercising your power under the Constitution. If you go before the people with constitutional amendments they will be voted down in the slave States and in some of the free States. The result will be that the people, determined to do justice to this class of men, will find the power where it properly belongs, in the constitutional amendment securing to them freedom, and in the subsequent clause which makes it the duty of Congress to enforce by appropriate legislation the prohibition of slavery and to secure full freedom, civil and political, to all citizens.

Why will we not manfully meet the issue, and exercise the power we already have, and by a general law of Congress enforce the provision of the Constitution in all the States alike—in Illinois and Tennessee, in Maine and in South Carolina? I deny the conclusion of the Senator from Missouri that there is reason to believe the Supreme Court, even under the hard ruling of the Dred Scott case, would decide the law unconstitutional.

What court, after the Dred Scott decision, will again incur the infamy of all history by such a decision as this would be against justice and the enlightened convictions of the wise and good everywhere?

I know what the politician's objection is. The politician's objection is, "Why take this out of the hands of the people of the States?" Sir, we do not take it out of the hands of the people of the States. The people of the States have by the Constitution conferred the power upon us; they have placed the responsibility upon us; and they will brand us with moral cowardice if, waiting to pass amendments which never can be adopted, we fail to exercise the power which we clearly have.

I like the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. HENDERSON,] but it can never be adopted. But I am opposed to it because we have already the power in the Constitution to do the same thing. Is there any statesman here who dares rise in his place and say that we have the right to secure to the freedman all his civil rights, to give him the right to enforce contracts, to testify and be a party to suits, to acquire, hold, and dispose of property, but cannot secure him in his most essential right, the right by which he protects himself in the enjoyment of all his civil rights, of his person, of his family, his life, and his reputation? I say, sir, that you cannot abolish slavery, you cannot secure freedom to the slave unless, by appropriate legislation, you pass a bill to give him that freedom in all the States and Territories of the United States.

Sir, let gentlemen come forward and meet the issue like men. Let them come forward and do what they have by the Constitution the clear power to do, and that is a sine qua non in order to carry into effect the constitutional prohibition of slavery. As for me, I would rather face the music and meet the responsibility like a man and send to the people of the State of Illinois the boon of universal suffrage and of a full and complete emancipation than meet the taunt of northern demagogues that I would force suffrage upon North Carolina and Tennessee and Delaware while I had not the courage to prescribe it for our own free States. Sir, it will be the crime of the century if now, having the power, as we clearly have, we lack the nerve to do the work that is given us to do.

Let me say to my Republican friends, you are too late. You have gone too far to recede now. Four million people, one seventh of your whole population, you have set free. Will you start back appalled at the enchantment your own wand has called up? The sequences of your own teachings are upon you. As for me, I start not back appalled when universal suffrage confronts me. When the bloody ghost of slavery rises, I say, "Shake your gory locks at me; I did it." I accept the situation. I fight not against the logic of events or the decrees of Providence. I expected it, sir, and I meet it half way. I am for universal suffrage. I bid it "all hail!" "all hail!"

Four million people set free! What will protect them? The ballot. What alone will give us a peaceful and harmonious South? The ballot to all. What will quench the fires of discord, give us back all the States, a restored Union, and make us one people? The ballot, and that alone. Is there no other way? None other under the sun. There is no other salvation.

Senators, go to the country with it. Write it upon the sky. Inscribe it upon your banners, and hang them on the outer walls. It is the flaming symbol of victory. Sir, tell me not that "the people will vote us down on this proposition." Address that argument to cowards. "With the free and the brave it avails nothing." You give the white rebel the right to tax the loyal freedman, and to impose whatever burdens he pleases upon him, and you call that freedom.

Liberty without equality is no boon. Talk not to me of civil without political emancipation! It is the technical pleading of the lawyer: it is not the enlarged view of the statesman. If a man has no vote for the men and the measures which tax himself, his family and his property and all which determine his reputation, that man is still a slave. You say that the citizen may have all his rights, to testify in courts, to enforce contracts, to acquire and dispose of property; but he shall not have his most essential right, the right to vote, because, you say, the right to vote is not a natural or a civil right, but a political right. Suppose that is true: what of it? It is a distinction without a difference. It is a special plea, and too narrow for statesmanship. The only way to give effect to your constitutional amendment—the only practical way—is to exercise the power which you have to secure every right, natural, civil, political, to all the people.

I here positively deny that we can give effect to the constitutional amendment giving freedom to the slave, and yet debar him of the only weapon with which he can protect himself in that freedom. Emancipation, in the light of our Government, means not only the breaking of the chains of slavery, not only destroying the status of the slave, but it means conferring upon him every right which every American citizen enjoys. The legislation which secures the ballot is the only "appropriate" legislation. Your Freedmen's Bureaus are well enough as a temporary measure; but if you will give the freedman the ballot, he needs no such law. Give him equality in fact, the law will follow. The laws as they are for all other persons will be all he needs. Give him the ballot, and he will become an identified element in society, and the politicians who now jeer and deride him, who point to his infirmities, will pander to him, and he will become self-sustaining.

Sir, the ballot will finish the negro question; it will settle everything connected with this question. Give the freedman the ballot, and we need no Freedmen's Bureau, we need no military régime, we need no vast expenditures, we need no standing army. The ballot will be his standing army. The ballot is the cheap and impregnable fortress of liberty. I may be pardoned for quoting the oft-quoted stanza:

"There is a weapon surer yet
And better than the bayonet:
A weapon that comes down as still
As snow-flakes fall upon the sod,
And executes a freeman's will
As lightning does the will of God;
A weapon that no bolts nor locks
Can bar—it is the ballot-box."

The ballot will lead the freedman over the Red sea of our troubles. It will be the brazen serpent, upon which he can look and live. It will be his pillar of cloud by day and his pillar of fire by night. It will lead him to Pisgah's shining height, and across Jordan's stormy waves, to Canaan's fair and happy land. Sir, the ballot is the freedman's Moses. So far as man is concerned, I might say that Mr. Lincoln was the Moses of the freedman; but whoever shall be the truest friend of human freedom, whoever shall write his name highest upon the horizon of public vision as the friend of human liberty, that man—and I hope it may be the present President of the United States—will be the Joshua to lead the people into the land of deliverance.

Mr. President, there is one clause of the Constitution which I confess, when I commenced examining the Constitution to find this power in favor of equality, seemed to me an objection to the exercise of power which I have proposed, and that is this clause in section two, article one:

"The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature."

If there was any force in that provision of the Constitution before the present amendment was adopted, there is none now. If the States could exclude an elector or any citizen from the right of suffrage before the adoption of the amendment, they cannot do so now, and why? Because the amendment being the last clause inserted in the Constitution, repeals every former clause in conflict with it. It is the subsequent organic act of the people, and by the adoption of this amendment every freedman becomes one of the people, a citizen of the United States, and no Legislature has any power to disfranchise him. It has the right to regulate the qualifications of whom? Of electors; of those men who have a right to vote; of those men who do vote. It can restrict them by certain limitations and qualifications. But does the word "regulate" imply a power to destroy, or does it mean to preserve? The word "regulate" means to make rules. Its derivation is from the Latin word regula, a rule. It is to prescribe qualifications for the citizens, for those who are entitled to vote, but there is no power whatever to destroy the rights of a citizen or to disfranchise a citizen; and though the freedman might have been disfranchised before the amendment, because not then a citizen, he is now a citizen by the operation of the amendment, and there is no power in the State to disfranchise him.

Mr. Clay, when he contended that Congress, under the power in the Constitution "to regulate commerce" among the several States, "had the right and the power to build up commerce, to establish lines of steamers between this country and foreign countries, and to build railroads between the several States," never claimed that under that power "to regulate commerce" Congress had a right to destroy commerce. And there was one universal opinion among the Democratic party that the word "regulate" simply meant to prescribe the rules and regulations by which commerce already in existence should be carried on. This clause means that the States shall determine, not who shall vote, but when, how, and where the electors shall vote, and that it may determine the time and place and manner in which they shall vote, and impose restrictions, not disfranchisement.

I can make this question plain to any one. I ask the Senator from Oregon whether the Legislature of the State of Oregon can ever disfranchise him—can ever deprive him of his God-given right of suffrage? I ask the Senator from Minnesota whether there is any power in that State to deprive me of the right of franchise if I remove there? Is there any power to deprive any of my descendants of that right? Is there any power to deprive any of the people of the United States of that right? If the power exists, and it can exclude me, may it not exclude one half or three fourths of the people, and leave the governing power in the hands of an oligarchy?

I ask you whether the State of South Carolina can have a provision that no Yankee shall vote in that State? If they could, they would adopt it with a will and a vengeance. Can any State in this Union decide that no German shall exercise the right of suffrage? I very much doubt the constitutionality of the law of Massachusetts, which says that the German shall not vote until he can read the English language, because that may amount to a virtual disfranchisement of some. I can say that it would be a very inexpedient law anyhow, for some of the best voting that is done in this country is pure unadulterated German. Suppose that Brigham Young should organize a sort of imperium in imperio in Utah, and after that State was admitted into the Union the Legislature should decide that none but disciples of the Mormon faith should vote, or, as all tests of religion are excluded by the Constitution, suppose that State were to decide that no man who had not two wives should be allowed the right of suffrage, would it not be the duty of Congress to interfere and protect the right of the citizens who may go into that State?

I will ask another question. Suppose, as has often been the case, a white man is declared a slave and he becomes free, is there any power in the State of Maine or any other State in this Union to disfranchise him, to take away from him entirely the right of suffrage? You will answer, no. Well, sir, does the tinge of complexion alter the inalienable, the intrinsic, the inherent, the God-given rights of the American citizen? I admit that the States may prescribe qualifications, not to destroy but to preserve the elective franchise of the freeman. There may be registry laws to protect the purity of the ballot and to prevent frauds; the minor under twenty-one years of age may be excluded. In the very nature of things there must be a period of majority affixed to infancy; but do you deprive that minor of the right to vote altogether? No, sir. "Dormitur aliquando jus, moritur nunquam"—"the right may sleep, but it dies never."

But there is another point in this article one, section two, to which I desire to call attention. Observe that the clause reads:

"The House of Representatives," &c., "shall be chosen every second year by the people of the several States."

Now, who are the people of the several States? Are they not the whole people? If there are any people in the several States not included in this clause, who are they? But Judge Taney says that people and citizens are synonymous. And it has been universally understood that the people of the States means all male citizens thereof over twenty-one years of age. There is no limitation in the words of the Constitution, and there can have been none, if by the people that formed the Constitution was meant the whole people of all the States, granting the exception as to the subject race, as above, according to the Dred Scott decision. But that exception no longer existing, then the words "people of the several States" must and do mean the whole people thereof, minors and women excepted.

Mr. President, I had intended, in the course of these remarks, to present my views against that class of legislation which is designed to secure what is called intelligent suffrage. I shall not now argue the point, but will merely say that I am unalterably opposed to any legislation whatever which shall determine the rights of the citizen by any test of wealth, intelligence, birth, or rank. I wish to say to my Republican Union friends that whenever they admit that principle, the test of intelligence, they admit away their argument. If we prescribe intelligence for the negro and not for the white man, it is unequal, it is class legislation. That is not the shibboleth of equality of rights for all, which you have been crying. Well, if we apply it to all who cannot read or write, we exclude a large portion of our fellow-citizens who have always since the foundation of the Government, for eighty-five years past, exercised the right of suffrage, and exercised it well. Why now exclude them? Why, to reach the case of the poor freeman, and in order to inflict a tyrannous and barbarous restriction upon him, exclude those who for eighty-five years have exercised the right of suffrage, and exercised it well? Sir, such a proposition as that cannot obtain five votes in any western Legislature. The party which commits itself to an exclusion of those men, who for eighty-five years have exercised this inestimable right of freemen, is already doomed, and ought to be doomed forever.

I am not opposed to intelligence. I believe that intelligence and virtue are the rock-bound foundations of our national prosperity and our national perpetuity. But if the success of our institutions depends more upon the one than the other—and I think they are inseparable for this purpose—it depends more on virtue. The poor loyal slave of the South was more religious and more loyal than his slave-master, and almost as intelligent, perhaps, as the mass of the whites themselves. While I believe it might possibly be safe for the country to permit all to vote, I do not think it would be safe for the country to exclude either class altogether, or any large class of the people.

I believe in the foundation theories of our Government, that there is more intelligence and more virtue in all the people than in any part of the people. That is the doctrine for which I contend. I contend that the strong common sense of the populace of America is a safe element in this Government.

The ballot is the greatest educator. Let a man have an interest in the Government, a voice as to the men and measures by which his taxes, his property, his life, and his reputation shall be determined, and there will be a stimulus to education for that man.

As the elective franchise has been extended in this country we have seen education become more universal. Look throughout all our northern States at our schools and colleges, our academies of learning, our associations; the pulpit, the press, and the numerous agencies for the promotion of intelligence, all the inevitable offspring of our free institutions. Here is the high training which inspires the eloquence of the senate, the wisdom of the cabinet, the address of the diplomatist, and which has developed and brought to light that intelligent and energetic mind which has elevated the character and contributed to the prosperity of the country. It is the ballot which is the stimulus to improvement, which fires the heart of youthful ambition, which stimulates honorable aspiration, which penetrates the thick shades of the forest, and takes the poor rail-splitter by the hand and points him to the shining height of human achievement, or which goes into the log hut of the tailor boy and opens to him the avenue to the presidential mansion.

There will be risk, it is said, in so much ignorance in the body of electors. Has there not always been risk? Will there not always be risk in every democratic Government? Has not Europe poured annually her millions into our borders, some of whom cannot read or write, and some of whom cannot speak our language? Have any of these Senators who propose to prescribe a qualification of intelligence ever thought of amending the naturalization laws, so as to require from foreigners that they should read and write?

Sir, the masses may err, but it is not to their interest to err. If they do err, they are always ready to correct the mistakes which passion and prejudice have brought upon them. But how is it with an aristocracy? Look at this mournful illustration; look at the rebellion of the educated slave oligarchy of the South; look at the devastations of the bloody war which resulted from that rebellion. History, upon many a dark and bloody page, gives sad and mournful evidence that the limitation of the powers of Government to the educated oligarchy or to an individual has resulted in wicked machinations against the welfare of the people, in the decay of empire, in bloody wars, leaving fearful devastations in the track of time.

Why, sir, I will say that there has been in all time no usurpation, no conspiracy against the rights of the freemen, except upon the specious plea of superior intelligence in the usurper or conspirators. We shall have to risk something. So we shall, sir, and we must trust that one ignorant force will counterpoise another in the future as it has in the past.

But, sir, if we prescribe intelligence as a guide, what grade of intelligence shall we have? When we propose to say that a man who can barely read and write shall vote, suppose I move to amend your proposition, adding that the man who understands English grammar and the ground rules of arithmetic alone shall vote; suppose I move to amend by saying that he shall have a liberal common-school education; suppose I move to amend by saying that he shall have graduated with academic honors. Sir, that is the argument ad absurdum. The only safe rule is to extend the franchise to all, that all the virtue, all the intelligence, all the practical common sense, all the wisdom, and all the learning of all the people shall be em-played in the administration of the affairs of the Government. I admit that there are restrictions which, as I have said, are inevitable; they must be continued, and must be made applicable to all. They are the mere regulation of the suffrage.

I was never a "Native American," although much of the foreign vote was cast against the old Whig party to which I belonged; but I am like the noble old Senator from Ohio [Mr. WADE] when he said, "I am willing to give to every man every right that I possess," and if by meritorious endeavor, if by playing well my part, if by developing any moral and intellectual faculties, I can attain to a higher position of eminence than he, then give me credit for it; but to what praise am I entitled if my superior fortune is the result of exclusive privileges which I deny to my unfortunate fellow-citizens?

I wish it distinctly understood that in all I have said here I am no one-idea man. I never had "negro on the brain." [Laughter.] I always fight with the people and for the people. I never belonged to the Wendell Phillips or Gerritt Smith party. I do not say this from want of respect for them, for they were noble pioneers in the cause of human liberty; but I am for the black man, not as a black man; I am for the white man, not as a white man, but I am for man irrespective of race or color; I am for God's humanity here, elsewhere, and everywhere.

Sir, Mr. Lincoln never said so beautiful a thing in all his life, according to my judgment, as when he said, "In giving freedom to the slave we assure freedom to the free." If we would preserve freedom for ourselves and our posterity, let us see to it that all are free, that there are no warring, wrangling, discordant races or classes out of which is to grow a future conflict of races, future war, and final disunion.

My distinguished friend on my left, [Mr. DAVIS,] the compeer of Mr. Clay and Mr. Crittenden, for whom I have such high respect, quoted from numerous authors to show that the freedmen belonged to an inferior race, to which I refer for this reason: if the Senator from Kentucky, the loyal and patriotic Senator from Kentucky, through the prejudices of education, can, with almost barbarous cruelty, parade, in long array, authorities from historians to show that the negro is an inferior race and not entitled to equal privileges with the white man, what may we not expect from the southern rebels whom negro valor has chastised, and whose secession principles negro votes shall yet vote down?

Mr. Lincoln made another beautiful remark in his letter to Governor Hahn. He said:

"In some trying time the vote of the black man may serve to keep the jewel of liberty in the family of freedom."

Sir, the time may arrive when the southern slaveholders and their northern sympathizers may come so near having the control of the Government, that the loyal black vote may be the balance of power and cast the scale in favor of Union and liberty.

If universal suffrage is wrong, our Government is wrong. I am willing to conform to the principles of my Government wherever they may lead. If it turns out, as I fondly hope it may not, that our fathers were wrong, and that our people are incapable of self-government, and that a wealthy few, an intelligent few, or a single monarch ought to govern them, I cannot help it, but that is not the principle for which I am fighting. I am fighting to carry out to its legitimate conclusion, to its logical sequence, what I believe to be the decree of Almighty God, that all men are created equal.

Gentlemen ask me "if I will go before the people of Illinois with such a proposition as this." Ay, indeed, and welcome it. I have no fear of the result. Through the clouds of the present I see the brightness of the future. There is, deep seated in the hearts of the American people everywhere, the firm conviction that this negro question, however unpalatable its discussion may be, will never be settled until it is adjusted upon the principle of justice and equality.

Sir, I can see now plainly the beginning of the end. I now see the apotheosis of that living principle which fled the persecutions of the Old World; which sought a home amidst the sterile rocks of New England; which remonstrated against taxation without representation; which exhibited its opposition to class legislation upon the bloody field of Bunker Hill, and which finally culminated in the greatest and most majestic and dominant idea of the world—the Declaration of American Independence.

Sir, I am a man of the people; twenty-five years of public service make me believe that I understand something of the temper and disposition of the people; and I am here to-day to say that it is my conscientious conviction that if every Senator on this floor and every Representative in the other House and the President of the United States should with united voices attempt to oppose this grand consummation of universal equality, they will fail. It is too late for that. You may go to the head waters of the Mississippi and turn off the little rivulets, but you cannot go to the mouth, after it has collected its waters from a thousand rivers and with accumulated volume is pouring its foaming waters into the Gulf, and say, "Thus far shalt thou go, and no further."

Politicians may choose their course; they may become frightened at the radical march of events; they may throw pebbles into the mighty current of popular opinion. But the grand old river of progress, of liberty and humanity, and God's eternal justice, will roll on. Gentlemen may erect altars to conservatism; but they will go down to that vortex into which so many compromisers, Union savers, and conservatives have already gone—"that bourne whence no political adventurer ever returns." Sir, I care not who the man may be, though he be a Senator upon the floor or the President of the United States, however high his title or proud his name, if he is false to human freedom "the places which know him now shall soon know him no more forever!"

I remember well what the noble old Senator from Ohio [Mr. WADE] said in his speech: how he was threatened with the anathemas of public vengeance when he was in a slim and hated minority; but, thank God, he still lives to look on the graves of his political opponents and revilers. Having fought the fight, having kept the faith, and come up through great tribulation, he is not here to surrender the citadel of liberty to a few guerrilla bands and the raw recruits who are wasting their ineffectual fires upon the fortifications which have withstood unshaken the roar and thunder of the whole pro-slavery army. I, sir, though a younger man, have a similar experience. I stood side by side with the noble Lincoln in every phase of these questions. I have fought the fight and lived to enjoy the delightful pleasure of telling the last Legislature of my State to sweep with a speedy, resistless hand the black laws from our code. And they did it. They did not alter, modify, or amend them, but they eviscerated them, body and soul, from the statute-book, and scattered their black and blood-stained leaves upon the simoom of popular indignation.

Sir, what made Abraham Lincoln President of the United States? I know he was good, very good; he was great, very great, in all those qualities which constitute the statesman; but it was his persistent advocacy of the doctrines of the Declaration of American Independence, in his debates with Stephen A. Douglas, in his speeches at the Cooper Institute in New York, in Connecticut, and in Kansas; it was his clear definition of the principles of human freedom; it was those God-inspired words—

"This Union cannot permanently endure half slave and half free; the Union will not be dissolved, but the house will cease to be divided"— it was this which riveted the attention of the nation, and made him President of the United States. And why, sir? Because, despite the prejudices of education, which we all have, despite centuries of wrong and oppression, there is somewhere, away down in the depths of the human soul—and that soul is deeper than oceans; it is like infinite space and has no boundaries—there is somewhere in the unfathomable depths of the human soul the love of liberty and the hatred of oppression. That chord Lincoln struck, and thus made himself President and his name immortal. Why are you Senators here from every northern State? Is it because you are able men? But you are not the only able men in your States. There are men distinguished for great ability and illustrious service in your States. You are here, because you have been true to truth, to justice, to liberty, and to equal laws.

It is too late to change the tide of human progress. The enlightened convictions of the masses, wrought by the thorough discussions of thirty years, and consecrated by the baptism of precious blood, cannot now be changed. The hand of a higher power than man's is in this revolution, and it will not move backward. It is of no use to fight against destiny. God, not man, created men equal. Deep laid in the solid foundations of God's eternal throne, the principle of equality is established, indestructible and immortal.

My way to settle our national troubles is to punish some traitors, not for the sake of vengeance, but for the sake of example. There ought to be some example made in order to inculcate the idea that treason is a crime in this country, and that it will be punished. I would then extend pardon to all the rebel masses; I would withhold it from the leaders of the rebellion. I would confer upon the freedmen, made free by the Constitution and laws of the land, universal suffrage.

Mr. President, as I said in a speech on the 4th day of July last—and I wish to repeat it here now, to show that these are no new-formed opinions—I say again:

"This is the genius of our Government. I am willing to trust the people; and I believe that our Government, founded upon the will of all, protected by the power of all, and maintaining the rights of all, will survive the storms of civil and external convulsion, and growing in grandeur and power, will become one of the mightiest nations on the face of the earth. Therefore I am opposed to slavery and secession, for an undivided Union, for universal freedom, and universal suffrage."

Senators, sixty centuries of the past are looking down upon you. All the centuries of the future are calling upon you. Liberty, struggling amid the rise and wrecks of empires in the past, and yet to struggle for life in all the nations of the world, conjures you to seize this great opportunity which the providence of Almighty God has placed in your hands to bless the world and make your names immortal, to carry to a full and triumphant consummation the great work begun by your fathers, and thus lay permanently, solidly, and immovably the capstone upon the pyramid of human liberty.

Apportionment of Representation.

SPEECH OF HON. J. B. HENDERSON, OF MISSOURI,

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

February 13, 1866.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, having under consideration the joint resolution (H. R. No. 51) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States—

Mr. HENDERSON said:

Mr. President: I shall certainly have to ask the pardon of the Senate on this occasion for attempting to speak on a question of so much importance without the preparation that it is entitled to; but I feel, in regard to the constitutional amendments now pending before the body, that if we do anything at all we ought to act speedily. It is not well to postpone action upon this matter for a great length of time. A large number, I believe twenty-two, of the State Legislatures are now in session, and if we are seriously in earnest about amending the Constitution of the United States we ought to send the amendment out to those State Legislatures as early as we can.

SENATE.

Apportionment of Representation—Mr. Henderson.

I believe it was Sir Jacob Astley who, just after the last battle between Charles and the Parliament, when he fell into the hands of the Parliament troops as a prisoner, remarked to the commanders of the Parliament forces—Cromwell and his party—"Now, gentlemen, you have the game in your own hands, and can act as you choose unless you fall out among yourselves." I have thought during this session of Congress that we were likely to get into a condition similar to that immediately succeeding the overthrow of the troops of Charles. Our present condition is bad enough—not worse perhaps, than two years ago, but bad enough to accept the plainest talk.

I said I have made no preparation, or scarcely any whatever, for the remarks I intend to submit. Perhaps it is better that I have made none, for when gentlemen write what they have to say they sometimes are quite, guarded, so careful as not to express what they feel. I hope on this occasion that I shall say exactly what I do feel, regardless of the consequences, intending, however, to be disrespectful to no one. What is said may not be connected. It may want in succinctness of statement, in logical sequence, and offend the delicate ear of the finished scholar. It may require patience to listen, and possibly not be listened to, but, struggling against all difficulties, I shall stagger on to the end.

I do not know in what particular political classification I may be ranked. Nor does it matter. I think I know something of the condition of the country; and I believe I know somewhat of the things necessary to remedy the difficulties now upon us. However, about that I may be mistaken; and I have some reason to doubt, since the honorable Senator from Illinois [Mr. TRUMBULL]—I regret he is not now in his seat—took occasion, a few days since, to compare me with old Dr. Townsend, of sarsaparilla notoriety. I have since been discussing in my own mind whether the old doctor was not at last something more than a quack; whether he was not as good physician as many others who assume a little more dignity, and pass as the most eminent men with far less merit. Perhaps I sometimes express opinions with too much zeal. It is to be regretted if in the expression of views I wound the feelings of anybody. Nothing of the sort is intended. I said I did not know to what classification I may be assigned. I do not know whether I am to be termed a Radical, a Conservative, or a Democrat. I am willing to occupy any designation to which the expression of views, honestly entertained, may assign me. Those views may not accord entirely with the views of any of the leading parties.

Speaking of parties, Mr. President, I see that in a conversation which the President of the United States had with some gentlemen from Virginia a day or two ago, he gave expression to sentiments indicating most clearly that he entertains fears of some real or imaginary extreme party in the loyal States. I take it that he means the radical party as now known. That party may be dangerous, but it is not so bad as the President seems to think. Its instincts are generally good. Its dangers rest chiefly in timid minds. Let me preface what I may say with the remark that honestly and sincerely, since the present Executive took his seat as President of the United States after the death of our lamented Lincoln, I have supported his Administration. I did not concur in some points of his reconstruction policy, but trusting in his fidelity and better means of information I was willing to waive all differences and give him an earnest support. My object and purpose have been to restore, if possible, and at the earliest day practicable, the Union of these States. He seemed to aim at the same end. It may be remembered, if Senators take any interest in the little I do or say on any subject here, that on the 24th of last February I advocated the admission of the Louisiana and Arkansas Senators, not that I believed Mr. Lincoln had authority to do much that was done preparatory to the election of those Senators, not that I believed the military authorities possessed the power to do many things they did preparatory to that election, but I waived the want of formality and was willing to accept them as the representatives of loyal organizations. The war was then flagrant, and it was our policy, I thought, to segregate the loyal from the disloyal. It was deemed best to encourage Union men to create and rally around State organizations as the most efficient agency for suppressing rebellion in the respective States. My hope was that the President had assurances that true and genuine loyalty would enter into the governments of the States to be reorganized under his proclamation; that the rebel element would abstain from participation in restoring civil relations, to break which they had waged four years of bloody and savage war.

The Senator from Ohio, [Mr. WADE,] some days since—and I now refer to it in all kindness—said that Mr. Johnson's proposition for the restoration of these States was far preferable to the plan of Mr. Lincoln, but he was opposed to both. I care nothing about plans, Mr. President. It is best to look to results. I will not wrangle with the Senator about the relative merit of the two plans. He should remember, however, that those men who participated in the reorganization of Louisiana and Arkansas were Union men. They of necessity were Union men; because the war was then going on, and none other than bold and earnest Union men dared participate in the reorganization of those States while confederate soldiers were yet under arms—

Mr. WADE. I believe the Senator has not exactly got my words. I think I did not say "preferable." I think that I said he went much further in requiring guarantees than Mr. Lincoln had done; and I do not know but that that might be considered preferable.

Mr. HENDERSON. I did not design to misstate the position of the Senator from Ohio. It matters not what may be the merit of the two plans. If the circumstances be considered, Lincoln's plan was preferable, for the circumstances were then such that none but loyal men would participate. Under Johnson's plan the circumstances were such that disloyal men could and did participate.

Mr. WADE. If the Senator will oppose them, that is all I ask. [Laughter.]

Mr. HENDERSON. I said nothing about opposing them nor accepting them. The question raised by the Senator was one of comparative merit between the plans. The plans might have been substantially the same, and yet the results be essentially different. As vegetation is varied by climate, so are the consequences of human action varied by surrounding circumstances. Congress was not obliged to accept Mr. Lincoln's plan. It could accept or reject. It has the same discretion with Mr. Johnson's plan. If accepting the organizations would tend to restore Union and harmony they ought to be accepted. If those organizations are in rebel hands their recognition must complicate our troubles.

The men who presented themselves here at the last session of Congress, under the Lincoln plan, were elected by Union men in their respective States. Do we not know perfectly well that no confederate soldier took part in the reorganization of the State governments of Louisiana and Arkansas? Do we not know that rebel soldiers would have broken up those organizations if they could? Do we not know that almost every man in those States who segregated himself from the rebel army because of his Unionism did participate in their reorganization?

Mr. Lincoln, it is true, prescribed an oath as a condition of the amnesty which he offered; Mr. Johnson prescribed a similar oath; but look at the change of circumstances. When was Louisiana reorganized? During the pendency of hostilities. When was Arkansas reorganized? In the midst of rebellion, when rebels had the highest hopes of success. Those men who were secessionists were opposed to the reorganization, and constituted the party of opposition. Those who advocated restoration were men tried in the fires of war and the persecutions of political hatred. But last spring the confederate armies surrendered, and the war was over. Lee's army surrendered in the early part of April, just before Lincoln's death; Johnston's army surrendered about the 19th of April, and Kirby Smith's army sometime near the middle of May. On the 29th of May Mr. Johnson issued his proclamation of amnesty. I will read a portion of that proclamation in order to show exactly what condition of affairs, legally and in fact, followed its issuance.

The President's object, of course, was to begin the work of restoration. He sought a basis to begin on, and honestly, no doubt, sought a loyal basis. He so says in his late message. He evidently designed that all men receiving the benefit of his pardon might, if they chose, participate in reorganizing the respective State governments. He thought they would be loyal. In other words, they who were pardoned, regardless of their former crimes in the great drama of rebellion, and regardless of their present feelings toward the General Government, were to become participants in the work of recreating loyal State governments. The President says:

"To the end, therefore, that the authority of the Government of the United States may be restored, and that peace, order, and freedom may be established, I, Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, do proclaim and declare that I hereby grant to all persons who have, directly or indirectly, participated in the existing rebellion, except as hereinafter excepted, amnesty and pardon, with restoration of all rights of property except as to slaves and except in cases where legal proceedings under the laws of the United States providing for the confiscation of property of persons engaged in rebellion have been instituted; but upon the condition, nevertheless, that every such person shall take and subscribe the following oath, (or affirmation,) and thenceforward keep and maintain said oath inviolate; and which oath shall be registered for permanent preservation, and shall be of the tenor and effect following, to wit:

"I, ———, do solemnly swear, (or affirm,) in presence of Almighty God, that I will henceforth faithfully support, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States and the Union of the States thereunder; that I will in like manner abide by and faithfully support all laws and proclamations which have been made during the existing rebellion with reference to the emancipation of slaves. So help me God."

It will be observed that the oath is entirely prospective. It did not propose to purge the conscience on the subject of voluntary and premeditated treason, to draw a line of distinction between the rebel officer and the unwilling conscript soldier. It asked only future obedience to the Constitution, which stern necessity had already enforced. It asked only a recognition of freedom to the slave, a fact already established without the aid of rebel oaths.

Senators will remember that there were various exceptions, numbering fourteen different classes, named in this proclamation. The Constitution of the United States gives to the President the power to grant reprieves and pardons, but it may be considered, I submit, by Senators who are familiar with the common law on the subject of pardon, and I presume all are, whether the President of the United States would have had any authority to issue this general amnesty or general pardon except by virtue of an act of Congress. I do not deny that in any single case, by virtue alone of the constitutional provision, the President may grant a certificate of pardon. I do not doubt that he can grant it before conviction, as well as after conviction.

He cannot give a license or indulgence to commit crime; but after a crime is committed, all he has to do in his certificate is to specify particularly the crime that has been committed and for which the pardon is granted. But it may well be denied that but for the act of Congress of July 17, 1862, of which my friend from New Hampshire before me [Mr. CLARK] was perhaps the chief draughtsman, the President would have any authority to grant a general pardon or amnesty. I must admit that that act is quite full. Let me refer to it. The thirteenth section is in these words:

"Sec. 13. And be it further enacted, That the President is hereby authorized, at any time hereafter, by proclamation, to extend to persons who may have participated in the existing rebellion in any State or part thereof, pardon and amnesty, with such exceptions and at such time and on such conditions as he may deem expedient for the public welfare."

It will not be disputed that by virtue of that authority the President had power to issue his proclamation of general amnesty. But disputes may arise on other questions connected with this proclamation. What was the condition upon which the pardon was to inure to the benefit of the party pardoned? It was first that he should file the oath named and in the manner to be prescribed. But this is not of itself sufficient. There is something more necessary that the benefits of the pardon should inure.

According to the common law, and when we undertake to construe our Constitution we must construe it with reference to that law which existed among us at the time and with which our forefathers were perfectly familiar, perhaps the best system of law devised for the administration of justice among men, it is not only necessary that the party shall have filed this oath, but it is necessary that he shall have kept the oath. The President provides, in the close of the proclamation, that "the Secretary of State will establish rules and regulations for administering and recording said amnesty oath, so as to insure its benefit to the people and guard the Government against fraud." I believe the Secretary of State provided those rules and regulations under which parties who intended to take the benefit of this amnesty could take it. The taking of the oath is the technical acceptance of the pardon. The actual performance of the things, sworn to be done, is the condition of the pardon. If the condition be broken the pardon is void. The oath is that the party taking it will henceforward "faithfully support, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States and the Union of the States thereunder," and that he will "in like manner abide by and faithfully support all laws and proclamations which have been made during the existing rebellion with reference to the emancipation of slaves."

First, then, if one has failed to take the oath prescribed, and in the manner prescribed, the pardon does not attach, and second, although he may have taken the oath, unless he has complied with it, that is, unless he has faithfully supported "all laws and proclamations which have been made during the existing rebellion with reference to the emancipation of slaves," the pardon as to him is void and its benefits are forfeited.

I have looked to some of the authorities on the subject of pardon, and refer to this point for the purpose of obtaining, if possible, a legal solution of existing difficulties. Those difficulties are great, but the powers of the Government must be large enough to secure its own existence, to perpetuate the principles of liberty which lie at its foundation, as well as to vouchsafe the happiness of the people. The Union may be restored in truth and in fact, without violating a principle of that instrument, and indeed without rejecting the unwritten traditions of the fathers. I propose, in a moment, to examine the condition of the people in the seceded States, the character of the organizations before us, and what the powers and duties of Congress are.

It will then be proper to inquire, how far this act of amnesty by the President relieved these parties in the seceded States? What rights it legally conferred? What the President undertook to relieve them of? How far he was advised of the precise character of their offenses? Whether he had any power independent of the act of Congress already cited to pardon generally? If not, then the extent of that general pardon under said act? How far it has been accepted and to what extent its benefits have been forfeited? And lastly, as I have said, the powers of Congress in the premises? I do not propose to elaborate these points, but suggest them for the solution of abler men, who have more immediate charge of reconstruction. The President says—

"I hereby grant to all persons who have, directly or indirectly, participated in the existing rebellion, except as hereinafter excepted, amnesty and pardon, with restoration of all rights of property, except as to slaves, and except in cases where legal proceedings under the laws of the United States providing for the confiscation of property of persons engaged in rebellion have been instituted."

Of what does he relieve them? Of anything except the penalty prescribed in the act of July 17, 1862? Does the pardon restore the person accepting it to full rights of citizenship? In other words, did the voluntary rebel forfeit any political right by his rebellion? He forfeited his life and property under the act named. The President's pardon did not assume to do more than restore to him his life and property. Is there not a political question behind this, that belongs to Congress and which does not come within the power of the President either under the clause of the Constitution or the law named? But assuming that the force of the pardon was sufficient to restore both civil and political rights forfeited, then has the condition of the pardon been kept?

On the subject of conditional pardons, the case of Wells ex parte, 18 Howard's Reports, where the whole question of pardon was discussed ably and learnedly, may be referred to. Wells was convicted of murder in the District of Columbia, and President Fillmore pardoned him, on the condition, however, that he should take, in lieu of capital punishment, imprisonment in the penitentiary of the District of Columbia for and during his life. On the next day, I believe, he applied for a writ of habeas corpus, his counsel taking the ground that the condition was void, because no man could sell his liberty, and that the pardon attached and was perfect and complete. The Supreme Court decided that the condition might be legally attached, and that the party instead of selling himself into slavery, preserved his life, which was already forfeited to the law in consequence of his crime, that he had no body which was his to sell into slavery, and that really he saved his life by the acceptance. This subject of conditional pardons, the extent of executive authority, and the forfeiture of the benefits arising from pardon, have received consideration in numerous cases. See Cathcart vs. Robinson, 5 Pet. R., 264-280; 8 Watts and Serg., 197; 7 Pet., 150; 1 Bailey S. C., 283; New York Legal Observer, 177.

I believe in the State of my distinguished friend from New York [Mr. HARRIS] it was decided that where a pardon had been granted upon condition that the party should permanently leave the country and he failed to go, or having gone, returned, he could be remanded into custody for the execution of the judgment and sentence of the court. Then if there be a political forfeiture in the crime of rebellion which has not been pardoned, the jurisdiction of Congress may properly attach and new organizations provided for, in which the rebel element may be excluded. But even if the President's pardon be valid to make the offender a new man, civilly and politically, yet if he has violated the condition of the pardon the pardon becomes inoperative, and if a majority in the seceded States have violated it, are the rebel States not legally as they were before the attempted restoration?

I have no feeling of malice whatever against the people of the southern States. I was born in the South myself, and ask nothing but what I think would be best for them and the entire country. My friend from Illinois [Mr. TRUMBULL] seemed to think the other day that I was actuated by some new zeal, having been once a slaveholder. I said that I was a slaveholder at the beginning of this war. I am glad that the Senator is in his seat now. I was a slaveholder partly by inheritance. That I could not help, any more than the Senator from Illinois can help his disposition eternally to criticise me. [Laughter.] He got his disposition by inheritance, and I received a slave by inheritance. I forgive him: will he forgive me? [Mr. TRUMBULL. Certainly.] I got them partly by purchase, not for purposes of profit, but at their own request, to keep them from being sold to others. I never got a dollar of their wages from the day I purchased them until the day they were emancipated. I paid from my hard earnings the money for their purchase and turned them loose, and they have received from that day to this the rewards of their own toil.

I know that it is very easy to say, "You have been a slaveholder, and therefore a wicked man." Slaveholding is now, of course, unpopular. We must look to men's surroundings in order to judge fairly of their acts. I ought not to speak of myself in connection with many who have been slaveholders, but I must be allowed to speak now, in my own defense, the simple truths of history. George Washington was a slaveholder, James Madison was a slaveholder, James Monroe was a slaveholder, Thomas Jefferson, the apostle of freedom and the advocate at all times of emancipation, the man who looked down the long vista of the then future and saw with prophetic ken the war of the last four years, was a slaveholder up to the day of his death. I do not know but I have sinned in being a slave-owner. If so, better men than I have sinned—not better than the Senator from Illinois, but better men than I have sinned, all over the South. The Senator from Illinois cannot realize the fact, perhaps, that if he had been in a slave State when slavery existed, he might have become a slaveholder himself, even against his will. A negro for whom he might have had regard, one who had been kind to him, is put upon the block for sale; a purchaser is present to whom the slave is unwilling to be sold; the slave begs him to buy. Would he not become a slaveholder under these circumstances if he had money enough to do it?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope my friend from Missouri did not understand me as saying that he had been a slaveholder, by way of reproach. Certainly, I meant no such thing.

Mr. HENDERSON. I was afraid such might be the inference from the remarks of the Senator.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I did not so intend. Mr. HENDERSON. I am glad of it. I can say that so far as my former slaves are concerned, they will need no bounty from the Freedmen's Bureau. I have made some of them land-owners. My means are not large, but I have done something in the way of charity or justice, whichever it may be. To some I have given homes, and, if I live much longer enjoying good health and my present vigor of constitution, I hope to be able to make them all land-holders. That is not all. Within the limited sphere of my influence I have done something toward purchasing churches and school-houses for the moral and intellectual culture, not only of the few formerly belonging to me, but of the many belonging to others. I have said to them, "Go and educate yourselves; prepare to become citizens of this country, as you must inevitably be in the future." If they become able to reimburse me, they will do so.

SENATE.

Apportionment of Representation—Mr. Henderson.

If not, the loss is light. If this be sin, then have I sinned, and many slaveholders, however odious now, have sinned likewise. For emancipation I have claimed no credit. If it be a great good, and I hope it is, others take the praise. But emancipation being an accomplished fact, we cannot overlook the condition of near five million people, nor lightly scoff at their claims for civil and political rights. I said no more than this, and this simple fact, I thought, might be recognized by all. I am glad to know, for the sake of the honorable Senator himself, that he was not insensible to the importance of the question itself. I can assure him that if my zeal be new, it is only because the circumstances themselves are new. At least, the zeal springs from no selfish aims of mine. If I consulted ambition alone, its ends might be better secured, perhaps, by bending the knee yet longer to a senseless prejudice.

I have said to the people of my State, and now repeat, that when my present term expires I shall ask in the way of reelection, no indorsement of the past and no expression of confidence for the future. I might not obtain it, if I wanted it. Not desiring it, however, I can well afford to disregard all suggestions except those of duty. If I can see the Union restored in such manner as to assure the largest freedom to the people, if I can see the principle find practical application in our Constitution and laws, that you cannot tax a man without representation, that you have no right to put the burden of the law upon him who has no voice in its passage, I shall be fully satisfied. I ask no honor beyond that of being instrumental in accomplishing acts of justice in the discharge of duty. It is pleasant, to be sure, to be associated with gentlemen of such distinguished abilities, and of patriotism no less distinguished, but yet one may well prefer the quiet of an humble home to the cares and responsibilities which too often bring to the most conscientious incumbent of public position more of denunciation than of applause, more of misguided hatred than of deserved honor.

But, at least, if honor comes from public life, it is bitter fruit, unless the conscience approve the deeds which bear it; it is an empty bubble unless posterity has reason to feel indebted to its possessor.

But if the Senate will excuse me for this digression I will return to the subject. My object is not to devise ways and means to keep the revolted States away, but to find a safe bridge for their return. If they come back in the spirit of haughty defiance, with hands unwashed of their country's blood, with no work of penitence to commend them, with hearts yet filled with hatred, and without conviction of the enormity of their crimes, things will be made worse by their return. I have said things are now bad enough. They should not be made worse. I am aware that some persons, many of them loyal and good men, ask the immediate recognition of the new governments. It was to restore the Union, say they, that the war was waged. It was to bring these States back that the rich man gave his treasure, the poor man his mite, the wise man his thought, and the soldier his blood. Now, it is asked, why not restore it?

Mr. President, if the simple recognition by Congress and the admission of members now at our doors would restore the Union, Congress would not hesitate a moment. If I could speak the word of reunion, it should be spoken, but no controversy between the President and Congress will help the matter. That controversy may come. It cannot now come through the fault of Congress. The President in his annual message informed us what he had done in the premises, and then said:

"Here it is for you, fellow-citizens of the Senate, and for you, fellow-citizens of the House of Representatives, to judge, each of you, for yourselves, of the elections, returns, and qualifications of your own members."

If Congress, in the exercise of this admitted right, a right no better established because of the President's admission, believes that the organizations from which these members come as Representatives are in disloyal hands, and that to receive the members would complicate our difficulties, can the President complain, ought the President complain, that we stop to inquire into facts? The President has not told us that in his opinion the Legislature of a single reconstructed State is loyal. If he thinks so, why has he so often interfered with their legislation? Why is martial law continued in each one of them, when its existence depends on his will alone? Why did he say to the Georgia convention that Georgia should not pay a certain debt? Why to the North Carolina convention that the ordinance of secession must be declared null and void, and not simply repealed? And why, I ask, if these States are loyal and entitled to the dignity of States, does the President almost daily set aside, by the orders of military men, holding place at his will and discretion, the solemn acts of their Legislatures? The President made it a condition that the reconstructed States should abolish slavery themselves, and adopt the constitutional amendment abolishing it for others. He thought he had the power, but whether he had it or not, he assumed and exercised it. But now that slavery is abolished, why are military officers throughout the South extending military protection to the negroes against the laws of the whites? They set aside entire codes of laws, and yet hold their places subject to executive approbation.

My purpose is not to condemn the Executive. All he has done may be necessary. I mean only to say, if these things are necessary, his plan of reconstruction is a failure, and Congress is not to be reproached for its short delay. If these organizations shall be recognized, is martial law yet to prevail? Are newspapers yet to be suppressed? Are negroes yet to be protected by the bayonet? Will these States still reject the fact of freedom and deny the freedman the right to hold and enjoy property? And if they so legislate, are judges and jurors and marshals who execute the State law, backed by State militia, to be arrested and tried before Federal soldiers, under martial law, for offenses against national authority? Will the President continue this work, and yet call these organizations independent and equal States of the American Union? Or does the President ask that Congress shall recognize the reconstruction, that he may be relieved of this unpleasant but necessary duty? For surely, these violations of the republican principle, in the late seceded States, would not be tolerated by the President if the conviction of overpowering necessity did not force him to commit them. But if the President has been driven to these great things, which close the doors against the admission of his own theory, will not he or Congress have to continue them even after admission? Congress ought to be excused from this work.

If these organizations are loyal, why is not their legislation all on the side of loyalty? If their legislation is right, why does the President set it aside and have the military daily triumph over the civil power? If the organizations are disloyal, neither the President nor his friends should ask their recognition, much less should they denounce Congress for its refusal. For if disloyal, the President is certainly responsible for the fact. Congress is guiltless, for Congress has had nothing to do with it. The President acted without our advice. He might have acted worse if he had taken it. But whatever the responsibility, the honor, or shame of reconstruction, it is his. If disloyal organizations have resulted, I acquit the President of all design to bring about such result. But if he sees that such is the fact, no pride of opinion or false sense of humiliation should stand in the way of its acknowledgment. It will require the wisdom of both the executive and legislative departments of the Government to give us peace. Let us have that wisdom combined. Let the President reject the counsels of false friends, and let Congress learn to trust his integrity.

I have expressed no distrust of the President's fidelity to principle. I express none because I feel none. He felt it his duty to give civil government at once to the revolted States. That was the natural desire of every good man. He attempted it, but has not yet removed martial law from a single State. I do not blame him, for it is evident he cannot. He said his object was to "enable the loyal people of the State to restore the State to its constitutional relations to the Federal Government, and to present such a republican form of government as will entitle the State to the guarantee and protection of the United States." Did he put the power in loyal hands, and if so, have they presented such a form of government as he desired? If they have done so, military law should wither and die, and the civil power of those States is too sacred a thing to be touched by the rude hand of the soldier.

The misfortune is, that, however sanguine the President in his hopes of securing a loyal basis, he failed. He had snatched from the shoulder of the disloyalist the deadly musket, and vainly thought that acts of unmerited generosity in the moment of his defeat would melt his stubborn heart to repentance. The pardon was so sudden, and made so general, that its motive seems to have been misapprehended. There may have been, there probably was, a temporary feeling of gratitude in the first moment of helpless confusion, but it was soon thought to be more of a favor to the victor than to the vanquished. For a short time it may have been asked in suppliant spirit. It was soon demanded as a right. The musket, it is true, was gone; but that which was even far more potent in their hands had been substituted. The musket had been seized to perpetuate slavery. The musket could not save it. The ballot had once done so. The ballot might yet save the substance and traditions of slavery, though the musket could not save its form. For all this I have said Congress is not responsible. The President selected his own classes for pardon and for exception. He put his own construction on the act of Congress, and assumed that pardon for treason gave back the ballot to the traitor.

After issuing the amnesty proclamation he proceeded, as I have said, to issue another on the same day providing for the reorganization of North Carolina, which was followed by a proclamation of a similar character for each one of the seceded States, leaving out Louisiana, Tennessee and Arkansas, which had been reorganized under Mr. Lincoln.

The first part of it declares it to be the duty of the United States to see that each State has a republican form of government, and then proceeds:

"Now, therefore, in obedience to the high and solemn duties imposed upon me by the Constitution of the United States, and for the purpose of enabling the loyal people of said State to organize a State government, whereby justice may be established, domestic tranquillity insured, and loyal citizens protected in all their rights of life, liberty, and property, I, Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, and Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, do hereby appoint William W. Holden provisional governor of the State of North Carolina, whose duty it shall be, at the earliest practicable period, to prescribe such rules and regulations as may be necessary and proper for convening a convention, composed of delegates to be chosen by that portion of the people of said State who are loyal to the United States, and no others, for the purpose of altering or amending the constitution thereof; and with authority to exercise, within the limits of said State, all the powers necessary and proper to enable such loyal people of the State of North Carolina to restore said State to its constitutional relations to the Federal Government, and present such republican form of State government as will entitle the State to the guarantee of the United States therefor, and its people to protection by the United States against invasion, insurrection, and domestic violence."

SENATE.

That is all well enough; I have no objection to it; but what comes next?

"Provided, That in any election that may be hereafter held for choosing delegates to any State convention as aforesaid, no person shall be qualified as an elector, or shall be eligible as a member of such convention, unless he shall have previously taken and subscribed the oath of amnesty, as set forth in the President's proclamation of May 29, A. D. 1865, and is a voter qualified and prescribed by the constitution and laws of the State of North Carolina, in force immediately before the 20th day of May, 1861, the date of the so-called ordinance of secession; and the said convention, when convened, or the Legislature that may be thereafter assembled, will prescribe the qualification of electors, and the eligibility of persons to hold office under the constitution and laws of the State—a power the people of the several States composing the Federal Union have rightfully exercised from the origin of the Government to the present time."

It will be observed that in the former portion of the extract I have read, the proclamation of the President confines the reorganization of the State, in words, to the loyal men of North Carolina—such I am satisfied was the President's intention; but under the proviso, in my judgment, he commits the error. He says that everybody is a voter, who will take the amnesty oath, and who was a voter under the constitution as it existed May 20, 1861, the day of secession. The conquered rebel who saw the musket fall from his hands, however criminal with the blood of his fellow-men, had only to acknowledge the futility of further efforts in armed rebellion. No matter what his past deeds, they were pardoned, and the assumption made that such pardon was sufficient again to clothe him with the ballot, that sacred right of an American citizen. He was not required to say that State law, or even considerations of personal safety, had induced him to wage a bloody and relentless war against his country. Although he had voted for secession and willingly given his treasure and influence to further the cause, though he had brought terror upon unwilling neighbors and driven them from the support of a slandered and injured Government, or compelled them to take refuge in mountain caverns, while their property was seized and turned into the coffers of treason, that man could vote on a simple pledge for the future, regardless of the past.

The faithful negro, for whose degradation and misery these deeds of blood have been done, was again forgotten. The State constitution, made by his owners while he was a slave, of course denied him the suffrage. I have not complained of the President that the negro was denied the suffrage. I have not complained of anything. I do not now complain, much less do I design to censure. But it seems to me that if the State constitutions of Mississippi and Texas must be barriers in the way of negro suffrage, those other clauses denying suffrage to any but "citizens of the United States" should have presented barriers against the white men, who had abjured allegiance to our Government, sworn allegiance to a hostile de facto government, and for four years had staked their lives upon the success of the one and the total overthrow of the other. After these deeds they may be citizens of the United States; but if so, I know not how the right of citizenship may be forfeited. The President's pardon may have restored the right of citizenship, if lost. That may have been the President's view. If so, I have already expressed my dissent. The President's pardon went to the life and property, relieved the penalty named in the act giving him the power to offer amnesty, but went no further. If citizenship is forfeited, Congress alone can restore it. It is a political right, belonging to the legislative authority of the country, and which the Executive can neither give nor take away.

But, now, giving the pardon its full force, has it not been forfeited, and is Congress not justified in assuming a forfeiture, at least so far as it may be necessary to secure the guarantee of truly republican forms of government?

So far as the life and property of the rebels are concerned, I do not ask that anything be abated from presidential pardon. Their blood I do not want. The cause of the country does not demand it. Humanity, indeed, shrinks back from the thought of justice. Justice now would be cruelty, in the eyes of history. Lives enough have been taken. Malice and revenge may claim many more. National policy rejects the claim. The war itself has confiscated enough. Confiscation will give our coffers nothing. It may gratify personal avarice, but this is a poor return for loss of national honor. For me, the rebels are welcome to life and property. I would not add one to the tears that moisten the cheeks of sorrow. I would so make our Government, however, that the heaviest penalty for treason would be the traitor's remorse. To dry up one tear, we are told, brings larger fame than to shed oceans of blood. But while I would extend mercy to the conquered rebel in my power, I must remember the simple dictates of justice in behalf of him who pleads for mercy, and pleads in vain at the hands of that rebel. That generosity, which ceases to flow beyond the limits of our own race, is partial and unworthy of man. While I would forgive the rebel, I would elevate him whom the rebel has oppressed for ages. I would teach each man to abandon his prejudices and seek his own happiness in the happiness of his fellow-men, where alone he can find it.

For many long years, indeed from the origin of our history as a nation, slavery and its incidents have constituted the weapons of political warfare. Party power, the lust of office, the whisperings of ambition, the hopes of individual preferment, the ties of political association, too often united with the promptings of avarice, conspired to uphold the institution. The same considerations, with many on the other side, it is too true, may have added to the intensity of the struggle; but chiefly the abuses of slavery on the one side, feeding, as it were, on increase of appetite, and the strong moral conviction of its injustice on the other, its wrong to the black and its injury to the white race, urged our people on to the gigantic struggle now just closed. But is it closed? The boom of the cannon is not heard, the crash of musketry has ceased, and the saber has been returned to its scabbard, but the nation seems yet in doubt. The air is tainted with suspicion that all is not right. The war was waged by rebels that injustice might yet live. Within the Union it was thought it could not live; hence it would go beyond the nation's jurisdiction. Justice is strong because it is the weapon of Omnipotence. Slavery in form has died. Let it die now, in fact and in truth, and the national life is assured. It was a feeling of conscious right that gave us success in the recent struggle. Now that success has come, we propose again to reject the truth, to turn our faces in shame from an honest conviction and barter once more eternal justice for expediency.

The President undertook to reconstruct on the white basis. The negro is again forgotten. A few negroes voted in the reorganization of Louisiana under Mr. Lincoln, and last March, every Democrat in Congress voted against admitting her Representatives under that organization. The other States are now reorganized, under what we are told is the same plan, and every Democrat here now clamors for immediate admission. Why is this? Is it because the negro has been excluded or because the former rebel has voted? Our Democratic friends here certainly have no interest in common with rebellion, and hence their present enthusiastic support, of what they call the President's reconstruction policy, must spring from the fact that the negro has been excluded. They see, in this, a white man's Government. The President having excluded him in the first work of reorganization, his hopes are, perhaps, gone forever. If loyal whites only had been admitted by the President to the ballot-box, those who opposed secession until treason had overwhelmed them, they perhaps would have constructed the organic law of those States in such manner as to leave hope for the negro's enfranchisement hereafter. But who expected to find favor for the black man from the returning soldiers of Lee and Johnston's armies? With the political power in the hands of such men, the future is easily divined.

Do not understand me, Mr. President, as complaining that the negro was not permitted to vote. I only urge that his right was at least equal to that of rebels. If rebels must vote, the negro ought to vote also. I will make no offensive comparisons; but to those men who have carried mourning into every household in the land, who rejected all counsel and heedlessly rushed on to the country's ruin, who must be remembered in the long future when poverty parts with its hard earnings to pay the public debt, who would murder a whole section to secure the privilege of robbing a race, I owe nothing. The loyal Democrats owe them nothing. My friend from Indiana, [Mr. HENDRICKS,] who sits before me, and whom they defeated for Governor of Indiana in 1860, owes them nothing—except mercy, and with him I go to grant them mercy. Let him go with me for justice in behalf of others.

I know it is often said that unless pardoned rebels could vote, the President would have had no white basis or population to reconstruct upon. This, Mr. President, is a mistake. Thousands were forced into active measures against the Government. Many loyal men in the beginning, I know, afterward became disloyal, but had an oath been prescribed by the President for white voters, formerly qualified under their respective State constitutions, which would have excluded the active and willing disloyalist, who not only went into rebellion himself, but forced his neighbor in, we would now have organizations of a different character in the southern States, and such as would have given the President but little trouble. It may not be that such governments as would suit every man in Congress, or even a majority, would have resulted from any system whatever, but I contend that a more loyal basis might have been secured among the whites.

The white population of the eleven seceding States in 1860 was 5,449,463, the free colored population was 182,760, and the slave population was 3,521,110, making a total population of 9,153,333, three fifths being white and two fifths colored. I look now to the vote of 1860 for President. Of course I cannot give the vote of South Carolina, because the presidential electors in that State have always been chosen by the Legislature. But in the other States the vote for Mr. Breckinridge was 416,592, the vote for Mr. Bell 345,919, and the vote for Mr. Douglas 57,723, making an entire vote of 820,234. He who lived in the slaveholding States at the beginning of this rebellion knows perfectly well that those who voted for Bell and those who voted for Douglas were Union men.

I know it perfectly well. There is not a Senator within the hearing of my voice, who lives in a border State, that does not at once recognize the fact. Four hundred and sixteen thousand men in the South then voted for Mr. Breckinridge, and 493,000 of them voted for Bell and Douglas. Then nearly half the people of those States were Union men.

An oath reaching the past conduct of these men, a pardon, if you please, on the condition that the active, blatant rebel of 1860 and 1861 should refrain from participating in amending that which he wished to destroy, and which he would now as gladly destroy as ever, would have given us liberal reorganization, institutions of vitality, filled with the spirit of the age, devoid of prejudice, and opening up the brightest hopes for the melioration of the poor, whether white or black.

But we have to take things as they are. The President has acted, and his governments are before us. I asked him during the progress of reconstruction but one thing, and that was, if he reconstructed on the rebel vote to reconstruct on the negro vote also. It may have been wrong to do so, but if he had included it, his governments may have worked more harmoniously than they do. This is all I ever asked, all I now ask. There is nothing that I crave for self or friends at the hands of mortal man. So much, I thought, could be demanded of justice, so much be craved in the mercy of God. [Applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. Foor in the chair.) Order!

Mr. HENDERSON. But if the active rebel vote had been excluded, I was willing to respect the constitutions of those States as they existed before the rebellion, and trust to Union men to so fix the franchise—and they would have done so—as to secure fidelity to the Union and peace to themselves. If to secure these ends the negro vote had become essential, it would have been granted. The Senate will pardon me if I refer to some remarks made by me at the last session of Congress on this subject of reconstruction. I read from volume two, Congressional Globe, second session, Thirty-Eighth Congress, page 1070:

"When citizens of a State rebel and take up arms against the General Government they lose their rights as citizens of the United States, and they necessarily forfeit those rights and franchises in their respective States which depend on United States citizenship."

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] interrupted me during the speech, and in reply to a question put by him, I said:

"I have already explained my positions on these subjects. I am in favor of the loyal men governing the State. If that be the government of the few, it results from the voluntary disloyalty of the many. They, of their own will, relinquish the right to govern themselves under the Constitution, and as they have no legal right to govern otherwise they cannot govern at all. I can no more compel them to govern themselves according to the Constitution than I can compel a loyal man to vote who refuses to do so. As to the oligarchy of skin or color, I can tell the Senator again that the question of suffrage is with the States. If they confer the franchise on the negro, I surely do not object."

"Mr. President, I say that the only way to crush out disloyalty and bring back peace in this country is to let the loyal men of the seceded States form State governments, and let us uphold them. That is the means upon which we must sooner or later rely to reestablish peace and restore union."

I do not think that it is necessary to the republican principle that the majority, although rebels, should govern, and therefore I took issue with the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. WADE] at the last session. If a majority of the people of a State become disloyal, why cannot the minority rule?

I want State governments, indeed they must exist or the national Government is incomplete. Without a State Legislature no State can be represented in this body. Without a Governor or Legislature no State can ask for protection against domestic violence. But if a majority of qualified voters in a State are disloyal and are resolved to overthrow the national Government, you must destroy their power for mischief. Do you destroy their power by leaving them in possession of the State government, where they may levy taxes on the loyal men and use their money in waging war? You do not deny the right of the nation to expel from office, the State officials, whom these men have put in power to accomplish the objects of their treason. You do not deny the right of the nation to shoot and kill this majority when it opposes your power. You do not hesitate to step in with military power to protect the loyal minority against this majority. You admit the power to remedy. Then why is there no power to prevent? We have been told that "an ounce of prevention is better than a pound of cure." Our Constitution, it seems, is made on no such idea.

Mr. WADE. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HENDERSON. Certainly; I am seeking light.

Mr. WADE. How, practically, can one-tenth of the people of a State rule that State on republican principles?

Mr. HENDERSON. I am not speaking about the theoretical idea of republicanism. I am speaking of republicanism according to the Constitution of the United States, and I know of no other republicanism in a legal point of view; that is, in all my conduct here I must be guided by that Constitution. I am sworn to be so guided. If a majority in a State, opposed to the Federal Government, have a right to rule, they can secede legally. I admit the theory that all men should vote in the State if it can be carried out. But even on the subject of republicanism in a State does the Senator not know that for a number of years, the majority of the people of South Carolina have been slaves, who had no part, lot, or share in the Government? Does he not know that a majority of the people of South Carolina and Mississippi—I mean the slaves—were always debarred of any right in the Government, either national or State? I am considering the Constitution as it is, not as he and I would have it.

Mr. WADE. I said upon republican principles, not aristocratical principles, for I know that one man could govern a State on those principles.

Mr. HENDERSON. South Carolina was one of the original thirteen. Let me ask the Senator if South Carolina had not a republican constitution, in the eye of the supreme law, the Constitution of the United States?

Mr. WADE. No; she never had.

Mr. HENDERSON. Then was there an error in the understanding of our forefathers; they certainly must have deceived themselves when they made the instrument.

Mr. WADE. They were mistaken.

Mr. HENDERSON. That may be. Our forefathers may have made many mistakes. I have no doubt they did. One of them I would correct, and that is what we are considering. They made a mistake in leaving slavery to exist at all. But they did leave it, and it brought war. I think if we leave wrong to fester, again, sometime in the future, we shall have another war.

Mr. WADE. I am with you there.

Mr. HENDERSON. I hope you will be with me in many things. But all this is outside of the question. I submit to the Senator, have the disloyal men in a State the right to govern, if they are in a majority?

Mr. WADE. In my judgment they have not.

Mr. HENDERSON. Then have not the loyal minority the right to erect a State government?

Mr. WADE. My opinion is that where only one-tenth of the population of any State are loyal, that that State is in such a condition that it cannot govern itself upon republican principles.

Mr. HENDERSON. Suppose there are five hundred only, less than half in the State of Tennessee or the State of North Carolina, who are loyal; will the Senator govern that State for all time by military authority as a province of the Government of the United States rather than let the loyal minority make a State government for themselves? If we were to do that, we might pervert and overturn our whole republican system. We cannot afford to keep large standing armies for such a purpose, unless we intend to destroy our own liberties. Then let us permit the loyal minority to govern. In Missouri one-third, if not more, of our entire population, has been disfranchised by the new constitution of the State, and some say that a majority have been disfranchised by it if enforced. Will he turn away Missouri from representation here, if it be ascertained that a majority of her people are disfranchised? The people have voted on it and have made it the law of the State; and any man who cannot take the oath prescribed in it, of course cannot vote; and if it should turn out that a majority of the people have been disfranchised, the Senator from Ohio must drive me from the Senate because Missouri is not a republican State.

Mr. WADE. I apprehend that the rebels will try to drive you out.

Mr. HENDERSON. It is the duty of the Government of the United States to recognize the loyal people of a State; let them form a constitution, and when that is done, admit them here, and when you have admitted them, protect them, if necessary, by the military authority of the country. Did you not protect Rhode Island a few years ago in the very same way? There is no doubt that a majority of the people of Rhode Island were in favor of the Dorr government. Nobody doubted it, and yet this Government maintained the minority there, because it was the established government.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Let me ask the Senator whether a military force would not be necessary in order to protect and sustain the government of a minority?

Mr. HENDERSON. I have felt the difficulty that the Senator presents; I have thought of this question much; I might answer him by saying that when a majority are disloyal and the minority are without State government, you need a much larger army. For all then is anarchy. If you have a State government, you have civil rules at least, and machinery to dispense justice. Hence you have order. If in the one case you have to use an army, in the other your army may be smaller, because the civil power gives its assistance. Again, the State may soon furnish its own police. It is much better for the people of each State to have their own police than for us to send an army among them. Military power is dangerous in peace. If it has to be used let it be in aid of law. If the rebel majority make the law you cannot aid it, and you have not only to overthrow the State law, but you must enforce an adverse policy. That, too, must be done by courts-martial and not by courts-civil. That is the very difficulty the President now has with his new organizations. They are not animated by the spirit of the loyal minority, but by the rebel majority. This is the mistake, and the great mistake.

The country wants the Union restored. Many good men are astonished everywhere that the Representatives are not admitted. The President committed himself to his plan of reconstruction, and his pride demands that he should succeed. The country is greatly indebted to the President for the much he has done in securing, at least, outward manifestations of loyalty by the people of the South. It will be remembered that almost every act of convention or Legislature, overthrowing the traditions and heresies of treason, have been secured by the direct interference of the President. The abolishment of slavery, the adoption of the constitutional amendment, the repudiation of the rebel debt, nullifying the ordinances of secession, and giving civil rights to the freedmen, may all be traced to that interference. If none but loyal men had been represented in those conventions, these and many other proper things might have been done without that dictation by the President, which upsets the entire theory of his plan. The President has entire confidence in these organizations, because, perhaps, they have done all he asked them to do, and promise to do more if he demands it. He does not ask them to give suffrage to the negro, and although it is and ever will be against their own interest to deny it, yet, as they have ever done, they consult prejudice rather than right or interest, and promise all except that. They would give that, if the President had asked it. But he was personally, perhaps, opposed to it, and at once the Constitution rose up in his way, and though he could attach any condition to pardon, and require other things in the judgment of some men much worse, though he could dictate other measures and did dictate, yet this would be a dangerous usurpation of power. If three and a half million men were disfranchised and robbed of all political power, there was no usurpation in that, no tyranny, no danger to the republican principle.

Some members of Congress are afraid that these organizations are a kind of Grecian horse; that they are full of armed men, and when once in the citadel they may rush forth and open the gates to the returning Democracy. Whether there are any armed men in them or not, the Democrats think so, and they demand immediate recognition. They have stimulated the President's pride, and he interprets these very reasonable fears of his friends as a reflection upon his loyalty and integrity. All that now exists between the President and Congress comes from this simple statement. The President is willing to trust them now. Congress asks time to look in and see if there is any danger. The President admits that Congress has a right to do so, but those who opposed his election and who have opposed his policy up to this moment tell him that this is an attack on his Administration.

Finally, the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER,] always doing some imprudent thing, I cannot always be near him to tell him better, [laughter,] makes his whitewashing speech, and then the President sees a conspiracy against his policy. Parties are busy attempting to widen the breach, and on last Saturday a deputation comes up from the Virginia Legislature bringing to the President resolutions of that body, indorsing his reconstruction policy, but saying nothing about fealty to the Constitution or loyalty to the Government. Mr. Baldwin, the spokesman of the delegation, in presenting the resolutions, said:

"The people of Virginia and their representatives accept the result and abide by the consequences of the late contest."

"Accept" and "abide by!" "Chief among the results," he said—

"is the universal conviction that the Union of these States is an established fact. We recognize this Government as our Government, its Constitution and the rights which it promises as our rights."

It was their Government in 1861. The Constitution, save and excepting slavery, was then as it now is, and the rights it secured are no more sacred than in 1861, when the Gosport navy-yard was destroyed and Harper's Ferry was surrendered to rebel soldiers. If those rights are more sacred, it is simply because the negro is now entitled to freedom. But Mr. Baldwin says, further:

"Another great result is the final overthrow of slavery. This has been concluded by constitutional amendment. The General Assembly of the State of Virginia is engaged earnestly in consideration of these subjects, and we can only say that whatever policy may be adopted will be for the moral culture and improvement of the condition of the freedmen; and to treat them with harshness and injustice is against our feelings."

Mr. Baldwin says that great results have flowed from the war, and one of the greatest is the overthrow of slavery. Virginia accepts this result and recognizes the Government as her Government, and the Constitution thus changed as her Constitution. We are here assured that Virginia has gone to work to secure the "moral culture" of the negro and to "improve" his condition. If this be so, it is a little strange that General Terry interferes by military order to set aside a solemn act of that Legislature, designed, as he says, to sell all the negroes into slavery again under the pretext of vagrancy. But if the Virginia Legislature, in the process of reorganization, can busy itself in matters pertaining to the moral culture of the negro and the improvement of his condition as a citizen of the country, why is it that the national Legislature, through which, against the bloody protest of Virginia, the negro has become free, cannot aid and assist the reconstructed Virginia Legislature, in this humane and commendable work, without being held up all over the country as radicals, Jacobins, and Red Republicans? If Mr. Baldwin can accept the freedom of the slave, why cannot he accept that which will keep him free? I say nothing of the antecedents of Mr. Baldwin and those who came with him.

Mr. WILSON. Allow me to ask the Senator if this Mr. Baldwin is the Mr. Baldwin who was a member of the confederate congress.

Mr. HENDERSON. I think so. Of course it is the same.

Mr. WILSON. I should like to know if it is the same Mr. Baldwin who nominated General Lee the other day, as the next Governor of that State, in the Virginia Legislature.

Mr. HENDERSON. The same man, I think.

Mr. SUMNER. And he has been addressing the President of the United States!

Mr. HENDERSON. I do not object to his addressing the President of the United States. That is not my complaint. Senators run ahead of me and break up the connection of my thought. I cannot think so much as others, nor so fast. I was going to say that my objection consists not in the appearance of Mr. Baldwin and his associates. I would have them come, and come often. I like to hear expressions in favor of the Constitution as it now is. I like to be assured of a returning sense of loyalty. Congress only asks to be assured of the sincerity of the professions. The President seems to be satisfied. He commenced, however, with the work of reconstruction last May. Congress commenced only in December. When Congress shall have been engaged at the work as long as the President, it may be equally satisfied. One should scarcely be upbraided for a want of belief in any proposition, unless he has neglected the opportunities for information. Conviction in the human mind comes from the evidences adduced. Before we believe any proposition, and especially such a proposition as the sudden conversion of the people of the seceded States to unaffected and sincere loyalty, we should be excused for demanding the proofs necessary to establish it. I complain that the President himself being satisfied takes it for granted that Congress ought to be satisfied, and in reply to Mr. Baldwin uses some expressions that tend to no good. There is no use of controversy between the Executive and Congress. I profess to be, and am a friend of the President's, and shall use no language, even in expressing differences with him, that may tend to excite the country against him. His language in this reply will be interpreted as an attack upon certain members of Congress, at the least, and possibly upon Congress itself, should a difference hereafter spring up between them.

He says, in effect, that one rebellion has been put down against the southern men, and now he intends, if necessary, to put down a rebellion against somebody else. Of course I am not included in this new conspiracy or rebellion. My friend from Kentucky, [Mr. GUTHRIE,] the other day, in a moment of excitement, almost threatened the dissolution of the Union again. This is not oil on the troubled waters. The President says, in his reply to the Virginia delegation, as follows:

"The Government, in the assertion of its powers, and in the maintenance of the principles of the Constitution, has taken hold of one extreme, and with the strong arm of physical power has put down the rebellion. Now, as we swing around the circle of the Union with a fixed and unalterable determination to stand by it, if we find the counterpart or the duplicate of the same spirit that played to this feeling and these persons in the South, this other extreme which stands in the way must get out of it, and the Government must stand unshaken and unmoved on its basis. The Government must be preserved."

The Senator can now understand.

Mr. SUMNER. What is the meaning of that? I do not understand it.

Mr. HENDERSON. I do not know that I understand it, but if I do, it means the rebels and the radicals have played see-saw, and he intends to stop it. That is the whole of it. I want to be plain. I will read the former sentence, however, and then perhaps the Senator can understand it for himself. The President says:

"I do not intend to say anything personal, but you know as well as I do that at the beginning, and, indeed, before the beginning of the recent gigantic struggle between the different sections of the country, there were extreme men South, and there were extreme men North."

The Senator is one of the extremest I ever knew; but the President proceeds:

"I might make use of a homely figure (which is sometimes as good as any other, even in the illustration of great and important questions) and say that it has been hammer at one end of the line and anvil at the other; and this great Government, the best the world ever saw, was kept upon the anvil and hammered before the rebellion, and it has been hammered since the rebellion; and there seems to be a disposition to continue the hammering until the Government shall be destroyed. I have opposed that system always, and I oppose it now."

The Senator will now understand that he is hammering at the other end of the line, and he may get hammered soon. [Laughter.]

Mr. SUMNER. I do not understand any such thing.

Mr. HENDERSON. The Senator is slow to understand. I hope it comes from conscious innocence. But, Mr. President, to be serious. I deprecate this language, it tends to no good. It comes, I fear, more from feeling than from judgment formed on a proper consideration of the case. Great interests are at stake, and they who now wield the power of this nation, both in the executive and legislative departments, have a grave responsibility on their shoulders. If mistakes were heretofore made in the organization of the Government, now is the time to correct them. Our forefathers were wise men, perhaps the wisest that any age has given us. No one doubts their integrity, their unselfish devotion to true republican principles. If they had carried out their own repeatedly expressed convictions on the subject of slavery, this war of the rebellion would not have come. We all know that considerations of an early union, the necessity for protection against foreign Powers, as well as the supposed immediate demands of trade and commerce, added to an indisposition or absolute fear to grapple with the avarice and prejudice connected with slavery, induced them in the formation of the Government to ignore the condition of the African slave.

They mournfully contented themselves with keeping the word "slave" out of the Constitution. They scorned to sanction, by direct words, its existence, but yet provided, under another name, that the nation's power should be used to mend, when broken, the chain of human bondage. They excused themselves and the Government they made, by putting the responsibility on the States. They hoped, indeed they expressed the hope, that the States would soon emancipate, and they framed a Constitution admirably suited to that condition of things. Slavery was inconsistent with the very principle on which they built. To save the pain of cutting, they consented to leave one fiber of the cancer, hoping that nature would soon heal it. Nature did not heal it, but the cancer grew from year to year until the whole body-politic became diseased. The last five years have been spent in a grand surgical operation to save the life of the patient. The cancer has been cut to its roots. The patient is suffering, but he is stronger than when the operation commenced. Who is the timid surgeon that would now hesitate to remove the last particle of disease? If there be one, that man will be responsible hereafter for much suffering. Some say, leave it with the States; they will cure themselves. The State governments are a necessary part of the national Government. The President tells us one cannot exist without the other. They are the limbs of the human body. Would you partially remove disease from the arm and then tell the arm to cure itself? Would you half cure the heel and foolishly trust to nature for the balance simply because the heel is so far from the seat of life? A limb sick, makes the body sick, and he who would preserve health and vitality must ward off disease at every point.

I have been led to these remarks by looking at the present condition of the southern States. Is there no symptom of disease there? All over the country Congress is denounced because it does not accept the President's healing or restoration of those States as a perfect cure. Is the old disease eradicated? If so, Congress ought to admit their Representatives, and it deserves the denunciation of the country in default of speedy action. Does the President himself believe that the cure is perfect? If we admit them they must henceforth be treated as loyal States. We must give them the exercise of all local and municipal power not granted to Congress. In that case we should at once remove martial law. The privilege of the writ of habeas corpus should be restored. It is now suspended by the will of the President. When once admitted, the condition of the freedman and the poor white, must be left to them. The suffrage cannot then be changed without their free consent, uninfluenced by any considerations. If admitted, and they are strong enough to repudiate the public debt, withdraw the pensions from the wounded veterans, or deny the claim of loyal States for expenses and loyal men for damages, the country must accept it, and accept it in peace. I do not fear many of these things, but the President himself seems to fear much. If he is satisfied with these organizations, why does he not treat them better?

During the session of the Georgia convention Mr. Seward telegraphed to the provisional governor, as follows:

"Your several telegrams have been received. The President of the United States cannot recognize the people of any State having resumed the relations of loyalty to the Union that admits as legal obligations contracted or debts created in that name to promote the war of the rebellion.

"WM. H. SEWARD."

Why? Was not Georgia an independent State? The President said it was. Did not Georgia have a right to assume and pay any debts she pleased? What right had Mr. Seward to telegraph to the convention of Georgia that Georgia should not pay a debt? And yet my Democratic friends say the President's policy must be sustained. What policy? Is it the policy of letting the President do as he pleases, reorganize a State government, and wherever it runs counter to his views to stop it in its legislation and say, "Thus far shall thou go and no further." But if Congress undertakes to interfere, not interfere, but hesitate, to sanction these as perfect and legitimate State governments, they are a set of Jacobins, "French revolutionists," "dangerous men," who ought to be turned out at the point of the bayonet. The President calls it "hammering at the other end of the line."

The State of Tennessee has been reorganized. How reorganized? The President himself was the beginner and the originator of it, as the military governor of Mr. Lincoln. The Tennessee members are here seeking admission. But the President has put General Thomas at Nashville. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. TRUMBULL] the other day presented his proposition here, putting judicial powers in the hands of the military, for certain purposes in the seceding States. It was to protect negroes, when discriminated against in their civil rights, by State legislation in those States. The press all over the country opposed to these so-called Jacobins announced the fact that the Senator from Illinois, the great leader of the new revolution, had introduced a most dangerous proposition, carrying military men down South to usurp the entire political power of the revolted States and to administer mock justice at the point of the bayonet. I did not like it myself. I am afraid of even the appearance of military rule. But let us go on with the case of Tennessee. The President usurps these powers, I should say uses them, and the President is right, but the Jacobins are wrong. Will you tell me the difference? Is not General Thomas put in command in Tennessee by the President himself? Yes. Is he not kept there by the President? Yes. Did not General Thomas under the President's orders arrest a bishop of the diocese of Alabama, the other day, and imprison him? Some said it was only because the bishop would not pray for the President. And yet General Thomas is not dismissed. But suppose Congress should undertake to interfere with the worship of the Christian religion down South, what would be said about it? Let me read an order issued by General Thomas a few days ago. It is a letter addressed to Messrs. Guild & Smith, attorneys-at-law, at Nashville:

HEADQUARTERS DIVISION OF THE TENNESSEE,
NASHVILLE, TENN., January 17, 1866.

SIR: It has been reported to Major General Thomas that you, as counsel for one John Allen, of Smith county, have instituted suit against James S. Burham, of Sumner county, late captain first Tennessee mounted infantry, for rent for the said Allen's farm while the said farm was under the control of the United States as abandoned property.

This is clearly a violation of General Orders, No. 29, from these headquarters, often published in the newspapers of the State, and must have been seen by you. He directs me to say to you that you will at once cause said suit to be discontinued and dismissed forever, failing in which you, John Allen, and the circuit court clerk of Sumner county will be arrested and brought to trial before a military commission.

By command of Major General Thomas:
R. W. JOHNSON,
Brevet Brigadier General, U. S. A.

Messrs. GUILD & SMITH, Attorneys-at-law.

Mr. HENDRICKS. How do you like it?

Mr. HENDERSON. No, the proper question is, how do you like it? Why, Mr. President, if this is not hammering on one end of the line, or the middle of the line, I do not know what it is. These attorneys bring a suit under a State law, and the military officer in chief command, under the direction of the President, announces in a letter to them that they will be arrested and imprisoned and tried before a military commission if they go on with the suit; the clerk of the court is notified that if he issues process he will be seized. Of course the letter does not include the judge, because the judge cannot take cognizance or jurisdiction of the case until the writ of summons has been returned; but if the clerk should happen to issue process, and it should be served, I suppose General Thomas would go further, and if the judge should undertake to render judgment in the case, the judge himself would be seized and hammered, under the judgment of a military court.

Mr. President, I have said this whole supposed controversy between the President and Congress is perfectly ridiculous to me. Why is the country convulsed from one end to the other now about the return of these States? Did they not go out voluntarily? Did we not beg them to stay? Was not the life of every man in this land endangered by their conduct? Have they not given us untold sorrows and afflictions in defiance of almost base entreaty and much gratuitous, but scorned advice? I told them these difficulties would come. They went. And now, because I do not vote them back the very moment they present themselves—before the President himself will abide by their laws, indeed while he feels bound daily to set them aside—I am a Jacobin, a leveller, a maniac on the subject of negro rights. Some of these gentlemen around me may be dangerous men; I do not know but they are; I am not. I claim to be conservative. I have always been conservative. If entitled to the designation of radical at all, it must be a conservative radical. Now, sir, here is General Terry, of Fort Fisher notoriously—

Mr. WADE. Fame.

Mr. HENDERSON. I beg pardon, it is fame, and not notoriety. What does he say in regard to a law of the State of Virginia? He is in command at Richmond. Was he not put there by the President of the United States, and can he not be removed by him to-day? Certainly. What has he done? The State of Virginia a short time ago passed a vagrant act. Here is a general order issued by General Terry, dated Richmond, January 24, 1866:

"By a statute passed at the present session of the Legislature of Virginia, entitled 'A bill providing for the punishment of vagrants,' it is enacted, among other things, that any justice of the peace, upon the complaint of any of certain officers therein named, may issue his warrant for the apprehension of any person alleged to be a vagrant and cause such person to be apprehended and brought before him; and that if upon due examination said justice of the peace shall find that such person is a vagrant within the definition of vagrancy contained in said statute, he shall issue his warrant directing such person to be employed for a term not exceeding three months, and by any constable of the county wherein the proceedings are had be hired out for the best wages which can be procured, his wages to be applied to the support of himself and his family," &c.

This act applies to white people too. The Senator from Illinois will notice that it does not apply to the negro alone; it applies to all persons; and yet General Terry says that it is made a mere pretense for selling negroes into slavery, and his order concludes as follows:

"It is therefore ordered that no magistrate, civil officer, or other person shall in any way or manner apply or attempt to apply the provisions of said statute to any colored person in this department."

They may sell white men, since this order, into slavery and the negroes may buy them, but General Terry says they shall not sell a negro into slavery; the white people may soon find themselves sold out in the Old Dominion to the blacks and the sale enforced by military law, and yet the President sustains all this. The President placed General Terry there and may remove him or overrule his orders. The President sustains him, however. But because we hesitate to regard the State of Virginia as fully reorganized, and now devotedly attached to the Union and resolved to sustain the Constitution directly in the teeth of these acts, the President strongly thinks we are "hammering at one end of the line."

Mr. SUMNER. Allow me to ask my friend if the President did not probably refer to the Democrats as hammering at the other end of the line.

Mr. HENDERSON. My impression is from all the circumstances surrounding the case, that the Senator from Massachusetts is one of the men alluded to. I think I can say to him as Nathan said unto David, "Thou art the man." [Laughter.] The Senator certainly did make an imprudent speech when the report on the condition of the southern States came in. The President should know that the Senator from Massachusetts makes many imprudent speeches. It is utterly impossible to keep him straight unless some more conservative man, like myself, can whisper him right. [Laughter.] If I could have reached him in time, I am satisfied, he would never have used the term "white washing." [Laughter.] I am fearful the President attaches too much importance to this imprudent speech. We pay no attention to it here.

Again, has not General Sickles issued an order at Charleston, with twenty-three sections, making up an entire civil code for the government of South Carolina, the Legislature being in session?

Mr. WILSON. The most comprehensive ever made.

Mr. HENDERSON. Certainly, taking almost the entire government of South Carolina under military control and military power. The President can do this thing—I say the President, because Generals Terry, Sickles, and Thomas, and all these men act through the President only—the President of the United States can do all these things, and Congress cannot help him. Congress never saw business of this sort going on, that it did not want a hand in it, and I think we have a right to have some hand in it. The President admitted the right, and he is now estopped from denying it.

SENATE.

General Grant issued an order, some time ago, right here in the city of Washington, immediately under the President's eye, and he certainly must have known all about it, which is general, and applies to all the eleven seceded States. It is as follows:

[General Orders, No. 3.]

WAR DEPARTMENT,
ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
WASHINGTON, January 12, 1866.

To protect persons against improper civil suits and penalties in late rebellious States:

Military division and department commanders, whose commands embrace or are composed of any of the late rebellious States, and who have not already done so, will at once issue and enforce orders protecting from prosecution or suits in the State or municipal courts of such State, all officers and soldiers of the armies of the United States, and all persons thereto attached, or in anywise thereto belonging, subject to military authority, charged with offenses or acts done in their military capacity, or pursuant to orders from proper military authority; and to protect from suit or prosecution all loyal citizens, or persons charged with offenses done against the rebel forces, directly or indirectly, during the existence of the rebellion; and all persons, their agents and employees, charged with the occupancy of abandoned lands or plantations, or the possession or custody of any kind of property whatever, who occupied, used, possessed, or controlled the same pursuant to the order of the President, or any of the civil or military departments of the Government, and to protect them from any penalties or damages that may have been or may be pronounced, or adjudged in said courts in any of such cases; and also protecting colored persons from prosecutions in any of said States charged with offenses for which white persons are not prosecuted or punished in the same manner and degree.

By command of Lieutenant General Grant:

E. D. TOWNSEND,
Assistant Adjutant General.

That order is substantially the bill of the honorable Senator from Illinois, the bill that this Congress has passed, called the Freedmen's Bureau bill, and which it is understood all over the country the President will veto. Why veto? Did not General Grant issue this order with the consent of the President of the United States? Can there be any doubt about it?

Now, sir, is not all this controversy perfectly ridiculous? It seems to me so. But for its serious importance, the apparent earnestness of persons and parties in this maze of inconsistency and palpable contradiction would be amusing.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If the Senator will allow me, I should like to ask him one question: whether he reads these orders of the military commanders for the purpose of approving them, or for the purpose of condemning them, or simply for the information of the Senate?

Mr. HENDERSON. I do not know that the Senator has any right to catechise me as to the purpose with which I read a paper to the Senate. But he certainly cannot misunderstand my object.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I disclaim the right; but when so able a Senator is addressing the body, of course we would like to know what he means by the evidences that he brings before us.

Mr. HENDERSON. The Senator addressing the body is not so able, but it is a little strange he has not already indicated the ever quick and ready mind of the Senator from Indiana what his purpose is. Certainly he has displayed no ability whatever if he has failed to make himself understood by that Senator. I have no objection, however, to making the statement in answer to the question so plain, "that he may run, that readeth it."

The idea has gone abroad, and it is most carefully urged, that Congress has resolved to govern the southern States as provinces, that the committee of fifteen was organized to carry out this purpose. The party that opposed Mr. Johnson's selection take this opportunity to announce their devotion to the Union, and clamor for immediate restoration. Of course military rule is denounced. This is a strong card. I dislike military law as much as any man. The whole country dislikes it. Even the soldier, reared under our institutions, who enforces it, dislikes it. Congress is arraigned for taxing the southern people without representation. This is another powerful argument, an argument that could not be answered, if the very organizations now presenting themselves did not propose to tax half their people, for all time to come, without any voice or representation now, and without hope of it in the future.

Again, we are charged with being disunionists. We are so designated in the columns of leading papers. And why is it? The people are taught to believe that harmony and peace and good-will reign supreme in the southern States; that they have loyal governments organized, administering justice without delay, sale, or denial, and protecting all their inhabitants; that the spirit of rebellion is far removed from them, and they only need an opportunity now to show their old proverbial love and attachment for the Union. The war was waged for the Union, and the people long to see it restored. This natural desire is seized upon to array hostility to Congress. The President is praised; his reconstruction policy indorsed in the strongest terms. Lincoln's reconstruction policy, in form the same, but differing only in that it brought Union men to Congress and secured another State to the Union in case of confederate success, was denounced by the same men. Congress is arraigned for the Freedmen's Bureau bill. I do not like it myself, and only supported it as a means of getting what is right. I had nothing to do with the committee of fifteen, and I hold now that the House of Representatives cannot control my vote, against my will, in the admission of a Senator from one of the seceding States. No law of Congress can control it. The States are in the Union, but in the President's view they are not yet out of rebellion. The Attorney General says they are not, and the President treats them worse than provinces. If the rebellion is over and the cause of it removed, why these proceedings which I have enumerated?

Mr. President, I think I have shown that the Executive is estopped from complaining of Congress. Political parties cannot consistently applaud the President and then say one word against Congress. Does the President design continuing this military rule after the Representatives are admitted? If necessary now, will it be less so after admission? My friend from Indiana, however, with all his instincts against these things is no doubt ready to join in the general cry and say, great is the President and accursed be the Jacobins.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I have not said that.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am glad of it. Many others have said it and do now daily say it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. My position with respect to the President of the United States is just this: I am not under that sort of obligation which is known as party obligation. I expect to indorse and approve in his conduct everything that my judgment and conscience approve. The Senator would not ask me to do less, and I think he would not ask me to do more.

Mr. HENDERSON. Certainly not.

Mr. HENDRICKS. My modesty would prevent my appearing before this body as the peculiar champion of the President. I did not help to make him President; but what is right in his Administration I shall support, and I think I may say now that perhaps I will find something in his conduct to approve which some of the Senators about me may disapprove.

Mr. HENDERSON. I was aware of the modesty of my friend. [Laughter.] And I am aware of another thing; I am aware of his distinguished ability and his sagacity in seizing upon anything, anything fair and legitimate, of course, that may be necessary to build up the party with which he thinks the best interests of the country are connected. His modesty will also prevent his telling us whether he approves these acts of the President or not.

Mr. President, I now repeat my regrets that the President has seen fit to exact at the hands of Congress a strict compliance with his policy on the subject of reconstruction. I say compliance, for I cannot interpret his speech to the Virginia delegation in any other way. I regret it, because this is no time for party excitement. The best interests of this great country cannot now be safely connected with party success. To solve our difficulties needs true patriotism, and true patriotism is too often choked out by the rank selfishness of party politics.

Mr. WILSON. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HENDERSON. Certainly.

Mr. WILSON. I want to ask him, as he is giving his opinions pretty freely, if he has any anxiety whatever in regard to the opinions of this Mr. Baldwin, or any man of that class, or any men in the country who sympathize with them, that they will be able to influence affairs in any of the States that in 1864 voted for Mr. Lincoln for President. I ask him if he does not believe that those States, by a most decisive majority, a majority larger than they gave in 1864, are to-day opposed to the admission of any of the States that have been in rebellion into these Chambers until they are so adjusted as to give proper security for the future?

Mr. HENDERSON. I have answered so many questions that I have scarcely been able to keep the true question in view. Injustice and wrong often triumph. Our only consolation is, that such triumphs cannot be permanent. I do not know how far the people will be deceived, nor how long the deception will last. The Union must be restored and this Congress must do it. It must be cemented in the everlasting principles of justice, but I want it cemented immediately.

Mr. WILSON. So do I.

Mr. HENDERSON. We cannot stand still. Work is to be done, and if we do not go forward we shall fall back. It is a crisis in our affairs, and a crisis as important as that of 1861. I am not mistaken in what I say. The rebellion is now suppressed. The rebels are restless and discontented. Some loyal men have become frightened at what they term the dangerous extremes of radicalism, and, after having been the most radical of all radicals, they are ready to fly to the arms of rebels and seek safety in their conservatism. It is an epoch in our history from which will date new political organizations. New schemes of personal ambition will soon be developed. The pride of our military chieftains will be appealed to, and cunning plans laid to secure their favor. This period is similar to that in English history, when Charles I became a prisoner in the hands of those who fought for the rights of man against the unlimited prerogative of the Crown. It is the condition of France when Louis XVI was a prisoner, and the combined enemies of the republic had melted away in the blaze of republican ardor. Let us avoid the excesses of the conquerors in those cases, but let us be firm in securing the legitimate results of the victory. Those results may be known to all who know the causes of the war. The war was another contest of prerogative with inalienable right, an effort to perpetuate privileges of the few, at the expense of the toil and tears of millions. It was to sanctify, by human law, what was condemned in the law of God. It was, in fine, to ignore the very existence of millions of people in the government and laws of a country, that claims the highest civilization, the largest freedom and the broadest charity for mankind.

In the judgment of Congress these dangerous and anti-republican notions have again crept into and are likely to be conserved in the new organizations, and Congress will likely demand that they be eradicated before admission. It is quite certain that Congress is not satisfied with the present condition of things, and if we determine not to accept them, the decision should be made at once.

Some say we cannot go behind the action of the President. He has pardoned the rebels, and that pardon restored them to all the rights of citizenship, and among those rights is the right to vote. As the Constitution now stands, the regulation of the franchise belongs to the States. But surely Congress has entire control over the question of United States citizenship. Congress may make a citizen of the United States. It made many, by joint resolution, in the admission of Texas. Congress made citizens of the Stockbridge and other Indians by law, and recently it has declared, by bill already passed, the entire African race to be citizens of the United States. It seems to me that this power exists in Congress, as a great political right, irrespective of the crime of rebellion or other offense committed by the citizen himself. If this be true, then Congress may provide for an enrollment of all its citizens in the seceded States, and require an oath, or proof if you please, of original loyalty in any form to be prescribed, and in default of such oath or proof, or both, if thought necessary, the party so neglecting or refusing might be declared decitizenized. If this can be done much difficulty may be avoided, for Congress may at once provide for the erection of State governments in those States by the loyal men only. In this way the entire question of negro suffrage may be avoided. As those State governments existed at the date of secession, the negro could not vote, but at the same time, it was likewise provided, in nearly all of them, that none but citizens of the United States should vote. For instance, the constitution of Mississippi is in the following words:

"Every free white male person of the age of twenty-one years or upward, who shall be a citizen of the United States, and shall have resided in this State one year next preceding an election, and the last four months within the county, city, or town, in which he offers to vote shall be deemed a qualified elector."

Under the constitution of Texas; "every free male person who shall have attained the age of twenty-one years, and who shall be a citizen of the United States, &c., (Indians not taxed and Africans and the descendants of Africans excepted,") shall be entitled to vote. The constitution of Arkansas provides that—

"Every free white male citizen of the United States who shall have attained the age of twenty-one years," &c.

Shall vote. The qualifications in Florida, Alabama, Tennessee, and Louisiana are the same. The right has been exercised, I know, but may be seriously questioned, whether any but citizens of the United States may properly be permitted to vote in any State. But however that may be, the constitutions to which I have referred required this test for the elector; and if Congress can take away citizenship, the State has already taken away suffrage, and reconstruction on the basis of purely loyal men, few or many, white or black, will give State governments, with which the President would find no cause, in my judgment, to interfere by military power.

The usual answer to the exercise of this power by Congress is that it is an ex post facto law, and therefore prohibited by the Constitution, which declares that—

"No bill of attainder or ex post facto law shall be passed."

But is it in any sense an ex post facto law?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Yes, it is.

Mr. HENDERSON. The Senator says it is. An ex post facto law is one that prescribes a punishment for the commission or doing of an act, to which no penalty or forfeiture was attached at the time of doing it, or which increases the punishment after the commission of the offense. The question which I aimed to put, is, can Congress, in the exercise of its power for the safety of the nation, the preservation of the public welfare, take away the rights of citizenship for any cause whatever? We have before us a question now, the decision of which will involve the solution of this. Congress heretofore gave the right of suffrage to the people of this District in their own municipal government. Can Congress pass an act to take away that right of suffrage and put the city or District government here in the hands of a board of commissioners, to be appointed by the President or by Congress?

Mr. HENDRICKS. The Constitution of the United States places the government of the District of Columbia entirely under the control of Congress, and therefore we may do for the District of Columbia, I presume, whatever a legislative body may properly do for the people under its jurisdiction. But, with the permission of the Senator, I wish to suggest further, that if the President of the United States, as we all know he has done, has pardoned a very large portion of the people of the South upon a condition with which they have complied, they then, in my judgment, so far as the penalty of the law stands, are free from its penalties, and that to take away the right of citizenship is a penalty which we cannot impose as a punishment after the President has pardoned the parties.

Mr. HENDERSON. The Senator persists in misunderstanding me. I am not speaking now of crimes, nor the effect of the pardon. I have answered many questions, and, perhaps, not very satisfactorily. The Senator will permit me to ask him one question, as it may convey to him the best possible answer to the question he has asked me. In the State of Indiana, to-day, the uneducated are entitled to the right of suffrage. Does the Senator believe that a constitutional convention of the State of Indiana, if now in session, could deprive every man in that State who cannot read and write of the right of suffrage?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I have no doubt that the constitution of the State might be so amended as to limit the right of suffrage according to the pleasure of the convention, if that action should be approved by the people. But, sir, the question I suggested to the Senator was this: can you, after an act is done, impose a penalty not known to the law at the time the act was done? Can we, according to the sentiments which govern legislative bodies in these modern times, enact an ex post facto law, and punish a party for an act done in a manner not provided for by the law at the time the act was done, and especially after the President, or any other party having the power to pardon, has exercised that power.

Mr. HENDERSON. The Senator will remember the Federal Constitution provides that no State "shall pass any bill of attainder, ex post facto law, or law impairing the obligations of contracts." He says that the State of Indiana may pass such a law, and it will not be subject to the objection that it is ex post facto. How, then, is it that a similar act passed by Congress conflicts with a provision in the same words? The limitation is no stronger upon Congress than upon the States. The Senator might deny that the power claimed is a delegated power, but his admission estops him from calling such a law an ex post facto law. But I will discuss this subject no further. I refer to it as a way or means of legally securing loyal governments, provided the present organizations in the seceded States be rejected by Congress.

Mr. CLARK. If the Senator from Missouri will pardon me one moment, I wish to ask the Senator from Indiana a question.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not care about being drawn into this debate.

Mr. CLARK. I do not wish to draw the Senator from Indiana into the debate, but I desire to put this question: whether, if a State finds it is necessary for its own protection—not for the punishment of rebels, but to guard itself, and for its own protection—may it not exclude these men from voting? Would that be an ex post facto law?

Mr. HENDRICKS. That is not the question that I was discussing with the Senator from Missouri. I have no doubt of the entire control of the States over the question of the right of suffrage, and it may be exercised according to the pleasure of the State. The Senator from Missouri is advocating now, as a punishment upon the pardoned rebels, the withdrawal of the right and character of citizenship. As a penalty, as a punishment, I do not think it can be imposed after the President has pardoned.

Mr. HENDERSON. The Senator assigns me a position, the least defensible he can find, and then makes his attack. I try to explain, but he will not accept the explanation. I have not disputed, and for purposes of the argument I will not dispute, that the pardon of the President relieves these parties of the penalties of their crimes, provided the conditions of the pardon have been kept; but this is a separate and distinct question. I asked the Senator, even had there been no rebellion, if it is within the jurisdiction of Congress to pass an act declaring that any portion of the inhabitants of the United States are no longer citizens of the United States? Is this a political power that the body politic enjoy for their own protection and for their own purposes? That is the question. If the State of Indiana has the perfect right to enfranchise or disfranchise any portion of its population, is it not within the jurisdiction and competency of Congress to declare that certain parties are no longer citizens of the United States, even if there never had been any rebellion?

The honorable Senator from Indiana, instead of answering the question as put both by myself and by the Senator from New Hampshire, refers with apparent pleasure to the fact that the pardon having been exercised by the President, the rebels are made new men, that not only penalties are removed, but privileges, if everlost, are fully restored. I am not disposed to be technical in the premises, but if I were, it strikes me that the conduct of the President toward these organizations, since their establishment, furnishes strong evidence of the existence of a fact at the time of granting the pardon which would render it void. At the common law, to render a pardon valid, it must express with accuracy the crime intended to be forgiven. Hence, in the case of the United States vs. Steller, decided in the United States circuit court at Philadelphia, the court say that general pardons are not granted by the Crown but by Parliament, and that though our constitution may possibly confer the right, yet the right, if it exists, has never been exercised. In that case, the defendant had been indicted for "counterfeiting and uttering counterfeit coin," and there was a general verdict of guilty. In the President's certificate of pardon it was recited that the defendant had been convicted of counterfeiting, and thereupon a full and unconditional pardon was granted. The court refused to extend the pardon beyond its express terms, and hence the party was left subject to the disabilities imposed by the conviction and sentence. Another principle necessarily resulting from this was, that whenever it may be reasonably supposed that the King, when he grants a pardon, is not fully apprised of the heinousness or wickedness of the crime, or that he has been imposed upon by concealment or false representations of the party to be benefited, the pardon is void. But a more familiar principle still is the one previously alluded to, that if a pardon be granted on conditions and the conditions be not complied with the pardon is void.

39TH CONG.... 1ST SESS.

Apportionment of Representation—Mr. Henderson.

SENATE.

It may be that the President was fully advised of the character and extent of the crimes of the rebels when he issued his proclamation. It may be that no imposition was practiced on him to secure the amnesty, but if it be so, it surely cannot be that they have kept the conditions of the pardon, at least the President cannot think so. The pardon was general, and included the entire community with certain exceptions. Those exceptions could not participate in reorganization. The community pardoned did participate. In ascertaining whether there has been a compliance with the conditions, we must not, we cannot, look to isolated or individual cases. We must look to the community, the body-politic, and hold all responsible for the action of that pardoned community. The condition was that the pardoned, that is, the masses, with certain named exceptions, should "faithfully support all laws and proclamations which have been made during the existing rebellion with reference to the emancipation of slaves."

Nobody doubts now that freedom is legally secured to the negro, and nobody doubts that full civil rights attach to that condition, yet Mississippi has passed a law denying the right of the negro to hold real or personal property. The same is true, I believe, of South Carolina, and hence the order of General Sickles, to which I have referred. The President himself, through the order of General Terry, his agent at Richmond, proclaims to the world that the pardoned or reconstructed rebels of Virginia are not "supporting faithfully" the constitutional amendment or Mr. Lincoln's proclamation of freedom, but on the contrary are attempting to sell the negroes back again into slavery. And so, Mr. President, I might go on with the entire list of these States, and show that the President was originally deceived, imposed upon, in his grant of pardon originally, or else the conditions have been so badly kept, as to forfeit the benefits of the pardon, and thereby let in the power of Congress over the entire subject-matter.

But admitting the validity of the pardon to the extent claimed by the Senator from Indiana and others, does it follow that the President possessed the exclusive power to appoint provisional governors, prescribe the qualifications of voters, and revive the suspended functions of these States, without the aid of the legislative power or even the counsel of the Senate in the appointment of the necessary agents.

Mr. President, I beg pardon of the Senate for occupying so much of valuable time without coming more immediately to the discussion of the several proposed amendments to the Federal Constitution. Senators who have so frequently interrupted me with questions or otherwise, are more or less responsible. I propose now to examine the amendments—

[At this point the honorable Senator yielded the floor, at the request of gentlemen, and the Senate went into executive session.]

WEDNESDAY, February 14, 1866.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 51) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. HENDERSON continued:

Mr. PRESIDENT: On yesterday I attempted to show the condition of the southern people, the character of their new governments, and the probable foolish and unnecessary controversy now threatened between Congress and the Executive. I sincerely hope it may not come, but pride of opinion, the love of approbation, the schemes now organized for party power, the selfish plans of the future, the confidence in popular prejudices, the distrust of public justice, the recklessness of some, and the cautious timidity of others, all point to trouble. In such times, and on such occasions, I know of but one course of safety, and this is, to reject what the conscience condemns and accept that which it approves. It is to cast aside the claims of party, the considerations of temporary advantage to individuals or sections of country, and overcoming, alike, undue resentments against defeated treason and prejudices against race, to look forward only to the best interests of the Republic. The interests of the Republic are surely the best interests of mankind, and he who subjects himself to obloquy now, in order to promote those interests, may trust his vindication to a grateful future.

The country is not satisfied. The loyal people, the loyal press, members of Congress feel that some guarantee for future peace must be had before the southern representatives are admitted. The question now is, what shall be done? I have already said that if Congress will ignore the present organizations and provide at once for an expression of sentiment by the loyal whites alone in the seceded States, excluding the willing traitors, who, by oath, abjured their citizenship, the result will be, organizations loyal in character and deserving the recognition of Congress. But Congress is halting between two opinions. It is hoping that loyalty may grow up in the present organizations, as if apples may be taught to grow upon thistles by cultivation, and sweetness be extracted from the poison of the adder. I hope the committee may find evidences of loyalty and attachment to the Union in the present reconstruction, evidences so strong as to bring conviction to the unbeliever, and that we may soon have the consummation so devoutly wished for, the restoration of the Union. At the first moment when recognition in my judgment can be safely made, I intend to give my consent. The present condition of things cannot last long. It is abnormal, inconsistent with the elementary principles of our Government and the remedy must be promptly applied. Congress might have been convened last summer without inconvenience, but it was not convened; and now, in case of foolish and stubborn differences between the legislative and executive departments, our complications may be serious.

The President insists upon an unconditional indorsement of his plan. Congress stands mute. The country knows it is dissatisfied, and yet it will not speak. Congress is losing in public estimation because of its hesitancy. At last the committee of fifteen speaks, and gives us a guarantee in the shape of a constitutional amendment, whether the only one to be given I do not know, and asks us to adopt it as a security for the future. What is it? I will read it:

ARTICLE —. Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed: Provided, That whenever the elective franchise shall be denied or abridged in any State on account of race or color, all persons therein of such race or color shall be excluded from the basis of representation.

The distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] is dissatisfied with this proposed guarantee, and offers a substitute in the shape of a joint resolution of Congress, a simple act, which may be defeated by presidential veto, or which, if signed, may be repealed by this or any subsequent Congress. It is in the following words:

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in all States lately declared to be in rebellion there shall be no oligarchy, aristocracy, caste, or monopoly invested with peculiar privileges and powers, and there shall be no denial of rights, civil or political, on account of color or race; but all persons shall be equal before the law, whether in the courtroom or at the ballot-box. And this statute, made in pursuance of the Constitution, shall be the supreme law of the land, anything in the constitution or laws of any such State to the contrary notwithstanding.

Feeling that I had a right to be dissatisfied with both propositions, I have presented as a substitute for the latter measure, a resolution of amendment to the Constitution in the following simple words:

ARTICLE 14. No State, in prescribing the qualifications requisite for electors therein, shall discriminate against any person on account of color or race.

It will be remembered that the clause of the Constitution relative to representation and taxation, as it now stands, is in the following words:

"Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union, according to their respective numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years and excluding Indians not taxed, three fifths of all other persons."

This is the text of the Constitution as it now stands; and of course unless amended the entire population of the southern States, after the next census, will be reckoned in the basis of representation; that is, while the war made free-men of the slaves against the will of the southern whites, it has also the effect of increasing the political power of the seceded States, both in the lower branch of Congress and in the colleges for the election of President. The very natural feeling of the country rose against this state of affairs. The desire was rather to restrain or limit their power than to increase it; but the necessary result of leaving the Constitution as it is, is to give the increased power.

The prejudices of loyal men are naturally excited against the rebels of those States, and the conduct and character of the new organizations, now asking admission, are not such as to greatly diminish those prejudices. The persistent refusal to recognize the negro, who had been the friend of the loyal men, as entitled to any political consideration whatever, and scarcely to the commonest rights of the civil society, created a new disgust at their conduct, and induced a desire to force upon them the abandonment of what is thought to be an unfounded prejudice, and at the same time to force upon them a greater respect for those plain and fundamental rights, which lie at the foundation of all good government, and a denial of which had precipitated upon the country the late dreadful war. I am not at all surprised at this general feeling. I am only surprised that the committee of fifteen—gentlemen of such distinguished abilities, generally so tenacious of the right and so ready to apprehend it—could have satisfied themselves with the proposition offered, either as a means of accomplishing the desired security for the future, or as a measure sanctioned by that justice and equality, now demanded by public sentiment, throughout the country.

At an early period of the session the prevailing sentiment, looking to the object I have indicated, was in favor of a simple constitutional provision by which representation should be based on voters qualified as electors under the respective State constitutions and laws. This, it was thought, would force the South to acknowledge the political rights of the negro. Indeed, it had no other object. I am not disguising, nor will I disguise, for party purposes, the object had in view in this or other measures. It is no time for dissembling. The questions are too great, the interests at stake, too large for dissimulation. Any attempt now at concealment is absurd. Is it not worse than absurd? Is it not criminal? This proposition, at least, had the merit of being equal. It put no brand, no stigma upon any State. It left each to determine the franchise for itself. Those who were thought worthy of the ballot in the respective States were made the representative basis in Congress. It stimulated the broadest republicanism, the most extended suffrage, by giving it the rewards due to such liberality. The more the voters in the State, the greater was to be the political power of that State in Congress, and the greater its weight, in the choice of President. No one seemed to doubt that this proposition would secure the largest possible negro vote in the North and South consistent with the peace, and good order, and proper government of the respective States.

I refer to this measure, its former popularity, and the strange and sudden disfavor into which it fell, to warn Senators against the danger of sectional or selfish considerations in the settlement of the great questions now before us. Absolute justice seemed to be stamped on the face of the measure, and Representatives were ready to accept it, as they would accept a demonstration of Euclid. It was fair, would apply to all the States alike, and its great merit was that it secured beyond doubt the great end desired—negro suffrage in the southern States. The political penalty attached to its denial was too heavy to be borne. Just at this moment a young and talented Representative from Maine [Mr. BLAINE] thought he would examine the figures, (they never deceive.) He betook himself to the census, and found the proposition would not do. It suddenly became unjust. Why unjust? Because, if adopted, the eastern and Atlantic States would lose power comparatively with the West. The active and enterprising, but poor young men of those States are in the habit of emigrating West. The women are left, but the men seek their fortunes in larger fields of adventure.

He discovered that in 1860 the entire population of California was 379,994, and that out of that number, 278,337 were males and only 106,657 were females. He discovered, also, that Illinois had 898,941 white males and only 805,350 females, an excess of 93,591, enough to give Illinois an additional member of Congress under the contemplated rule. He discovered also that Louisiana had an excess of males over females of 22,000; Kansas 11,000; Iowa 34,000; Indiana 48,000; Missouri 63,000; and other western and southwestern States in like proportion, while Connecticut, New Hampshire, New York, Rhode Island, Massachusetts, and the Atlantic States generally have a large excess of females over males. Hence while this rule might coerce the southern States to adopt negro suffrage, it would at the same time weaken the representative power of the East; in other words, while it might coerce the South to admit negro suffrage, it might drive the North and the East to woman suffrage, for which they were not prepared. The very moment Mr. BLAINE made some figures on this subject and laid them before the House of Representatives, that proposition was dead forever. Perhaps it ought to have died. But if so, it should have died of another reason. You cannot enfranchise everybody in the States, and it may be asked with great power, why should not the evil, instead of the political society, be represented in Congress?

Mr. SHERMAN. What was the date of that speech?

Mr. HENDERSON. Sometime in the early part of January, the precise date I do not remember. The figures I use are taken from the census, and I may not state the objections just as Mr. BLAINE stated them. I do substantially, for I happened to hear his remarks against the measure which had the approbation of many western members, and which yet is thought by them to be the best. The real objection to it in my mind consists in cheapening the franchise to obtain political power.

As I have said, however, the proposition died so soon as it was found that the East was to lose by it. I do not blame these Eastern gentlemen. They want the privilege to exclude their women and minors from the suffrage, yet they want them counted in the basis of representation in the Federal Government. At least, they object to any penalty being imposed on them for their exclusion. But hasten on. Something was to be done. The negro must be enfranchised, but the difficulty consisted in choosing words that would place the penalty for denying suffrage on the South, and yet let the North and East deny it with impunity. The next difficulty was to select words, that would act as a penalty on the South, without incurring the prejudice against negro suffrage in the North and East. Mr. BLAINE finally obtained the happy words, and these happy words are now embodied in the proposition of the committee, which I have read.

The first inquiry of the country will be, what object is contemplated by this amendment? What is to be effected? After six or seven thousand million dollars have been expended, after mourning has been brought to almost every house in the land, after blood enough has been spilled to float our heaviest monitors, after the deepest interest has fixed itself in the public heart and intense anxiety is depicted on every face, it is simply contemptible to trifle with the sad earnestness of an intelligent people by the use of ambiguous language. They have a right to know our meaning, the purport of our measures, and they will be satisfied with nothing less. This resolution is now before us, and many earnest Union men think it must be adopted—that its defeat will be attended with great danger to the best interests of the country. Hence, many will not stop to inquire what results may flow from it. I read it again:

Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed: Provided, That whenever the elective franchise shall be denied or abridged in any State on account of race or color, all persons therein of such race or color shall be excluded from the basis of representation.

It will be observed that after the word "Representatives," the first word in the resolution, the committee have seen fit to drop the three words which follow in the text of the Constitution: as it now stands, to wit, "and direct taxes." So if the amendment should pass, representation may be fixed on one basis and direct taxation on another. So jealous were our forefathers on this subject that they never thought for a moment of separating taxation and representation. In their judgment, such separation was tyranny. It was so declared throughout the revolutionary struggle, and at the time of the adoption of the Constitution a proposition like this, under which, a people paying full taxes, should have but half representation, would have received no favor whatever. A direct tax would operate harshly against my State. It is a tax levied in proportion to the numbers of the people. The people in the newly settled States are generally poor, and a tax on each person of an equal amount may be paid easily by the rich men of the old settled States, while it would drive to poverty the people of the new. If the rich States of the Atlantic sea-board, now having the power in consequence of the wicked absence and rebellion of the South, should be able to adopt a basis of representation under which they could pay the public debt by direct taxation, the West and South might be impoverished, while the people of New England and the middle States would grow yet richer.

I shall watch rebel influence and keep it out of the councils of the nation. The North will be forced to join me in this, but in foolish fear of rebel influence I will not consent to run into this danger. My State is as much interested in this proposition, as the East is in having their women and minors represented in Congress. The loyal men of the South, robbed of their substance by rebel tyranny, will join Missouri loyalists in having this great debt paid, as far as possible, from the wealth of the country, and not wrung almost entirely from the sweat of poor men. The poor men go from the East to the West. The rich stay where they can enjoy the comforts of an older civilization. I see no reason to run in base fear from anti-negro aristocratic rebel influence into the hands of a moneyed aristocracy. But whence comes this eternal specter of rebel power, in Congress, to frighten us from all propriety? I thought we had determined to reject all rebel organizations in the southern States, and to tolerate and recognize none but loyal Governments. If we do so, where is this rebel specter? It is, like many other ghosts, used for a purpose. I am not afraid of such ghosts. The people of this country will never suffer any but loyal men to govern these southern States, and the sooner, the disloyal there know it, the better for them. I know they may give us trouble, and a great deal of it. But the loyal men will possess the country at all times. If I am right, then, this proposition is not so efficient, as a means of weakening rebel influences, as to place, in the hands of the more wealthy States the power, to tax unjustly the loyal and disloyal white and black of the poorer States South and West. I acquit gentlemen, of course, of any such intention, but such may be the result.

The answer comes back to me, all this may be avoided by the simple act of justice to be performed by the States, the enfranchisement of the blacks. Well, is it right to enfranchise them? Do you say so? You do not so declare, but you expressly declare the right to disfranchise. You admit that a good reason may exist for the disfranchisement, and invite it by implication. Suppose the white southern landlords agree to accept your proposition. Suppose that they take diminished representation and unjust taxes by Congress, both upon themselves and the negroes, in lieu of the right which you propose to give them, the right to deny the negro representation in the State organizations and the privilege to fleece him from year to year of his hard earnings by unjust State laws? Has Missouri no interest in this bargain? Remember, if the negro is represented in Congress, his interest is the same as that of my constituents. Our forefathers gave him a three-fifths representation as a slave, and a full representation when free. This proposition offers a bargain by which the southern white may rob the negro, provided he, for himself and the negro, will consent to be robbed at the discretion of others. Massachusetts and South Carolina made a bargain once before—I mean the bargain by which piracy was legalized and man stealing carried on by law until America was filled with slaves. Other people suffered by this thing. My State and others are likely to suffer by this new compact, and I think it best to have nothing to do with it.

But I have said the people will ask what this amendment means. It can mean but one of two things. First, it is intended to deny representation to a non-voting population; or, second, it is intended to secure suffrage to the negro.

If the committee intend to secure the first object, it must be because of the existence of a correct, living, vital principle in our Government, that a non-voting population in one of the States ought not to be represented in the Federal Government. If this be the design, I should like to ask on what principle the women, minors, and aliens are to be retained in the basis of representation? If any principle be involved, these, too, must be excluded from the enumeration in each State because they do not vote. If it be said that no principle is involved, but that it is a mere matter of temporary expediency, I answer that I will never give my sanction to a constitutional provision on any such considerations. If there be no principle involved, then the amendment should not be made. But whence comes this idea, I have already asked, that a non-voting free population shall not be represented in Congress? Every tradition of our fathers; every utterance by those who builded our institutions; every principle on which they are founded, utterly reject and condemn the idea as false and mischievous. Our fathers left the suffrage with the States. Suffrage at that day was much more limited than it now is. In some States only freeholders voted; in some the heads of families; in all a property qualification was necessary; in some the free negroes voted, in others they did not. Mr. Madison said:

"The definition of the right of suffrage is very justly regarded as a fundamental article of republican government."

And he says further:

"To have reduced the different qualifications in the different States to one uniform rule would probably have been as dissatisfactory to some of the States as it would have been to the Convention."

Hence the Convention left the suffrage question to the States, believing, in the language of Mr. Madison, that it could not be "feared that the people of the States will alter this part of their constitution in such a manner as to abridge the rights secured to them by the Federal Constitution." In this Mr. Madison and the good men of this day were deceived. The States in many instances, it is true, enlarged the right of suffrage to the whites, but as slavery became profitable, the rights of the free negroes were gradually "abridged," until all, except some of the New England States, denied them the suffrage. I infer from this language of Mr. Madison, if the Convention could have foreseen this revolution in sentiment, the child of avarice in the white man, and not the result of discovered incapacity in the black for the duties of citizenship, some provision would have been made to prevent this abridgment of the suffrage. I am left to infer as much from what he says, in the thirty-ninth number of the Federalist, in defining a republic. He says:

"It is essential to such a Government that it be derived from the great body of the society, not from an inconsiderable proportion, or a favored class of it; otherwise, a handful of tyrannical nobles, exercising their oppressions by a delegation of their powers, might aspire to the rank of republicans and claim for their Government the honorable title of republic."

These things were not provided against because they were not anticipated. They have now come upon us, and it behooves us to remedy the evil, not by saying the evil may continue, and if it does, we will add another evil to it, but by making our State governments truly republican.

Representation was purposely made unequal in the Senate, but in the lower House it was purposely placed where the States could not alter it if they would. It was based, not on voters, but on the masses of people, old and young, black and white, sane and insane, excluding Indians not taxed and including three fifths of the slaves. There was a contest as to whether slaves should be represented in the Federal basis. There never was any contest as to free persons. All admitted the justice of including them in the ratio. In the fifty-fourth number of the Federalist, Mr. Madison says:

"It is not contended that the number of people in each State ought not to be the standard for regulating the proportion of those who are to represent the people of each State."

He says further, in that connection, that—

"The establishment of the same rule for the apportionment of taxes will probably be as little contested."

Though he insists the rule in the latter case is not founded on the same principle. This is true. Nobody can doubt that representation should be based on population. Taxes may properly be based on wealth; but is it not monstrous that a proposition should be urged, at this day of experience in the science of government, proposing that representation should be substantially confined to voters, while taxation is purposely left to be apportioned on numbers? Missouri has now a greater population than Massachusetts. Massachusetts has three times her wealth. Under this rule Missouri will pay larger taxes than Massachusetts and have less power in Congress. Mr. Madison said that representation should be based on population because "the rule is understood to refer to the personal rights of the people, with which it has a natural and universal connection." In the case of taxation, he said "the rule is in no case a precise measure and in ordinary cases a very unfit one." The less wealthy States had to accept the rule in the case of taxation. It was then, and is now, hard enough.

But when I am asked to give up political power, that the practical application of an always unjust rule in taxation, now to be made odious, may be enforced against me, I cannot, I will not, consent. It is no answer to say that you mean well. If so, why not do well? The negroes of the South must be included in the ratio of Federal representation or we are no better than those who exclude them from the suffrage. You give their former owners the right to drive them from the ballot-box, and the only punishment you propose is to rob both the oppressor and the oppressed of their money. It is a compromise that the whites may govern the blacks in the State governments of the South and wring from them sweat and tears, provided the northern and eastern States are permitted to control the national Government. This is a Government of the entire people. Women and minors have an interest in it. Your legislation acts upon them. It gathers taxes of them without asking them if their respective States permit them to vote. Why should they not be represented here, even though they are not permitted to vote in the States? The Constitution provides that—

"The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States."

If the negroes now in the State of Louisiana continue to live there with the whites, their pursuits will be of the same character as those of the whites. Whatever may be existing prejudices between the whites and the blacks, the future will develop an identity of interests. What is favorable to one will be favorable to the other. What is injurious to one will be injurious to the other. If the white man grows sugar-cane and makes sugar in Louisiana, the negro will do the same. If, in Alabama, the old planter or Yankee adventurer who will go down there, undertakes to grow cotton, the negro will grow cotton also, and the interests of the planter and the Yankee adventurer and the negro are identically the same. You cannot separate them. Have the women of Maine and Massachusetts no interest in the legislation of Congress? Do you dare say that they are not interested as much as the men? Do they not pay taxes? The Senator from Massachusetts told us the other day that James Otis said that taxation without representation is tyranny. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. JOHNSON] replied that this referred only to representation in the English Parliament, where we had none. But if the principle be true only as applied in that case, how dare you make partial representation? If it be odious and tyrannical to deny representation entirely, the least diminution of it opens the door to wrong. Lead us not into temptation. Power is dangerous, when properly obtained. When unjustly obtained, it cannot exist, except in the corrupt elements which gave it birth.

Mr. SUMNER. I will remind the Senator that Otis claimed representation for each individual. He did not claim it merely for the community.

Mr. HENDERSON. I did not know that he went to that extent in the speech alluded to. It only makes the case stronger.

Mr. SUMNER. He did, as I shall show at the proper time.

Mr. HENDERSON. I was very well satisfied, without examining his views, that the principle he laid down must go to that extent. Half representation is half as bad as no representation. If it be tyranny to deny it entirely, it is half tyranny to deny the half, and half tyranny is equally a violation of the great principle of right. It is only a difference in degree; it is only modified tyranny, but it is tyranny at last.

Now, sir, Congress is constantly revising our impost duties; and equally often we revise our stamp, income, and excise taxes; and if you will give the distinguished Senator from Maine, [Mr. FESSENDEN], the chairman of the Committee on Finance, the power to regulate impost and excise duties according to his will and pleasure, it is quite certain that he can build up the people of the State of Maine, or the people of all New England if he choose, and make them rich while other sections may be dragged down to poverty. Look at the varied products of this country and think how taxes may be adjusted. You do not raise cotton in Maine, nor in Massachusetts, nor in any other New England State. But you manufacture the article in large quantities. Cotton is the chief production of a great many of the southern States. Suppose you increase your tariff on cotton goods and levy an excise tax upon the growth of cotton in the southern States, giving a drawback for the tax on the raw material, as you proposed at the last session of Congress to the manufacturer, but denying it to the producer, thereby levying in effect an export tax and paying bounties to the manufacturer, how long before New England would be filled with the stream of wealth that had its source in the sweat of southern laborers?

Is not the negro interested in this? He may have no ballot in Alabama. But this should excite your sympathy and not tempt you to rob him. The same may be said of the sugar interests of Louisiana, the tobacco and grape interests of Missouri, the turpentine interests of North Carolina, the pork interests of Ohio, and the whisky interests of Illinois and Indiana.

It is useless to spend time in enumerating the many evils to spring from unequal and unfair representation. They meet us at every step. When representation in the lower House becomes unequal, the salt of the Constitution is gone. This looks like an effort to give the power in the lower House, by another compromise, to the same section of country to which an undue power was given in the Senate. If it must be done, let it be done in another name than mercy to the black man.

Again, the Constitution provides:

"The Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes."

In the formation of the Constitution this power was considered by the commercial States of such great importance to them that in consideration thereof they bartered away the liberties of a race. With unequal representation in the hands of the commercial section, what injuries might not be inflicted on the agricultural portions of the community?

Are not the negroes interested in the exercise of this power by Congress? For many years they must look to agriculture for support. Laws, oppressive to them and ruinous to their pursuits, may be passed under this and other clauses of the Constitution. The interests of the negro deserve consideration whether he enjoys the franchise or not.

Again, Congress has the power "to declare war," "to raise and support armies," "to provide and maintain a navy." The mercantile interests of our nation are now in no kind mood toward England. I do not propose to speak of the action of England during our late war, or to condemn or indorse the denunciations of her conduct toward us. I simply refer to our present attitude to that Power to show the injustice of the pending proposition. Is war to be declared? Some persons desire it to be done, and thousands of our people might grow rich with "letters of marque and reprisal." The mercantile interests might be rejoiced at an opportunity to retaliate for real or imaginary wrongs. However such a war might gratify individual or sectional feeling, however it might add to our national glory, yet it would be a war of vast proportions, destroying the material interests of the nation, plunging us into almost hopeless bankruptcy, and bringing poverty and misery to all classes. If a minority of the people, inhabiting the Atlantic States, had the power and the will to declare such a war, and to impress the majority into the armies of the nation to maintain it, what sort of a Government would ours be? Can it be said that the negro of the southern States, struggling in poverty to support himself and family, has no interest in preventing this war, simply because he has no ballot? What difference does that make to us? The women of New England who did not vote denounced the war of 1812, and rightly held their places, in the basis of congressional representation, to force an early peace after an unprofitable and unavailing war. The women and men of New England denounced the war of 1846 with Mexico. Had the women and minors been excluded from the basis of their representation, and war then declared against the voice of New England voters, another war than the Mexican war might have come. In such event, who would have said that the women and minors had no interest in the matter and therefore no right to complain, because they could not vote in their respective States?

SENATE.

I might continue this course of remark, but I dismiss it and look for a moment to the population South and some of the effects to be produced.

If these States shall deny the suffrage, then by this rule you exclude from representation, in the single State of Virginia, 548,907 human beings, largely more than the white population of Kansas, Delaware, Minnesota, Oregon, and Florida, under the census of 1860. Think of it, Mr. President. These five States are entitled to six Representatives and ten Senators in Congress, with a white population of 499,117, which is 49,790 less than the negro population of the single State of Virginia. You have six Senators and ten Representatives in Congress, representing a white population in these States less than the negro population of the single State of Virginia. Do your excise laws not reach these negroes? Do not your tariff laws reach them? Will they not have to buy imported goods, and pay like others your excise and income taxes? I am answered, "If the States want justice done to the negroes and themselves, let them admit the negroes to the right of suffrage." That is not satisfactory. Suppose, as I have said, the whites of these States resolve to accept the compromise or bargain you tender them? Suppose they take the chances of unjust legislation for the privilege of robbing the negro by local law?

But I proceed. The five States named have a representative population, as the Constitution now stands, of only 559,017, which is but 10,110 more than the negro population of Virginia. The negro population of Georgia exceeds the white population of Rhode Island, Kansas, Delaware, and Oregon, by 45,525. The negro population of Mississippi exceeds the white population of the States last named by upwards of 17,000. These States have five Representatives and eight Senators in Congress.

The negro population of Georgia and South Carolina is 878,018, largely more than the entire white population of New Hampshire, Vermont, and Rhode Island, it being only 810,636. These States have six Senators and eight Representatives, but this vast population of nearly a million souls will go unrepresented. Add the negro population of Virginia to that of Georgia and South Carolina, and it almost equals the white population of Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, and Rhode Island.

The proposed amendment does not declare that this population shall go unrepresented, but it implies that a good reason may exist for their local disfranchisement in the States, and if the States do regard them as brutes, and not persons, they can do so. I, for one, am totally unwilling to permit them to do it. I append a comparative table showing the population white and black in 1860 in fifteen States, the number of Representatives they now have, the number to which they would be entitled under the Constitution as it is, the number to which they would be entitled under the committee's plan, in case the negroes are excluded, the proportion of direct tax allotted to each under the act of 1861, levying a tax of $20,000,000, and the proportion each of said States would be required to pay of a twenty million tax under that Constitution as it now stands, and as the committee proposes to leave it, their slaves being free:

Ratio of representation.	White population in 1860.	Free colored population in 1860.	Slave population in 1860.	Total colored population and free.	Total population, white and black.	Number of Representatives at present.	No. of Representatives if based on entire population.	No. of Representatives if based on committee plan, and the negroes are excluded.	Loss.	Gain.	Share $20,000,000 per cent of 1861, 67 per cent of the representative person.	Share of a tax of $20,000,000 based on the ratio of taxation.

To show the monstrous injustice, however, that may result from the proposed amendment, I may state that should it be adopted and a direct tax of $20,000,000 be levied, the apportionment to Virginia would be $1,015,258. The representation of Virginia in the lower branch of Congress would be nine members. The State of Illinois, with sixteen members in Congress, would pay but $1,088,800. Kansas, with one member, would pay $68,183. Oregon, with one member, would pay $33,367.

Minnesota, with two members, would pay $109,470. Delaware, with one member, would pay $71,369. New Hampshire, with three members, would pay $206,382. Vermont, with three members, would pay $200,492. And Maine, with six members, would pay $290,585. Hence, these eight States, headed by the great State of Illinois, and including three of the New England States, would altogether pay $2,177,556. The State of Virginia would have to pay over one million, or nearly half this sum. Virginia would be represented by two Senators and nine Representatives, while the States I have named would be represented by sixteen Senators and thirty-three Representatives. Under such circumstances the peculiar interests of Virginia industry might possibly be protected by these Representatives from States having diverse interests, but to believe it requires a belief in the improvement of man's moral nature far beyond what it promises to be in our day. If a vast public debt is to be paid, the representatives of peculiar interests will likely forget the plodding negro in the South, in their efforts to protect those interests and commend themselves to their own constituents. It matters not by whom the Virginia Representative may be elected, if when here his votes shall be cast in favor of the negro's interest. If he represents the whites he cannot fail to represent the negroes, for their pursuits are regulated by soil and climate and productions. Their pursuits are necessarily similar and their interests cannot be divided.

If, then, the object of the committee be to deny representation to citizens of the United States merely because the States see fit to deny them the suffrage, I think I have shown it to be politically wrong, leading to acts of injustice and oppression on the one side, and to poverty and humiliation on the other. I thank the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] for his amendment to perfect this proposition. It declares that if the negro is to be excluded from the basis of representation, he must be excluded likewise from the basis of taxation. That is fair, and argues a mind fully imbued with the foundation principles of civil liberty. But if this amendment, which is but the repetition of the highest tribute we have ever paid our Republic, should be adopted, the amendment itself, I suspect, would be abandoned. You leave it to the States to exclude the negro from suffrage. If the States do so, you accept the action and at once proceed to say he is a brute, a thing that cannot enter into the basis of Federal representation. If, in your judgment, the negro be a person, how shall he be excluded from representation? This rule, in Mr. Madison's opinion, is the true one and proper to protect "personal rights." The whole Convention of 1787, a body of pure and upright and wise men, believed with him. If they were right, you cannot deny the negro representation without ignoring every profession of the Republican party and a most important principle of republican theory. But if he be a thing, and unworthy of representation, how is it that he is more than a thing for purposes of taxation? If he is a drone, unfit to vote, and therefore should have no more voice in Congress than a stone or a stick, why should he be required to pay money for Government purposes? If he be an unreasoning animal, it is enough that he provide himself with the means of life. If he is without capacity, white men should scorn to take from him the little he may accumulate.

Mr. SUMNER. Allow me to remind my friend that the argument of Otis and of our revolutionary fathers was, that there should be no taxation, direct or indirect, where there was no representation.

Mr. HENDERSON. That is certainly the true principle, a principle of common sense and republican right.

But the committee, I presume, will tell me they do not wish to deprive any part of the country of its due and just representation in Congress. On the other hand, they will claim a desire to do equal justice to each section. They will take the ground, then, that the object of the amendment is not to deny representation, but to coerce negro suffrage. I have already said that one or the other of these things must be aimed at; and I cannot suppose the committee intended to violate so great a principle. Then negro suffrage in the seceding and border States is the purpose of the resolution. I say in the seceding and border States, for the resolution is so framed, that each one of the original non-slaveholding States may refuse to enfranchise its negroes, without loss of political power. As to these States the penalty is operative. It is one of those strange penal statutes that, appearing to be equal, operate unequally, because of the unequal condition of the parties to which it is to be applied. This begins by assuming that the object to be attained by its adoption is wrong. The object is negro suffrage.

But while a large number of Senators and Representatives and a respectable portion of the newspaper press of the country claim the right of Congress, by a simple bill or joint resolution, to secure this right to the negro, this amendment begins by repudiating any such power. It does much more. It admits the exclusive right of the States over the whole subject. It does not stop there either; but the implication is clear, that the negro may and ought to be, in some cases, excluded from the ballot on account of the color of his skin. Then, of course, no Senator who believes that the Congress now has the right to confer the suffrage can vote for the proposition without stultifying himself. If he votes for it he is estopped thereafter from setting up the guarantee clause or the anti-slavery amendment as a warrant for legislation. No Senator who believes that the educated and intelligent negro, devoted to the institutions of his country, and qualified for the highest honors of life, should have the poor privilege, without regard to his color, of giving or withholding his assent to laws affecting his person and property, can vote for it, because it shirks the performance of a plain duty from false ideas of expediency, and commits a great interest to the hands of its enemies. Hence, both they who favor a direct act of Congress on the subject, and they who believe that this is the proper time, perhaps the last and only time we shall ever have, to consummate an act of justice, by a constitutional amendment, declaring against all discrimination of color or race, must take their places against this proposition.

Again, if suffrage be the intention, this amendment does not accomplish it. It is as inefficient as it is evasive. To show what the enemies of the measure think of it, I quote from the columns of the Richmond Examiner:

"But, for the sake of argument, let us even suppose that this amendment should prevail and become a part of the Constitution. What then? What would be its operations? Nothing would be easier for the States it attempts to control to render it practically null, by declaring, first, that all persons now enjoying the elective franchise should continue to exercise it; and, secondly, that all persons hereafter admitted to it, should be admitted on a prescribed educational or property qualification. In this way the political control of the country would remain (for this generation, at least,) as completely in the white race as if no such amendment had ever been passed."

Another objection, in this view, consists in the fact, already perhaps stated, that it is partial in its good. If negro suffrage be desirable in the South, it is equally so in the North; but the amendment is purposely so framed that northern and western prejudices may run their course and northern and western injustice be perpetuated without punishment. This fact of itself destroys the force of the measure. It leaves too much undone. It is not entitled to approval as a great act of impartial good, but commends itself to the petty passions of the hour. It assumes to elevate the negro in the seceding States, not for the negro's good, but to punish the whites. It comes from malice, and not from charity or a sense of right. In effect, it says the people of the North and West need no chastisement, and negro suffrage must not be forced on them. The people of the South have sinned, and this is their punishment. Mr. President, I am in favor of extending the suffrage in a modified, safe, and judicious way, not to punish the whites of the South, but to advance their interests, moral and material, and to insure the future peace of white and black. Instead of a punishment, the future will claim it as the greatest good. But it must not be partial. It must not be confined to a section. It must be as broad as our free country, as universal as truth itself.

If the negro ought to be enfranchised, our duty as statesmen, our honor as men, our own sense of responsibility to posterity, all demand that we should do it now, and do it with the boldness of conscious right. We should make it effective and appeal to an honest people to ratify it. It is admitted that under this amendment the South may refuse to enfranchise. Then your object is lost. It will not do to say that the pressure will be such as to force them to it. If the southern States find themselves in a minority in Congress, and that to enfranchise the negro would still leave them in a minority, nothing will be gained by yielding their assent, and your pressure ceases. If, on the other hand, they find that with the aid of the Democratic party of the northern States they can afford to exclude the negro from the basis of representation and yet retain political supremacy, your pressure is equally lost.

But another objection occurs. By attempting to cover up and conceal our real object, we may lose forever that which we have in view. You cannot put a proposition before the people that will deceive them. If, by this amendment, you intend to secure negro suffrage, the people will understand your purpose, and if they are opposed to the ends you aim at, however disguised, they will defeat you. The people are just as intelligent as we are. If, on the other hand, they desire negro suffrage, they cannot fail to see that this proposition is a sham and a delusion, and they may vote it down because of its inefficiency.

This amendment implies that impartial suffrage may be a curse to the white race. It is therefore put forward in the form of an evil. Another evil is put forth with it, and choice between them is given. One must be taken, but the other may be rejected. It is a choice between bitter cups, either of which is a penalty for past misdeeds. Do I state the proposition unfairly? I think not.

I come now to the chief argument, indeed the only argument, urged in favor of the committee's report. It is that the proposition can be carried. It is without merit, but it can succeed. A bold declaration of man's equality cannot be carried. I state it plainly. I hope I state it fairly.

The distinguished Senator from Maine in his speech the other day said, and I was glad to hear him say it, that he personally was willing, instead of the proviso to the amendment now pending, to attach the following:

"That all provisions in the Constitution or laws of any State making any distinction in civil or political rights or privileges on account of race or color shall be inoperative and void."

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator misapprehended me. What I said was, not that I was willing to attach that instead of the proviso, but that something like that, which I repeated, would suit me very much better if I supposed it could be adopted; that I personally would prefer a clean proposition abolishing all distinctions; and I presume all the Senators around me would.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am glad to hear the Senator say so. If all the Senators around him prefer it, and he prefers it, why not take it? Simply because it cannot be adopted. Before I close, I should say something further upon this argument addressed to our fears. It is an argument that ought not to be addressed to us by the able Senator from Maine. That which is right will succeed. It is bound to succeed. It may not succeed to-day; it may not succeed to-morrow; but I have an abiding confidence that justice will soon or late triumph. Man may be unjust, but God is just, and as He is more powerful than man, so His justice is borne on to ultimate triumph against all human obstacles. I am slow to appreciate the argument that a proposition correct in itself can never receive the favor of the people. I know that such fears were entertained a short time ago when the proposition to amend the Constitution abolishing slavery was under consideration. Even the able and sanguine Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER,] I think, had some fears on the subject, and introduced a bill to declare slavery abolished. He now offers a bill, refusing yet to believe. He thought that a constitutional amendment could not then succeed. He wanted the object accomplished with all his heart, but his anxiety drove him to the selection of means wholly ineffectual. I thought that a simple act of Congress would always be disputed; the courts, Federal and State, might dispute it. But now that the amendment has been adopted, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. GURRUE] rises in the Senate and says, with honor to himself, he recognizes it as the law of the land. There is not a southern man from one end of the country to the other who does not acknowledge the fact that the constitutional amendment is an operative amendment, and that slavery is forever abolished in the United States. That is a great thing accomplished. It gives peace, contentment, order, satisfaction. Nobody is now disputing it. Every department of the Federal Government acknowledges it. The courts cannot dispute it; the people do not dispute it; the State Legislatures do not dispute it; the State magistrates do not dispute it; the whole world acknowledges the fact that slavery is abolished.

It was said that the emancipation proclamation would do no good, that it was a dead letter and could not be enforced. I must confess that at the time I had some doubts of the propriety of it, and greater doubts of its efficiency. Does anybody doubt its propriety now? Was it not sanctioned by the country? You remember the relentless opposition waged against it. The discussions that sprang out of it gave it additional strength, and finally the people approved it as an act of justice; and the inspiration breathed by that proclamation gave us ultimate success in this war. You remember the opposition made to arming the negroes, but finally it received the sanction of the entire body of loyal men, and the country gratefully acknowledges their services in suppressing the rebellion.

No, Mr. President, if we have satisfied our minds that the negroes of the seceded States should now, or, in the future, have the elective franchise, the same right exists in other States; and let us place a distinct proposition before the people and defend it as honest and fearless men. It has been truly said that one earnest man in the right is always a majority. Many objections, other than those I have named, might be urged against this amendment proposed by the reconstruction committee, but to name them would require too much time. I must apologize to the Senate for trespassing already so long.

I come now to the measure proposed by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER,] a joint resolution of Congress to secure civil and political rights irrespective of color. It gives me pain at any time to differ with the honorable Senator, and I especially regret a difference now. His purposes I do not condemn, but the means by which he proposes to arrive at them cannot receive my sanction. I could not vote for his bill two years ago to abolish slavery; I cannot vote for his bill to secure political rights now. I desired emancipation then, but took a different road to arrive at it. I desire that no State law hereafter shall be permitted to set up the senseless test of color in fixing the qualifications of voters. But I am not now ready to take away from the States the long-enjoyed right of prescribing the qualifications of electors in their own limits. Congress is not now prepared to take and exercise properly this power. Local reasons may exist, and do often exist, for excluding certain persons from the ballot. The people of each State can better judge of these reasons than Congress or the people in other States. But the United States is certainly interested in maintaining a republican form of government—republican both in theory and in practice.

No State can vitally wound the true republican principle that "all men are created equal," and that when government is to be established, its just powers must come from "the consent of the governed," without causing injury and bringing disease into the entire system. If wrong be done in one of the States, it is eventually felt by the nation. If a State becomes an oligarchy, the deleterious influences are not alone confined to the limits of the State. They cannot be so confined, because the few electors who control State policy are the same who send Representatives to Congress. The members of the Legislature, chosen by those electors, select the Senators who sit with us here. If the fountain be muddy, the stream is not clear. If the electors be aristocrats, the representatives will rarely be republicans. The right of suffrage," said Mr. Madison, "is a fundamental article in republican constitutions." "The regulation of it," he further said, "is at the same time a task of peculiar delicacy." He said, in another paper:

"It would be happy if a state of society could be found or framed in which an equal voice in making the laws might be allowed to every individual bound to obey them. But this is a theory which, like most theories, confessedly requires limitations and modifications."—Madison Papers, Appendix, vol. 3, p. 15.

We all feel the force of these simple words, "Suffrage is a fundamental article of republican constitutions." How true! But yet Mr. Madison and the fathers were content, according to my reading, to leave the whole subject with the States, under the hope that the people thereof would not "abridge the rights secured to them." That the States have abridged the rights of suffrage and have violated the fundamental rule of republicanism, as then understood in theory, we cannot doubt. An important question, however, to be considered is, were the theoretical views of republicanism entertained at that day ingrafted on the Constitution? I think not. They made a written Constitution, and when they speak of republican forms of government in the instrument itself, they mean simply a conformity with that Constitution. Our fathers did not sanction or approve of, slavery, but they left it existing in what they called republican forms. The time has now come, foreseen by Mr. Madison, (see No. 43 Federalist), when a "minority of citizens in some of the States" has become a "majority of persons," when, indeed, a majority of persons is found in that "unhappy species of population abounding in some of the States who, during the calm of regular government, are sunk below the level of man." Truly those men have now "emerged into the human character," and unless they have the suffrage, the republican system will become diseased. Violence and revolution must follow a denial of suffrage to a majority of free persons in a State, especially when that majority are the subjects, not only of prejudice, but hatred. But, on the other hand, as this is a practical question, and must be dealt with in a practical way, I am free to say that I would not to-day open the polls in the seceded States, were it in my power, to the entire population, white and black. When there is a way to effect a great good without any evil, that way should be adopted. Good is often accomplished through blood, but when it comes in peace, accepted by all, how much better it is! What would be the result of indiscriminate suffrage now in the South? The whites for two hundred years have taken the labor of the black without further compensation than a scanty support. Perhaps that was all their labor was worth. I do not pass judgment on that question now. The negro is ignorant and brutalized by this long period of slavery. Perhaps the white man would be no better under similar circumstances. I doubt if he would. The negro is poor; the white man has something left, but not much. The little he has, the negro thinks belongs or ought to belong, in part at least, to him. The belief may be well founded in justice. I will not pass judgment here either. The white is offended that his grasp has been violently loosed from his slave, and like all angry mortals must wreak his vengeance on somebody. He has not power to harm the conqueror; he harms the innocent object of the conqueror's kindness. Like other disappointed men, he would destroy that which he can use no longer. The feelings of the ignorant and degraded negro may well be imagined, and I leave to the Senator from Massachusetts to imagine the consequences of an open, full, and unlimited ballot in those States now, and especially where the negroes have the numerical majority. Perhaps their excesses, following the ignorant, unskilled use of power, would set back, for years, this great reform. I have no time for further comment on the consequences of such conduct.

It is, in my judgment, yet proper to leave the qualifications of electors with the States, but not to the extent of allowing them to introduce disease and death into the body-politic, by denying in their own organizations the elementary principles of republicanism. Missouri has an interest in the State governments of Virginia, Louisiana, and Texas. If these governments become diseased, the whole body suffers, for the States are but limbs of that body. Our governments must be truly republican. The present Constitution tolerates something else. Let us amend it. The preamble of the honorable Senator's resolution indicates that the power to pass it is claimed, first, in the guarantee clause, and second, in the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery. It seems admitted that the power must be derived from these provisions of the Constitution or it does not exist at all.

Mr. YATES. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. HENDERSON. Certainly.

Mr. YATES. I hope that I am not interjecting what I have to say in a wrong place in the Senator's speech, but I wish to ask him a question. The constitutional amendment, which has recently been adopted, abolishes slavery in all the States; in other words, it secures freedom to the freedmen. It is not a latitudinarian construction to say that it secures full freedom to the freedman. Can full freedom be conferred upon the freedman without conferring upon him all his rights, natural, civil, and political? The second clause of the constitutional amendment says that Congress shall have power to enforce it; that is, to confer full freedom upon the freedmen, for to abolish slavery means to confer freedom.

Another point. Congress, before the adoption of the amendment, could not make a citizen, and a State could not make a citizen. "We, the people of the United States," "do ordain and establish this Constitution." The people made the Constitution, not the Constitution the people. But the Dred Scott decision declared that because a slave might be bought and sold when the Constitution was made, because at that time he was not recognized as a member of the society, because he had no rights which a white man was bound to respect, therefore he was not one of the people, not one of the sovereignty. By the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery, the freedman becomes what? He becomes one of the sovereigns, he is emancipated into the people of the United States; and Congress having no power before to make a citizen, except to naturalize a foreigner, and the States having no right whatever to make a citizen, although they may regulate and make the rules by which he may vote, the freedman, the moment the act of emancipation was proclaimed, became one of the people of the United States. "We, the people of the United States," "do ordain and establish this Constitution."

Well, sir, the question which I wish to propound to the Senator from Missouri, for whose opinions I have great respect, is, why there is any necessity for constitutional amendments when we have the power under the amendment to the Constitution already adopted now to secure not only in South Carolina or Georgia, but in every State of the American Union, freedom, full freedom, civil and political emancipation to every man who comes within that provision of the Constitution.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President—

Mr. YATES. I am trespassing upon the gentleman's time.

Mr. HENDERSON. I think I understand the Senator, and I only rose to ask him a question which I think will furnish an answer to all of his questions, for they all bear on the same point. I ask him if there is any slavery or involuntary servitude in the State of Illinois? Is it not a free State?

Mr. YATES. There is not at the present time any slavery there, and cannot be, I believe.

Mr. HENDERSON. Was there slavery or involuntary servitude in that State before the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery?

Mr. YATES. There cannot be slavery under the amendment of the Constitution. It is impossible.

Mr. HENDERSON. There is, then, no slavery now—and there was no slavery before the amendment. I so understand the Senator; he assents to the proposition. Now, how is it that Illinois does not permit her negroes to vote? She did not before, and does not now, allow them to vote. Then Illinois is not a free State.

Mr. YATES. That is the reason that I propose by a bill which shall apply to every State, not only to Missouri but to Illinois, to declare that these men shall have the rights secured to them by the amendment of the Constitution.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am left to infer, then, that slavery exists where the ballot does not exist? I will ask the Senator another question. Are the women of Illinois free or slave?

Mr. YATES. I notice that when gentlemen are driven to the point and to the wall upon this question, they invariably ask, why do you not let women vote?

Mr. HENDERSON. Not at all. The question of woman suffrage is not before us. My remark springs naturally from the Senator's position. I have neither condemned nor approved such suffrage. The Senator says slavery has been abolished, and to abolish slavery is to confer the suffrage; in other words, he assumes that the denial of suffrage is slavery. I thought not. The suffrage may be the best means to preserve freedom; I think it is. But if the person denied the suffrage, in one of the States is a slave, then slavery exists in all the States, for women and minors do not vote in any one of them, I would perpetuate the negro's freedom; but I would do it in such manner as to be effectual.

Mr. YATES. I will answer that at the proper time.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am only discussing a question of power. The Senator seems to think I am combatting his desires. I am not disputing his proposition that the negro ought to have the suffrage, but I am speaking of the way in which it may be legally done and the extent to which the ballot may be safely carried. The Senator from Massachusetts proposes to do by an act of Congress what I think can only be done by a constitutional amendment. That is the difference now between the Senator from Illinois and myself. I think the amendment can be adopted. Indeed, I feel confident of it.

Mr. SUMNER. What amendment?

Mr. HENDERSON. An amendment to the Constitution preventing any discrimination against the negro in the right of suffrage because of color.

Mr. SUMNER. It cannot.

Mr. HENDERSON. I thought, in the bright lexicon of the Senator from Massachusetts there was no such word as "fail."

Mr. SUMNER. I thought the Senator meant that this proposition of the reconstruction committee could be adopted.

Mr. HENDERSON. Oh no, I never thought that.

Mr. SUMNER. I believe that the Senator's proposition can be adopted, gratefully adopted by the country, but the other cannot be.

Mr. YATES. I only put my question for the purpose of showing that under the Constitution as it now is, under the new Constitution, so far as the freedmen are concerned, all distinctions on account of color are abolished, and all that it requires is appropriate legislation to carry into effect that provision of the Constitution. It is made our duty to do it; it is thrown into our hands by the people.

Mr. HENDERSON. I was speaking of the power to pass this bill under the guarantee clause, and not of the power under the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery, at the particular moment when the Senator interrupted me, for which interruption I am quite grateful, because I am always glad to hear him. I was speaking of the guarantee clause and was resisting the position assumed by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER,] in claiming the power to pass his bill under the guarantee clause. Now the Senator from Illinois thinks that the constitutional amendment and not the guarantee clause gives the power. I understand him to say that the guarantee clause does not give it; that is, he admits that before the adoption of the constitutional amendment there was no power in Congress to compel a State to admit its negroes to the right of suffrage.

Mr. YATES. I will explain. I think that under the decisions of the Supreme Court, before the adoption of the constitutional amendment, a State had the right to exclude the colored man from voting, because he was considered a slave, and not one of the sovereign people. But now the case is altered under the amended Constitution; he is one of the people.

Mr. HENDERSON. The decision did not adjudge, I hope, a free negro to be a slave. The Dred Scott case did not deny that a State could give the franchise to a free negro. Nations, as well as individuals, Mr. President, sometimes backslide. There may be such a thing as a national fall from grace. Communities sometimes retrograde. The cases of individual reaction are numerous. We are yet doomed to see many more. Let individuals fall back if they see fit, but let our action here be such as to insure rational and steady progress. The English Parliament and people traveled far along the road of human progress in their contests with Charles I. They fell back, however, and for many long years the milestone then planted by them was lost to their vision. The French Revolution, that most sublime convulsion of human passion and human aspiration, struck the shackles from twenty-five million people, who, rising from the degradation and misery produced by ages of misrule and oppression, proclaimed liberty, fraternity, equality to all men. Yet they soon fell back from their advanced position. Their own excesses, their divisions, and irrational measures paved the way for a new dynasty. Louis XVI went to the guillotine, and Napoleon came to the throne. This is a most important epoch in our history. We now have seven or eight million dissatisfied, discontented, maddened whites. They are to be restored to the body-politic and made contented. The nation can be generous. It must be generous. But charity must not be converted into weakness. Four million negroes commingled with a hostile population, scarcely knowing whether they are slave or free, uneducated, immersed in poverty, ready for any scheme to benefit themselves, and yet too ignorant to select the best means, they must be cared for, and a way be provided to give them contentment and knowledge and security for the future. They demand our sympathy, but that must be the sympathy of reasoning men, and not the fruitless simpering of children. If we make mistakes now it will be many years before we can recover. Let none be made. But I may dismiss all questions affecting the policy of this bill, for it is enough that it is unconstitutional.

To return to the point from which I digressed, I repeat, that, for all purposes connected with this bill, in determining what is a republican form of government, we must look to the Constitution itself, we must be controlled by facts and not by theories. Theory is good to induce a change of organic law, but it is not good to authorize legislation in the face of that law. Our forefathers, in fact, admitted the republicanism of Virginia with two hundred and ninety-three thousand slaves; the republicanism of Maryland with one hundred and three thousand slaves; that of North Carolina with one hundred thousand, and South Carolina with one hundred and seven thousand. If these States could be republican in form with so large a number of their people in slavery, surely the denial of suffrage alone could not, by any analogy, take from them the character of republicanism. I would be glad to think otherwise, but I cannot force my mind to believe what contradicts the history of the time.

Mr. SUMNER. Do I understand my friend as insisting that the denial of the franchise is consistent with a republican government? For instance, take the State of South Carolina, which denies the franchise to more than half its population.

Mr. HENDERSON. In theory it is not. Under the Constitution it was regarded as a republican State at the time of the adoption of the instrument.

Mr. SUMNER. It did not deny the franchise to more than half its citizens then; they were slaves.

Mr. HENDERSON. It then had only one hundred and forty thousand whites, and had one hundred and seven thousand slaves. It also had eighteen hundred free negroes. I think it more nearly a republican State now than then. Practically, the question of suffrage was left to the States.

Mr. SUMNER. But that is the question, whether they were left to deny the suffrage to any freeman on account of color.

Mr. HENDERSON. If that be the question, then the point is against my friend, for both South Carolina and Virginia did deny the suffrage to the free negroes on account of color only, at the time when the Constitution was made, and when it was adopted. Virginia had upward of twelve thousand free negroes thus denied.

Mr. SUMNER. But the question is—I cannot anticipate my friend's conclusion on that point—

Mr. HENDERSON. My conclusion is, that a mistake was made in recognizing a constitution as republican that permitted slavery. I knew of no way to get rid of it except by constitutional amendment. I think another mistake was committed in leaving each State to so far abridge the right of suffrage as to change, in theory, the republican form. But such is the Constitution and you cannot change it by act of Congress. That is my conclusion.

Mr. SUMNER. You are wrong; it is a question of theory, and I say that our fathers so held.

Mr. HENDERSON. But our fathers did not deal with it in the Constitution as a question of theory, but as a question of fact. Whatever may have been their theories, I mean only to say that the text of the Constitution does not carry them out—

Mr. SUMNER. Now, the practical point is, did our fathers concede to any State the power of disfranchising citizens on account of color? I utterly deny it, and I challenge my friend to show any authority for it.

Mr. HENDERSON. Why, Mr. President, if I have already failed to show it, I must fail in the future. I have shown that the suffrage was left to the States, and that they did exclude their negroes; that they held in slavery in Virginia almost half of their population, and that Virginia was called a republican State. Indeed, she was most prominent in making the very provisions we are discussing. She excluded the slaves and—

Mr. SUMNER. Ah! slaves. That is another thing. The question is whether you are allowed to disfranchise freemen on account of color, whether you are allowed to deny them their rights as citizens. That I utterly deny. The exception was with regard to slaves who were not regarded as members of the body-politic. They were in that respect treated as minors or as women, represented by their masters; but every freeman, no matter what his color was, was recognized as entitled to all the privileges of citizenship. He was one of the sovereigns. The proposition cannot be met, if my friend will consult the history of his country.

Mr. HENDERSON. It was not slaves only that were disfranchised, but I have shown that free negroes were also disfranchised. But I have no controversy with the Senator in what we mutually aim at.

Mr. SUMNER. I know that, and I concede to my excellent friend, of course, all that I claim for myself. We are in search of the best that can be done on this occasion. I applaud his zeal and thank him for his courtesy.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am certainly very much obliged to the Senator from Massachusetts. I feel now ten times better than I did before. [Laughter.]

I cannot longer detain the Senate in presenting objections to the exercise of legislative power under the guarantee clause. It is sufficient to control my own action, that I believe by the letter, and even spirit of the Constitution, the suffrage was placed exclusively under the control of State action. I think that the error of so placing it is as clear as the error made in tolerating slavery. To rid ourselves of the evil, however, we must amend the Constitution.

Mr. SUMNER. Do I understand my friend to say that a State might adopt a rule, for instance, founded on the color of the hair, so that all men with light hair should be excluded from the right of suffrage? I insist that a State is not, under the Constitution of the United States, authorized to make any exclusion on account of color.

Mr. HENDERSON. It ought not to be, you mean.

Mr. SUMNER. No; it cannot be. Color cannot be a qualification. There may be a qualification founded on age or residence or knowledge or crime.

Mr. HENDERSON. You are now coming in conflict with the committee of fifteen, who declare by their resolution that the States now have the power, and may yet exclude everybody of a particular race or color.

Mr. SUMNER. I understand that the committee propose to place that in the Constitution of the United States, and that is one reason why I object to their report. I say that they propose to do what our fathers never did.

Mr. HENDERSON. The Senator from Massachusetts is in theory perhaps correct. He is speaking, however, of an ideal constitution.

SENATE.

Apportionment of Representation—Mr. Henderson.

39TH CONG....1ST SESS.

The true republican principle requires that as large a portion of the people, as is consistent with the public good, shall be permitted to vote. All I contend for is that our fathers supposed the States were to preserve the true theory, and in that belief left the control of the subject with them. They have abused the power. It is true that but few of the original thirteen denied suffrage to free blacks. But if any of them denied it, my friend's theory is upset, for all the States were claimed as republican States by the fathers.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The western States have always denied it.

Mr. HENDERSON. But I am speaking of the original thirteen, because it is of their institutions that the framers of the Constitution spoke most.

Mr. President, it was my intention to show that the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery gives no sanction to this bill; but I have been so long detained by interruptions, leading me into a course of thought not anticipated and causing me to repeat myself again and again, I shall pass it by with a simple remark. Slavery or involuntary servitude is a condition in which the slave has no will of his own. He belongs to another; may be compelled to labor without wages. He may be sold against his will, and the title to his person pass to another. The right to control his person and labor passes by inheritance. His posterity follow his condition. He can own no property. Whatever may be acquired by him passes and belongs to his owner. It is a condition well known and understood in this country. That well-known relation of master and slave is now abolished. It was the function of the constitutional amendment to destroy and break up forever that relation. In my judgment it goes no further. It declares that slavery or involuntary servitude, except for crime, shall not exist in the United States, and then confers on Congress the power to enforce the provision by appropriate legislation. From this the Senator and others deduce the power to confer the suffrage by act of Congress. It is not claimed that the negro is not technically free, but it is said he cannot maintain his freedom without the suffrage, and therefore Congress may adopt any measures necessary to enforce his freedom. This argument makes the discretion of Congress the only limit of its power in the employment of means to maintain and perpetuate his freedom. Were this true, Congress might deem it necessary to educate him, and not only educate, but confer a classical education. In the judgment of many, an education, moral and intellectual, is as necessary to freedom as the ballot itself; but when this is given it may be found that freedom is an empty name without competency. A homestead may be given, and if a homestead be found useless until it is sufficiently stocked, Congress may proceed to furnish the means to stock it. Again, if freedom cannot be maintained without the ballot, then woman must enjoy it or be reduced to slavery. The argument, though on the side of mercy, and welling up from a pure and good fountain, I think is untenable.

Mr. WADE. I wish to put a question if the Senator is willing.

Mr. HENDERSON. Certainly.

Mr. WADE. Before he passes from this part of the subject, I wish to suggest to the Senator that I am not quite clear in my mind that we have not the power to legislate under the amended Constitution.

Mr. HENDERSON. To legislate suffrage?

Mr. WADE. To legislate suffrage by an act of Congress. Slavery is abolished by the constitutional amendment, and the second clause is that Congress may enforce that by appropriate legislation.

Mr. HENDERSON. The meaning of that, then, is that nobody is free or can be free in the States unless he has the suffrage.

Mr. WADE. I only want to state it, and as the Senator has thought much on the subject, I wish him to answer this: I understand the construction that the courts have put upon the Constitution is that when a power is granted in the Constitution, the means to accomplish it are given with it, and that Congress is not restricted to any particular mode of indicating the constitutional proposition unless the Constitution itself has prescribed the means. Now, we are to free the slaves. Suppose a majority of Congress believe that the only way to secure that freedom and make it effectual is by granting the franchise to the whole population there, have we no right to do it? We are to enforce or guaranty their freedom. Now, suppose that a majority of us come to the conclusion that the only way to do that and make it secure is by giving the franchise to all, have we not the power to do it? We are to effect it in some way, and the Constitution does not prescribe or restrict us to any particular mode. I should like to hear that position answered.

Mr. HENDERSON. That is the whole subject I have been discussing. It seems the Senator disagrees with me. I cannot help it. I wish we could think alike. Perhaps I had better think with him than he with me. It might be better for the country, because his thoughts are generally better than mine; but his question involves the whole subject at issue, and to answer it would be to go over all I have said. Our Constitution is a written instrument. Congress can exercise no powers unless they are delegated. If implied powers are as broad as our discretion, our discretion may be as unlimited as the caprices of tyranny itself. Implied powers must be necessary to accomplish the end. The Senator talks about freedom and defines the word for himself. I might possibly define it a little differently; but the word freedom is not used in the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery. The Constitution is, that neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except for crime, shall exist in the United States; and the second clause of it is, that Congress shall have power by appropriate legislation to enforce the provision. There is not the word "freedom" in it. Now, I think that persons may be neither in slavery nor involuntary servitude, who are yet denied the suffrage, in the respective States. If that be not true, every minor and every woman under twenty-one years of age in the State of Ohio is a slave. The negro is now free. To exercise implied powers to clothe that freedom with certain advantages, in my judgment, is a different thing.

Mr. WADE. One moment. I perceive that some of those who have argued this matter have considered that the franchise was freedom. They are synonymous terms in the minds of many. I do not understand them to be so. Undoubtedly a man may be free and not have the right to vote; but can that freedom be guaranteed and secured and enforced in a hostile community unless you give him that right?

Mr. HENDERSON. I will admit the Senator's position for the argument's sake, but then the question recurs, how shall the suffrage be secured? The suffrage may, in my judgment and in his, be the best means of securing independence, education, and other blessings belonging to a state of freedom.

Mr. SUMNER. Then have we not the power?

Mr. HENDERSON. I am talking about the power. I do not doubt that we have the power to propose a constitutional amendment, and if adopted the object will be accomplished.

Believing that four and a half million people cannot be kept in peace without a voice in the making of the laws to govern them, I am seeking to give them that voice. The Senator from Massachusetts thinks it can be done in a certain way. I think it cannot. This is all of it. If his bill be adopted the courts may say, it is void; I think they will; and we shall be where we commenced. If the amendment be adopted, it will be an assured advance in civilization, as well as in governmental reform.

Mr. SUMNER. May I remind my friend of the decision of the Supreme Court on two most solemn occasions in two of the best considered judgments that you find in our reports? They have laid down the rule to govern this very case. They have conceded to Congress the full discretion with regard to the means to be employed in carrying out any of its powers. There is no court, there is no branch of the Government, that can sit in judgment on Congress, when, in its discretion, it thinks best to exercise a power.

Mr. HENDERSON. You allude, of course, to the McCulloch case.

Mr. SUMNER. The McCulloch case and the case of Hunter vs. Martin.

Mr. HENDERSON. With all deference to the honorable Senator, I must now protest against those oft-quoted decisions being published again in this speech. I am, perhaps, the best-natured man in the world, but I cannot agree to publish in pamphlet form the opinions even of Chief Justice Marshall. If I publish this speech at all, I must publish with it, many able speeches of many Senators. They must be satisfied with their speeches alone. I am too poor to include the decisions of the Supreme Court. [Laughter.] The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CLARK] suggests that I have a right to cut them out. That will not do. It would be unjust to myself and equally unjust to others. I have been so kindly treated that I dislike to complain, but interruptions have forced me from the proper order of my remarks, and compelled me to trespass too long on the patience of the Senate. If let alone, I should soon have nothing more to say and might stop.

Now, Mr. President, a few words in favor of my own proposition and I have done. I propose to make the State governments republican in fact, as they are in theory. The States now have the power and do exclude the negroes for no other reason than that of color. If the negro is equally competent and equally devoted to the Government as the Celt, the Saxon, or the Englishman, why should he not vote? If he pays his taxes, works the roads, repels foreign invasion with his musket, assists in suppressing insurrections, fells the forest, tills the soil, builds cities, and erects churches, what more shall he do to give him the simple right of saying he must be only equal in these burdens, and not oppressed? My proposition is put in the least offensive form. It respects the traditional right of the States to prescribe the qualifications of voters. It does not require that the ignorant and unlettered negro shall vote. Its words are simply that "no State, in prescribing the qualifications requisite for electors therein, shall discriminate against any person on account of race or color." The States may yet prescribe an educational or property test, but any such test shall apply to white and black alike. If the black man be excluded because he is uneducated, the uneducated white man must be excluded too. If a property test be adopted for the negro, as in New York, the same test must apply to the white man. It reaches all the States, and not a few only, in its operation. I confess that, so far as I am personally concerned, I would go still further and put other limitations on the power of the States in regard to suffrage. But Senators have expressed so much distrust that even this proposition cannot succeed, I have concluded to present it in a form the least objectionable in which I could frame it. It will be observed that this amendment, if adopted, will not prevent the State Legislatures from fixing official qualifications. They may prevent a negro from holding any office whatever under the State organization. It is a singular fact, however, that to-day, under the Federal Constitution, a negro may be elected President, United States Senator, or a member of the lower branch of Congress. In that instrument no qualification for office is prescribed which rejects the negro. The white man, not native born, may not be President, but the native-born African may be. The States, however, may in this respect, notwithstanding this amendment, do what the Federal Constitution never did.

My proposition is not so thorough as the suggested proviso of the Senator from Maine. He is willing to nullify all State laws making discrimination between the races in political rights and privileges. This would give the ballot and an equal right to hold office. The position of the Senator is an advanced one, and merits approbation. He prefers for himself, I take it, the simplified proposition I offer, to the committee's measure, which is duplex and evasive.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I would have the Senator not misapprehend me. He speaks as if I disapproved of the action of the committee.

Mr. HENDERSON. That is an inference of mine from the course of the Senator's speech to which I listened with pleasure.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not disapprove it in any shape or form. While I took the liberty to state what I preferred if it could be had, I did not undertake to say that under the circumstances it would be wise to do it.

Mr. HENDERSON. I understand the Senator. He admits the correctness of my views, but thinks them inexpedient.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I spoke of my own particular views in relation to that matter; but a man cannot always press his views against what may be his sense of propriety or prospect of success. A legislator must legislate for something that he can accomplish.

Mr. HENDERSON. When I remarked that "the Senator admits the correctness of my views," I regarded his views, as expressed in the proviso I have read, and my own views, as almost identical. At least they are substantially so. And I cannot be mistaken that the distinguished Senator's speech clearly indicated a preference by him for a plain, positive statement that the suffrage should be granted, over one permitting the States to exclude whole races of men in defiance of every principle of republican theory.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Will the Senator from Missouri allow me to ask him a question? I want to understand him if I can. Do I understand him to say that Congress by this amendment confers on the States a power that they do not now have?

Mr. HENDERSON. Certainly not. I did not say so.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I understood him to argue as if it was so.

Mr. HENDERSON. I see what the Senator is aiming at, I think. He intrenches himself behind the provisions of the present Constitution when he needs its shelter. It is good when it answers the purpose of his argument, but bad when it does not. He asks me if the States cannot now exclude the negro from the ballot. I answer, yes. But I thought we were amending the Constitution. Iowa refuses negro suffrage, and can do so after this committee amendment shall have been adopted without losing a member in Congress. No southern State can do so. The Senator seems more anxious to destroy the political power of certain States than to do justice to an oppressed race. It is true, under the Constitution as it now is, the States may exclude the negro from suffrage, but they may exclude him without loss of political power in Congress. He is willing to let the States continue to exclude the negro because, forsooth, it is the present Constitution. If so, why not stand by the Constitution throughout, and still let them retain their representation? If the existing Constitution is good against my argument, it is good against his.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. That is not the question.

Mr. HENDERSON. But that is the question.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Not according to my view. I understand the Senator to argue that we are about conferring on these States a privilege they have not had before. I do not so regard it. If the Senator argues that under the Constitution there is no such power now, but that we are granting them a power, he is correct; but if they have that power, we are simply not interfering with that provision of the Constitution. That is all.

Mr. HENDERSON. I appreciate the Senator's position, and am glad to have his views, but I wish to confine myself to the neighborhood, at least, of my subject.

So soon as the rebellion had been put down by military force, means ought to have been taken to remove forever the causes that provoked it. The South made the issue boldly in the Montgomery confederation. It was not slavery especially that induced the separation. Slavery was but the incident. It was the inferiority of the black man and his unfitness for political association with the white man that constituted the corner-stone of the confederate fabric. When the fabric was torn down and scattered to the winds, the false political teachings, that entered into its construction, were abandoned by the builders. The South not only recognized the destruction of slavery on the downfall of the rebellion, but they were ready to abandon all the dogmas upon which slavery was founded. Slavery of white men, equals, was not justified by any portion of our people. It could only be justified as a guardianship or patriarchal government over an inferior race. If the inferiority were admitted, slavery had its defense in some sort of reason. But the experiences of the war attacked and destroyed this defense, long known to the South itself to be utterly untenable. Hence, on submitting to the national authority, they equally yielded to the logic of events on the negro question. They were ready to give up, in practice anyhow, the idea of the negro's inferiority. Mr. Calhoun, and other prominent men in the South, always held that if the negro were made free it was tantamount to a declaration of his equality, and his enfranchisement must follow.

If President Johnson had said in his proclamation of amnesty, "Whereas the people of the seceded States organized a rebellion and fought for four years against the Government of the United States in an unholy attempt to perpetuate the slavery of an entire race, on the false ground of the inferiority of that race; and whereas their rebellion has been overthrown, now I, Andrew Johnson, desiring to see slavery and its attendant evils removed, and that justice be established throughout the land, North and South, do proclaim that all persons taking part in said rebellion shall be pardoned upon the express condition that slavery and all its pretensions shall be abolished, and that all distinctions of race and color in civil and political rights shall henceforth cease," would they not have accepted it? Would they not have been glad to accept it? No doubt about it; and then this angry controversy, just beginning to mold new political organizations, would have been unknown.

Mr. CONNESS. The President tells you that he is afraid that would bring about a war of races.

Mr. HENDERSON. Simple justice never made war. To show that I am not mistaken in the expectations of the country, North and South, on this subject, I refer first to the testimony of Mr. Reagan of Texas, who was the postmaster general under the rebel government, and was one of the most active and persistent of rebel chiefs. His testimony is but the expression of a then fixed public sentiment at the South. He says, in a letter addressed to the people of Texas, just after the fall of the confederacy:

"I have no doubt you can adopt a plan which will fully meet the demands of justice and fairness, and satisfy the northern mind and the requirements of the Government, without endangering good government and the repose of society. This can be done by

"First, extending the privileges and protection of the laws over negroes as they are over the whites, and allowing them to testify in the courts on the same conditions; leaving their testimony subject to the rules relating to its credibility; but not objecting to its admissibility. And in this you will conform with the wise current of legislation, and the tendency of all judicial decisions in all enlightened countries.

"And, second, by fixing an intellectual, moral, and, if thought necessary, a property test for the admission of all persons to the exercise of the elective franchise, without reference to race or color, which would secure its intelligent exercise."

In enumerating the advantages of these suggestions, he says:

"First. It would remove all just grounds of antagonism and hostility between the white and black races. Unless this is done endless strife and bitterness of feeling must characterize their relations, and, as all history and human experience teach us, must sooner or later result in a war of races. We now know from sad experience what war is between equals and enlightened people. But of all wars a social war of races is the most relentless and cruel, the extermination or expulsion from the country or enslavement of one or the other being the inevitable end where they are left to themselves, or the loss of liberty to both races where they are both subject to the control of a superior power, which would be our situation. I speak, of course, of the legal rights and status of the two races. Their social relations are matters of taste and choice, and not subject to legislative regulation.

"Second. This course would disarm and put an end to inter-State sectional political agitation, on this subject at least, which has been the special curse of our country for so many years, and which was the cause of the unnumbered woes we have recently experienced and still suffer; by depriving the agitators of a subject on which to keep up such an agitation, and of the means of producing jealousy, animosity, and hatred between the different races. And this would do much toward the renewal of the ancient relations of national harmony and fraternal good will between all parts of the country."

The President of the United States, who is now supposed to be so utterly opposed to negro suffrage, even as late as October last, authorized a publication by one Major Stearns, giving his opinion most decidedly in its favor. The President said:

"My position here is different from what it would be if I were in Tennessee.

"There I should try to introduce negro suffrage gradually; first, those who had served in the Army; those who could read and write, and perhaps a property qualification for others, say two hundred or two hundred and fifty dollars."

In the early days of last October, I had a conversation myself with the President, in which I expressed some fears of the loyalty of the new organizations, and took occasion to suggest the hope that he would insist on some sort of modified negro suffrage in those States, as a means of taking the question forever out of politics, and further, of removing, as far as possible, the false sentiments that originated and gave strength to the rebellion. The result of the conversation was that I was authorized to give publicity to his views, which I did in a speech of October 21, in my State, from which I read an extract:

"Taking his stand-point that the States are still in the Union, he does not think he can consistently interfere with the franchise in those States or in any other; that is, that he can confer it upon persons not enjoying it under the respective State constitutions, as they existed before the rebellion; but as an individual he desires that the negro shall be enfranchised and would be gratified to see the several State conventions extend the franchise to all persons of color who can read the Constitution of the United States in English and write their names, and also to all persons of color who own real estate valued at not less than $250, and who pay taxes thereon."

I again repeat that these words were uttered to me by the President of the United States in the early days of October last, and now it is given out that the President is opposed to negro suffrage, not only in the States, but in the District of Columbia, where the power of Congress is not disputed. On the 10th of last October, the President addressed a regiment of negro soldiers, returning from service, in which he said:

"This is your country as well as anybody else's country. This is the country in which you expect to live and in which you expect to do something by your example in civil life, as you have done in the field. This country is founded on the principle of equality."

Again:

"It is for you to establish the great fact that you are fit and qualified to be free."

And again:

"He is the most exalted that is the most meritorious, without regard to color."

SENATE.

Representation of Southern States—Mr. Sherman.

39TH CONG....1ST SESS.

But it seems now the question of the negro's capacity to govern himself is not to be judged from his conduct. It is to be settled against him without trial. Merit is to be put out of the question. His inferiority is to be assumed, and the results of injustice to him, ignorance, poverty, degradation, are to be forever the quoted evidences of that inferiority. The question of human slavery entered into party politics, and justice was slow. The question of human right, involved in enfranchisement, is now given to party politics. Justice may be slow, but come, it must.

Against this measure but three arguments are urged:

1. That it produces social equality. This objection is totally unfounded. Is each voter the equal of another? Does my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. DOOLITTLE] regard every man, native and foreign, naturalized and unnaturalized, who is entitled to the ballot in that State, as his social equal?

2. It is urged that the negro is of another and an inferior race. Admit his race to be different from ours, does he not belong to the family of man? Is he not actuated by the same motives, possessed of the same feelings, and animated by the same hopes? He may not belong to the same race, but he belongs to the family of man, and the proudest boast of our free country to-day, is, that it is the home and asylum of man. If his race be inferior in intellectual power, that constitutes the strongest reason for guarding his rights against the assaults of the more vigorous and crafty. Are all men now entitled to the franchise equal in intellectual power? Are they all equal in sagacity and knowledge? Is the unlettered Irishman, shut out year after year from the light of the sun, in the coal mines of Pennsylvania, equally qualified to cast an intelligent vote with the distinguished members of the Federal judiciary now dispensing justice in this Capitol? But I ask, Senators, will you deny suffrage to the coal-digger? Or will you give another ballot to the eminent judge? Natural inferiority amounts to nothing. The question is, are the negroes capable of such moral training as to give them love of social order, and such intellectual training as to have them know and appreciate their rights and duties in the community? If they are incapable of such training, the States may yet deny them the franchise, after my amendment has been adopted. If the alleged inferiority prove unfounded, the worship of prejudice must cease, and the image of this unjust god be broken into dust. Can the experiment do any harm? Let us try it.

3. It is said that qualified, educated, intelligent negro suffrage will bring a war of races. Why so? Are white men so unjust that rather than suffer simple justice to be done to their fellow-men, rather than see the true republican principle vindicated in government, they will imbrue their hands in the negro's blood? I believe no such thing, and if I did believe it, I could scarcely hope for the success of my fellow white men in this war against humanity. If it be desirable to prevent a war of races, it can be done by simple justice to both races. If one race be taxed without representation, followed by the usual abuses of such power, and followed, too, by the prejudice and contempt of the ruling class, will not war of races come sooner? It must, it will come. It can be prevented now. Let it be done.

The reasons in favor of my proposition are inseparably connected with all I have said. I need not repeat them. Every consideration of peace demands it. It must be done to remove the relics of the rebellion. It must be done to pluck out political disease from the body-politic, and restore the elementary principles of our Government. It must be done to preserve peace in the States and harmony in our Federal system. It must be done to assure the happiness and prosperity of the southern people themselves. It must be done to establish in our institutions the principles of universal justice. It must be done to secure the strongest possible guarantees against future wars. It must be done in obedience to that golden rule, which insists upon doing to others what we would that others should do unto us. It must be done if we would obey the moral law that teaches us to love our neighbors as ourselves. In fine, it must be done to purify, strengthen, and perpetuate a Government, in which are now fondly centered, the best hopes of mankind.

Representation of Southern States.

SPEECH OF HON. JOHN SHERMAN,

OF OHIO,

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

February 26, 1866,

On the concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives relative to the representation of certain States.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, the immediate question before the Senate is upon the resolution of the House of Representatives, passed on the 21st instant, declaring that no Senator or Representative shall be admitted into either branch of Congress from any of the eleven States which have been declared to be in insurrection until Congress shall have declared such State entitled to such representation. This question, together with the reasons stated in the resolution for its passage, the circumstances under which it is pressed in Congress, and the many pending propositions of a kindred character now on our table, induces me to follow the example so often set in the Senate, and to discuss all these kindred propositions now while I have the floor. I shall do so as clearly and as briefly as possible, in the order in which they will probably present themselves for our vote. And first as to this resolution.

If the meaning of the resolution is that as a matter of convenience in the discharge of our duties the Senators and Representatives ought to act in concert with each other in legislating upon and in discussing all propositions affecting the right of States to representation, surely it is a reasonable proposition. We have already acted in concert at the beginning of this session by creating a joint committee as an organ of both bodies to confer with each other and to communicate to each House separately their deliberations. We have often before recognized the propriety of acting through joint committees on questions of great importance, when the concurrence of both Houses is needed, and when a free conference will probably tend to produce an agreement. Therefore, if this is the purpose of this resolution, it is a very simple and plain one, and obviously defensible.

But, Mr. President, this resolution goes further. It asserts, and it was intended to assert, that with Congress, and with Congress alone, rests the duty of defining when a State once declared to be in insurrection shall be admitted to representation in this and the other House of Congress. This is a proposition of constitutional law; and on this point I am glad to say that there has been no difference of opinion among us until this session of Congress. This question has been three times decided in the Senate. It has been decided by the unanimous report of our Judiciary Committee. It has not been controverted in this body until within a very few days, or until during the present session of Congress. At the last session a unanimous report was made from the Judiciary Committee, composed of some of the ablest lawyers in the Senate, in which this doctrine is, in my judgment, more clearly and distinctly expressed than in the resolution now before us. I cannot see why any one who gave his deliberate judgment to that proposition can oppose this. The honorable Senator from Maine read a portion of this report on Friday, but it will bear repetition, and I will now read it:

"The persons in possession of the local authorities in Louisiana having rebelled against the authority of the United States, and her inhabitants having been declared to be in a state of insurrection in pursuance of a law passed by the two Houses of Congress, your committee deem it improper for this body to admit to seats Senators from Louisiana, till by some joint action of both Houses there shall be some recognition of an existing State government acting in harmony with the Government of the United States and recognizing its authority."

If this is law, how can any Senator vote against the pending proposition unless it is for reasons not involving the merits of that proposition? But this is not the only case, for I find that this very question was made, and by a vote of the Senate was definitely decided, and it was made so distinctly that no Senator could have voted for the proposition I am now about to read without understanding its full purport and effect.

It will be remembered that a bill came to the Senate, passed by the House of Representatives guaranteeing to the seceded States a republican form of government, commonly known as the Wade and Davis bill. It was antagonized here by various propositions, and among the rest by a proposition offered by the honorable Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BROWN.] That bill contained many sections intended to provide a mode by which these eleven States might, when the rebellion was suppressed within their limits, be restored to their old places in the Union. The proposition offered by Mr. BROWN, as a substitute for the bill, I will now read: and I invite the attention of Senators to the distinct assertion of the very doctrine that is proclaimed in this resolution:

"That when the inhabitants of any State have been declared in a state of insurrection against the United States by proclamation of the President, by force and virtue of the act entitled 'An act to provide for the collection of duties on imports, and for other purposes,' approved July 13, 1861, they shall be, and are hereby declared to be, incapable of casting any vote for electors of President or Vice President of the United States, or of electing Senators or Representatives in Congress, until said insurrection in said State is suppressed or abandoned, and said inhabitants have returned to their obedience to the Government of the United States."

Then mark these words—

"nor until such return to obedience shall be declared by proclamation of the President, issued by virtue of an act of Congress, hereafter to be passed, authorizing the same."

This proposition was introduced in antagonism to the proposition then before the Senate, as a substitute for it, to cover the whole ground, and I am told was framed by our fellow Senator now dead, Judge Collamer. After debate it was adopted as a substitute by the close vote of 17 yeas to 16 nays. Among the yeas were every Democratic member of this Senate and some of the Republicans. All the nays were Union Senators, friends of the original bill, including many classed as radicals. I give the vote in full:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Carlile, Cowan, Davis, Doolittle, Grimes, Henderson, Hendricks, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, McDougall, Powell, Richardson, Riddle, Saulsbury, Trumbull, and Van Winkle—17.
NAYS—Messrs. Chandler, Clark, Conness, Hale, Harlan, Lane, of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Wade, Wilkinson, and Wilson—16.

It may be said that these gentlemen voted for this proposition for the purpose of defeating a more offensive one; and if the vote rested here that would be a reasonable explanation. But in order to point the significance of this vote the honorable Senator from Illinois, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, [Mr. TRUMBULL,] called attention to the importance of the question and said he wanted a definite vote upon this proposition by itself. He stated its importance, the effect of the principle involved, and asked for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill as amended, in order, as he said, to ascertain the judgment of the Senate upon this distinct proposition. The bill then contained nothing but what I have read to you, and the vote was taken by yeas and nays, and stood as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Chandler, Conness, Doolittle, Grimes, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Johnson,

39TH CONG. 1ST SESS.

SENATE.

Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, McDougal, Morgan, Pomroy, Ramsey, Riddle, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Wilkinson, and Wilson—28.

"NAYS—Messrs Davis, Powell, and Sanbury—3."

So that by this deliberate vote, after debate, after the attention of the Senate had been called to the importance of the proposition by the judicial organ of this body, at a time when there was no excitement and no party feeling here on this proposition, the doctrine we are discussing was asserted by an almost unanimous vote of the Senate. It seems to me that with this declaration of the opinion of the Senate before us, made when it was not influenced by party feeling or party excitement, we ought not to doubt the correctness of the pending resolution, not near so strong in its tenor or language. It ought not to be resisted by any one who thus committed the Senate to that proposition against a measure that would have organized a system to reconstruct the seceding States.

But, Mr. President, I need not depend upon the vote of the Senate or upon the authorities, because I think, if you test this proposition by the simplest principles of constitutional law there can appear no doubt that Congress has the sole and exclusive power over this subject. The Constitution of the United States gives to the President of the United States no legislative power except as a part of the law-making power. He is an executive officer, with no legislative power except that which he exercises in connection with us. The Constitution of the United States confers upon Congress not only the power to raise and support armies, to appropriate money therefor, and to provide and maintain a navy, but—

"To make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces."

And among the residuary powers conferred upon Congress is that important one—

"To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof."

Therefore, where a power is conferred upon the President, and the legislative power is necessary in order to carry that power into effect, Congress alone possesses the power to arm the Executive with the necessary authority to execute the laws. Upon Congress alone rests all the residuary powers; and therefore it is that the power of Congress follows our flag wherever it floats. Our flag may go round the world, to South America, to Italy, to China; it may go into any foreign country as it did in Mexico; it may go into the southern States subduing a rebellion, and wherever it goes the legislative power of Congress goes with it. It regulates and governs the Army, and the President has nothing to do but to execute the will of Congress and the Constitution of the United States.

It seems, therefore, testing it by reason, that this power must rest in Congress. The doctrine is very strongly stated by Story, in his Commentaries on the Constitution, in very much the language I have used; and he says, in speaking of the powers of Congress, that the jurisdiction and power of the Government of the United States follow our flag or our Army into a foreign country, and Congress may make rules and regulations for the government of the Army of the United States in a foreign country as well as in our own, and it is the duty of the President to execute them. It is true that, in the absence of rules and regulations prescribed by Congress the President may make such regulations as are absolutely necessary for the government of the Army wherever it is, but it is only as a part of his duty to execute the general laws. If Congress chooses to step in and prescribe the mode and manner in which these powers shall be exercised, he is bound by his oath to observe such rules and regulations. I conclude, therefore, that as Congress has declared eleven States to be in a state of insurrection, as it is necessary now to pass some plan or law by which these States may be restored to their old place in the Union, Congress has the undoubted legislative power to prescribe the terms, conditions, and tests by which their loyalty and obedience to the law may be adjudged.

TENDENCY OF THIS RESOLUTION.

But, Mr. President—and I say it with great deference to the committee who reported it—I do not believe the bare assertion of this power tends to promote the object stated by the resolution itself. The object of this resolution is stated to be to close agitation upon a question which seems likely to disturb the action of the Government, as well as to quiet the uncertainty which is agitating the minds of the people of the eleven States which have been declared to be in a state of insurrection. If this resolution would tend to promote these great objects, I would vote for it much more cheerfully than I will; but I regard it as a mere straw in a storm, thrown in at an inopportune moment; the mere assertion of a naked right which has never yet been disputed, and never can be successfully; a mere assertion of a right that we have over and over again asserted. The only doubt I ever had about the resolution was the wisdom of introducing it and passing it under the previous question in one House at a moment when there was undue or unusual excitement in the public mind. My idea is that the true way to assert this power is to exercise it, and that it was only necessary for Congress to exercise that power in order to meet all these complicated difficulties. This resolution does not provide for the contingencies that have happened. Let me state the case. Suppose the two Houses of Congress cannot agree upon a plan of reconstruction, as it is very obvious we shall have difficulty in doing. Opposition here is already developed to the constitutional amendment as part of the plan agreed upon, in quarters at least to me unexpected, and it is very doubtful whether we can agree by the requisite majority upon this leading idea of a change of the Constitution. Suppose the two Houses of Congress cannot agree with each other, what then? Must these eleven States stand in their present isolated condition beyond the pale of civil law until the two Houses can agree upon some proposition?

Again, suppose that Congress will not agree with the President, as actually occurred in the passage of the Wade and Davis bill. We sent to President Lincoln our plan of reconstruction. He declined to approve it. There was a difference between Congress and the President. Up to this hour we never have exercised our power to regulate the mode and manner of bringing these States back into the Union. Suppose this difference exists between the various departments of the law-making power and no law should be passed on the subject, is it intended by this resolution to assert that no representatives from these eleven States shall come back here, and that the power of each House to judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members shall not be exercised until by force or in some other way we can be compelled to agree? Must these States be deprived of all representation here until a forced verdict is drawn out of Congress with the assent of the President? Not at all.

I have no doubt of the power of Congress to pass any law it can on the subject, but I know very well that if Congress fails to pass a law after a reasonable time, either House can and will exercise its undoubted power to admit Senators and Representatives on the floor of Congress. If we fail to pass a plan of reconstruction at the present session of Congress, this resolution will not prevent either House of Congress from hereafter exercising its undoubted power to pass upon the claim of any one who comes here at this bar demanding a seat as a Senator of the United States. Therefore I say that the measure proposed does not meet the real difficulty in the case. What we want is a plan of action by which these States may, upon such terms and conditions as are consistent with the public safety, come back into this Union.

THE WADE-DAVIS BILL.

Mr. President, in my judgment the real difficulty in this whole matter has been the unfortunate failure of the executive and legislative branches of the Government to agree upon a plan of reconstruction. If at the last session we had provided a law, reasonable in itself, proper in its provisions, by which these States might have been guided in their efforts to come back into the Union, that would have been an end of this controversy; but unfortunately (and I am not here either to arraign the living or the dead) there was a failure to agree. Earlier in this war, during the Thirty-Seventh Congress, a gentleman now in his grave, and whose eulogy was so fittingly pronounced the other day in the House of Representatives by his colleague here, Henry Winter Davis, prepared a bill to meet this exigency. He was not then a member of Congress. He brought that bill to me. It was a bill to guaranty to each State a republican form of government. The provisions of the bill pointed out a plan by which these States, then declared by Congress to be in a state of insurrection, might, when that insurrection was subdued or abandoned, come back freely and voluntarily into the Union. It provided for representation; it provided for the election of a convention and a Legislature, and the election of Senators and members of Congress. It was a complete guarantee to the people within the States upon certain conditions to come back into the Union. The provisions and tests by which to judge when the state of insurrection had ceased and determined were prescribed. I introduced that bill here at the request of Mr. Davis. It was referred to the Judiciary Committee. It was not acted upon by them. I suppose they thought it premature. Afterward Mr. Davis came into the Thirty-Eighth Congress as a member of the House of Representatives. Among the first acts performed by him after taking his seat was the introduction of this same bill, framed by him and introduced by me into the Senate, in the House of Representatives. It was introduced by him on the 15th December, 1863. It was debated in the House of Representatives and passed by a very decided vote, and it was sent to the Senate. Its history I have already in part stated. It was reported to the Senate favorably; but in place of it was substituted the proposition I have already read, offered by the Senator from Missouri, which was adopted in the Senate. It was sent back to the House; a committee of conference was appointed, and the result was the reporting to the Senate and the House of what was called the Wade and Davis bill. That bill was debated and finally passed upon the report of the committee of conference. It went to the President; he did not approve it. I have before me a proclamation issued by the President on the 8th of July, 1864, in which it is recited:

"Whereas at the late session Congress passed a bill to guaranty to certain States, whose governments have been usurped or overthrown, a republican form of government; a copy of which is herewith annexed; and whereas the said bill was presented to the President of the United States for his approval less than one hour before the quo die adjournment of said session, and was not signed by him; and whereas the said bill contains, among other things, a plan for restoring the States in rebellion to their proper practical relation in the Union, which plan expresses the sense of Congress upon that subject, and which plan it is now thought fit to lay before the people for their consideration:

"Now, therefore, I, Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States, do proclaim, declare, and make known, that while I am (as I was in December last, when by proclamation I propounded a plan for restoration) unprepared, by a formal approval of this bill, to be inflexibly committed to any single plan of restoration; and while I am also unprepared to declare that the free State constitutions and governments already adopted and installed in Arkansas and Louisiana shall be set aside and held for naught, thereby repelling and discouraging the loyal citizens who have set up the same as to further effort, or to declare a constitutional competency in Congress to abolish slavery in States, but am at the same time sincerely hoping and expecting that a constitutional amendment abolishing slavery throughout the nation may be adopted."

He then goes on and gives his reasons for not approving this plan; nor does he entirely disapprove of it, but he said it was one of numerous plans which might be adopted.

Mr. SUMNER. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him there? I will state that it so happened that I had an interview with the late President Lincoln immediately after the publication of that paper, and it was the subject of very minute and protracted conversation, in the course of which, after discussing it in detail, he expressed to me his regret that he had not accepted the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I think every patriotic citizen of the United States will express his regret, not so much that the President did not approve that bill, because I will not condemn the President for declining to sign it, but that Congress in connection with the President did not agree upon some plan of reconstruction by which these States might have been guided, so that when the rebellion was put down they might see in the form of law some guide to lead them in the difficult road to restoration. Who does not now see that any law upon the subject would have been better than the absence of all law? You must remember that whatever fault there is in this matter was in the law-making power of Congress and the President combined. This controversy was all over before the presidential election, and I think before the nomination of Andrew Johnson. And in presenting these facts I am bound here to say that the paper issued by my colleague and Mr. Davis in reply to the President's proclamation, did not meet the sanction of the people, but was generally condemned as introducing an unpleasant controversy into the presidential canvass.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment? I wish to propound a question about the Wade and Davis bill. Did not that bill provide for restricting the right of suffrage in the seceded States to the whites?

Mr. SHERMAN. It did. I will come to that after awhile, and will present that point distinctly. I have given you now, Mr. President, the history of that bill. I repeat that the declaration of my colleague was not approved by the people. He himself, perhaps, will agree with me that at that time it was generally regarded that the issue made by him before the people was unfortunate, because we were then in the midst of a presidential campaign. Certain it is that the public voice, so far as it could be gathered from the newspapers and from speeches and from various modes of expressing public opinion, was against the action of these two gentlemen, who, as chairmen of the respective committees of the two bodies, felt it their duty to defend this bill.

Thus, by the disagreement which commenced two years ago between Congress and the President, there was left no law upon the statute-book to guide either the President or the people of the southern States in their effort to get back to the embraces of the old Union. I regard that as a great misfortune.

PRESIDENT JOHNSON'S PLAN.

Now, I will ask Senators this plain question, whether we have a right now, having failed to do our constitutional duty, to arraign Andrew Johnson for following out a plan which in his judgment he deemed the best, and especially when that plan was the plan adopted by Mr. Lincoln, and which at least had the apparent ratification of the people of the United States in the election of Lincoln and Johnson.

After this effort made by Congress to provide a plan of reconstruction, there was no effort made subsequently, no bill was introduced on the subject at the last session of Congress, no further effort was made to harmonize the conflicting views of the President and Congress. One whole session intervened after this veto, as I may call it, of President Lincoln, and no effort was made by Congress to reconcile this conflict of views; and when President Johnson came suddenly, by the hand of an assassin, into the presidential chair, what did he have before him to guide his steps? The forces of the rebellion had been subdued; all physical resistance was soon after subdued; the armies of Lee and Johnston and all the other armies of the rebels had been overwhelmed, and the South lay at our power. Who doubts, then, that if there had been a law upon the statute-book by which the people of the southern States could have been guided in their effort to come back into the Union, they would have cheerfully followed it, although the conditions had been hard?

In the absence of law, I ask you whether President Lincoln and President Johnson did not do substantially right when they adopted a plan of their own and endeavored to carry it into execution? Although we may now find fault with the terms and conditions that were imposed by them upon the southern States, yet we must remember that the source of all power in this country, the people of the United States, in the election of these two men substantially sanctioned the plan of Mr. Lincoln. Why, sir, at the very time that Andrew Johnson was nominated for the Vice Presidency he was in Tennessee as military governor, executing the very plan that he subsequently attempted to carry out, and he was elected Vice President of the United States when he was in the practical execution of that plan. And now, before we examine the steps taken by the President, and fairly weigh the wisdom of his policy, we must determine the legal status of these seceded States.

STATES IN INSURRECTION.

What was the condition of these States? I shall not waste much time upon this point, because mere theoretical ideas never appear to me to have much force when we are legislating on practical matters. They have been declared to be States in insurrection, but States still. The very resolution we have before us repeats three times that they are States now. They are referred to as States not entitled to representation. They are stated to be,

"The eleven States which have been declared to be in insurrection."

And again:

"No Senator or Representative shall be admitted into either branch of Congress from any of said States until Congress shall have declared such State entitled to such representation."

I could show very many acts of Congress in which they are referred to as States, but States in insurrection. And there is no difference between Congress and the President as to the present condition of these States. The executive branch of the Government in all its departments now treats them as States in rebellion or in insurrection. Tennessee is the only one of these States that has been proclaimed by the President to be out of insurrection. He is now exercising power in all these States as States in insurrection. He is suspending newspapers, exercising arbitrary power, suspending the writ of habeas corpus, treating them yet as States in insurrection; and in this view, as I have stated, Congress concurs.

Now, what is the legal result of a State being in insurrection? It was sufficiently declared in the proposition I have already read, offered by the Senator from Missouri. They have no right while they are in insurrection to elect electors to the Electoral College; they have no right to elect Senators and Representatives. In other words, they lose all those powers, rights, and privileges conferred upon them by the Constitution of the United States. Having taken up arms against the United States, they by that act lose their constitutional powers within the United States to govern and control our councils. They cannot engage in the election of a President, or in the election of Senators or members of Congress; but they are still States, and have been so regarded by every branch and every department of this Government. They are States in insurrection, whose rights under the Constitution are suspended until they cease to be in insurrection. When that period arrives is a question, in my judgment, which must be determined by Congress, and not by the President, for the reason I have already stated; but it is clear that the first duty of Congress, under these circumstances, is to provide a mode and manner by which the condition of the States may be tested, and they may come back, one by one, each upon its own merits, upon complying with such conditions as the public safety demands.

WHAT THE PRESIDENT DID.

I propose now to recall, very briefly, the steps adopted by President Johnson in his plan of reconstruction. I do this for the purpose of presenting to the Senate, in a condensed view, the precise plan of reconstruction adopted by him, so that we may see at a single glance the present condition of these eleven States. When Mr. Johnson came into power he found the rebellion substantially subdued. What did he do? His first act was to retain in his confidence and in his councils every member of the Cabinet of Abraham Lincoln, and so far as we know every measure adopted by Andrew Johnson has had the approval and sanction of that Cabinet. If there is any doubt upon any measure it is upon the recent veto message; but up to and including that message, so far as we know—and in matters of this kind we cannot rely upon street rumors—Andrew Johnson's plan has met the approval of the Cabinet of Abraham Lincoln. He has executed every law passed by Congress upon every subject whatever, and especially has he executed the Freedmen's Bureau bill. He placed at the head of that Bureau General Howard, one of the most fit and worthy men in the United States, to conduct the delicate affairs of that bureau, and General Howard has never asked him for any single act of authority, any single power that was not freely granted by President Johnson. The Freedmen's Bureau is also under the control of Edwin M. Stanton. Every act passed by Congress in any way bearing on this rebellion the President has fairly and promptly executed. If there is any that he has failed to execute I should thank any Senator to name it to me for I do not now recall it. Not only that, but he adopted the policy of President Lincoln in hæc verba, as I shall show hereafter in examining his proclamations, and he extended and made more severe, as you may say, the policy adopted by Mr. Lincoln. Not only that, but in carrying out his plans of reconstruction, he adopted all the main features of the only bill passed by Congress—the Wade and Davis bill. I have the bill before me, but I have not time to go into its details. My colleague, who remembers the features of that bill, will know that the general plan adopted by President Johnson is the only plan that was ever adopted by Congress. Let us look into President Johnson's plan a little more and see what it was. His first proclamation was in reference to Virginia. In this proclamation, dated Executive Chamber, May 9, 1865, he provided:

"First. That all acts and proceedings of the political, military, and civil organizations which have been in a state of insurrection and rebellion within the State of Virginia against the authority and laws of the United States, and of which Jefferson Davis, John Letcher, and William Smith were late the respective chiefs, are declared null and void."

With a single stroke he swept away the whole superstructure of the rebellion. Then he provides for the execution of all the powers of the national Government within the rebel territory, extending there our tax laws. Perhaps President Johnson ought to have thought a little about these proclamations when he disputed the power of Congress to tax the people of the southern States. He was the first to extend over those States the tax laws of the United States, and appoint assessors and collectors of internal revenue and collectors of customs in the various ports. Then he provides:

39TH CONG. ... 1ST SESS.

SENATE.

"Ninth. That to carry into effect the guarantee of the Federal Constitution of a republican form of government, and afford the advantage and security of domestic laws, as well as to complete the reestablishment of the authority of the laws of the United States, and the full and complete restoration of peace within the limits aforesaid, Francis H. Pickens, Governor of the State of Virginia, will be aided by the Federal Government, so far as may be necessary, in the lawful measures which he may take for the extension and administration of the State government throughout the geographical limits of said State."

That was the first element of his plan of reconstruction. The next was the amnesty proclamation, issued on the 29th of May following. In this proclamation he recites the previous proclamation of President Lincoln, and then goes on:

"To the end, therefore, that the authority of the Government of the United States may be restored, and that peace, order, and freedom may be established, I, Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, do proclaim and declare that I hereby grant to all persons who have directly or indirectly participated in the existing rebellion, except as hereinafter excepted, amnesty and pardon, with restoration of all rights of property, except as to slaves, and except in cases where legal proceedings, under the laws of the United States providing for the confiscation of property of persons engaged in rebellion, have been instituted," &c.

And then in the oath of amnesty he provides that any person claiming the benefit of the amnesty should swear that he will "abide by and faithfully support all laws and proclamations which have been made during the existing rebellion with reference to the emancipation of slaves." Then he goes on and excepts from the operation of this amnesty some fourteen classes of persons, more than quadrupling the exceptions of the previous proclamation of Mr. Lincoln; so that if there was any departure in this connection from the policy adopted by Mr. Lincoln, it was a departure against the rebels, and especially against those wealthy rebels who gave life and soul and power to the rebellion.

CONDITIONS IMPOSED BY HIM.

These were the agencies and organs under which the plan of reconstruction was to go on. Now I ask you, what conditions were imposed on these people? First, the adoption of the constitutional amendment. He was not willing to leave the matter to their amnesty oath or to the proclamation of President Lincoln, but he demanded of them the incorporation in their State constitutions of a prohibition of slavery, and the adoption by their Legislatures of the constitutional amendment so as to secure beyond peradventure the abolition of slavery forever and ever throughout the United States. This he required in every order issued to the South, and demanded it as a first and preliminary condition to any effort toward reconstruction. Next, he demanded a repudiation of the rebel debt, and a guarantee put into the constitutions of the respective States that they never would under any circumstances pay any portion of the rebel debt. Next, he secured the enforcement of the test oath so that every officer in the southern States under the act of Congress was compelled to take that oath; or if he could not find officers there to do it, he sent officers from the northern States to do it, so that this law, the most objectionable of any to the southern people was enforced in all instances at the South. It is true he appointed some provisional governors who could not take the test oath; but why? Because it was held that these provisional governors were not officers under the law. They were not officers whose commission was provided for by law: they were simply executive agents for the time being to carry into execution the plan of reconstruction; and he felt that if he could use any of these people in the southern States for the purpose of performing this temporary duty he had a right to do it. It was not prohibited by any law. The test oath only applied to officers of the United States who were provided for by law.

Next, he enforced in every case full and ample protection to the freedmen of the southern States. As I said before, no case was ever brought to his knowledge, so far as I can gather, in which he did not do full and substantial justice.

Mr. MORRILL. Allow me to ask the Senator a question. Does he mean to say that the President required it as a condition of restoration that they should give protection to the freedmen of the South?

Mr. SHERMAN. I am merely speaking of what the President did, and I say that so far as I know he exercised and enforced every power of the Government to protect the freedmen of the southern States without exception. As a matter of course he did not require it as a condition to be inserted in their constitutions.

PARDONS.

Now, what are the objections to this policy? The first objection, that I have heard made most commonly, and which I have made myself, is, that the President was too liberal in exercising the pardoning power. But when we remember the fact that there were more than five times as many included in his exceptions as were included in the exceptions to the proclamation of Mr. Lincoln, and that the number of pardons in comparison with the whole number of persons excepted is substantially insignificant, and that we cannot know all the circumstances which surrounded every particular case of pardon, it is hardly fair for us to arraign the President of the United States. We can limit his power to pardon in these cases. The President of the United States has no power to pardon under the Constitution of the United States in cases like this. That power is derived from the amnesty law which we passed at an early period of the war. The constitutional power to pardon given to him by that instrument extends only to cases where there had been a legal accusation by indictment or affidavit, or to cases where a man had been tried and convicted of a crime. That is the kind of pardon contemplated by the Constitution, but the authority which we gave him by law to extend pardon and amnesty to the rebels is as broad as the insurrection itself. We conferred upon the President of the United States the unlimited power of amnesty, and he has exercised that power only to a very moderate degree.

SUFFRAGE WITHOUT DISTINCTION OF COLOR.

But the principal objection that has been made to his policy is that he did not extend his invitation to all the loyal men of the southern States, including the colored as well as the white people. If I were now required to state the leading objection made to the policy of the President in this particular, I should use the language of an eminent statesman, and say that when the President found before him an open field, with no law of Congress to impede him, with the power to dictate a policy in the South, to impose conditions on it, he ought to have addressed his proclamation to every loyal man above the age of twenty-one years. That would be the plan of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. SUMNER. Every loyal man.

Mr. SHERMAN. I mean every loyal man of sound mind. Now, let us look at that question. In every one of the eleven seceded States, before the rebellion, the negro was excluded from the right of voting by their laws. It is true the Senator from Massachusetts would say these are all swept away. Admit that, but in a majority of the northern States to this hour there is a denial of the right of suffrage to the colored population. In Ohio, Pennsylvania, and New York that right is limited, and these three States contain one third of the people of the United States. In a large majority of the States, including the most populous, negro suffrage is prohibited. And yet you ask President Johnson, by a simple mandatory proclamation or military order, to confer the franchise on a class of people who are not only prohibited from voting in the eleven southern States, but in a majority of the northern States, and indeed I think in all the States except six.

Further, it cannot be denied that the prejudice of the Army of the United States, who were called upon to enforce this proclamation within these States, was against negro suffrage. Whether that prejudice is wise or unwise, blinded or aided by the light of reason, I shall not say. I never myself could see any reason why, because a man was black, he should not vote; and yet, in making laws, as the President was then doing, for the government of the community, you must regard the prejudices, not only of the people among whom the laws are to be executed, but the prejudices of the Army and the people who are to execute those laws, and no man can doubt but what at that time there was a strong and powerful prejudice in the Army and among all classes of citizens against extending the right of suffrage to negroes, especially down in the far South, where the great body of the slaves were in abject ignorance.

But that is not all, Mr. President. The President of the United States was of the opinion that he had no power to extend the elective franchise to them, and therefore, in judging of his plan of reconstruction, we must give him at least a reasonable credit for honesty of purpose. In his message he tells you that this was the difficult subject which met him in the way, and he gives you frankly the reasons which induced him to exclude the colored population from the right to vote. He says:

"The relations of the General Government toward the four million inhabitants whom the war has called into freedom have engaged my most serious consideration. On the propriety of attempting to make the freedmen electors by the proclamation of the Executive, I took for my counsel the Constitution itself, the interpretations of that instrument by its authors and their contemporaries, and recent legislation by Congress. When, at the first movement toward independence, the Congress of the United States instructed the several States to institute governments of their own, they left each State to decide for itself the conditions for the enjoyment of the elective franchise."

After some further discussion he goes on to say:

"So fixed was this reservation of power in the habits of the people, and so unquestioned has been the interpretation of the Constitution, that during the civil war the late President never harbored the purpose, certainly never avowed the purpose, of disregarding it; and in the acts of Congress during that period, nothing can be found which, during the continuance of hostilities, much less after their close, would have sanctioned any departure by the Executive from a policy which has so uniformly obtained."

Moreover, a concession of the elective franchise to the freedmen by act of the President of the United States must have been extended to all colored men; wherever found, and so must have established a change of suffrage in the northern, middle, and western States not less than in the southern and southwestern. Such an act would have created a new class of voters, and would have been an assumption of power by the President which nothing in the Constitution or laws of the United States would have warranted."

And that is not all. We complain here that the President has not exercised his power to extend to freedmen the right of suffrage when Congress never has done it. We have absolute authority over this District, and until this session the proposition was not seriously mooted to extend the suffrage to the colored population. Here, better than anywhere else in the Union, they are fitted and entitled to suffrage, and yet we never, in our legislative power for this District, where we have absolute power, complied with that condition which has been asked of the President of the United States. It is complained that he did not extend the franchise to four millions in the southern States who are admitted to be ignorant, having been slaves for life, who are not prepared for liberty in its broadest and fullest sense, who have yet to be educated for the enjoyment of all the rights of freemen, when we ourselves never have been willing to this moment to confer the elective franchise upon the intelligent colored population of this District.

So I think we have never conferred the right to vote upon negroes in the Territories. My colleague will know whether we have or not. We never have. Here we have Territories where we have the power to mold the incipient form and ideas, and where our power is absolute; and yet Congress has never prescribed as a condition to their organization as Territories and to their admission as States the right of negroes to vote.

SENATE.

Representation of Southern States—Mr. Sherman.

And this is not all. In the only plan Congress has ever proposed for the reconstruction of the southern States, the Wade and Davis bill to which I have referred so often, Congress did not and would not make negro suffrage a part of their plan. The effort was made to do so, and it was abandoned. By that bill the suffrage was conferred only upon white male loyal citizens. And in the plan adopted by the President he adopted in this respect the very same conditions for suffrage prescribed by Congress.

Now, have we, as candid and honorable men, the right to complain of the President because he declined to extend suffrage to this most ignorant freed population when we have refused or neglected to extend it to them or to the negroes of this District and to the colored men who may go into the Territories? No, sir; whatever may be our opinion of the theory or right of every man to vote—and I do not dispute or contest with honorable Senators upon that point—I say with the President, that to ask of him to extend to four millions of these people the right of suffrage when we have not the courage to extend it to those within our control, when our States, represented by us here on this floor have refused to do it, is to make of him an unreasonable demand, in which the people of the United States will not sustain Congress.

What then was done by the President? He fixed the qualifications of voters by several proclamations addressed to different States. Here is the qualification fixed in his proclamation in regard to North Carolina. He directs the provisional governor to convene "a convention composed of delegates to be chosen by that portion of the people of said State who are loyal to the United States, and no others." He confined it to the loyal population, and then went on:

"Provided, That in any election that may be hereafter held for choosing delegates to any State convention, as aforesaid, no person shall be qualified as an elector or shall be eligible as a member of such convention unless he shall have previously taken and subscribed to the oath of amnesty, as set forth in the President's proclamation of May 29, 1865, and is a voter qualified as prescribed by the constitution and laws of the State of North Carolina, in force immediately before the 20th day of May, A. D. 1861, the date of the so-called ordinance of secession."

Therefore he confined the right to vote to loyal people who had taken the oath prescribed by him, an oath which required them to renounce all allegiance to the rebel authorities and to obey and abide by and support all laws and proclamations abolishing slavery, and no others are allowed to vote under this proclamation; and then he adds:

"And none shall be allowed to vote who could not vote under the law as it stood before the rebellion commenced."

My honorable friend from Massachusetts, I know, would have desired that that last clause was omitted; perhaps many others around me would have preferred it; but I have already said sufficient upon that point. He confined the right of voting to the loyal men who were entitled to vote under the laws of that State before the rebellion, and he denied his right in the absence of law to confer upon the negro population of North Carolina the suffrage, especially when Congress and the people of the southern States and the people of the northern States have never yet shown their disposition to extend the right of franchise within their own limits. I say, whatever I may think about it as a question of ethics, or as to the right, natural or artificial, political or civil, of the negro to vote, yet to demand of the President of the United States, under these circumstances, more than he actually did, it seems to me is making an unreasonable demand.

THE PRESIDENT AND THE FREED PEOPLE.

That he had no unkind feelings to the negroes of the southern States is shown by many things. I have here a Life which is made up mainly of extracts from his speeches, and I could read you expressions over and over again of kindness and friendship during the last summer to this negro population. It is true, you cannot expect Andrew Johnson, whose whole life has been a struggle, who was born in a slave State, who was reared in a slave State, who owned slaves, you cannot expect him whom you have elected President of the United States to forget and renounce all the prejudices of a lifetime. You cannot expect him to stand on the high and lofty pedestal of men who have contemplated this subject at a distance and now proclaim laws that are right within the light of their reason. You must take the man with all the circumstances that surround him; and I say, taking him in that light, he has shown, in his various speeches before he sent his message here, a kindly feeling to the negro population of the southern States. I would refer to one or two of those simply to show the general tendency of his feelings. On the 10th of October last he made a speech to some colored regiments who called to pay their respects to him at the Executive Mansion, in which he said to them:

"You have been engaged in the effort to sustain your country in the past, but the future is more important to you than the period in which you have just been engaged. One great question has been settled in this Government, and that is the question of slavery. The institution of slavery made war against the United States, and the United States has lifted its strong arm in vindication of the Government and of free government, and on lifting that arm and appealing to the God of battles, it has been decided that the institution of slavery must go down."

Then he follows with kind expressions, hoping for their welfare and future prosperity. Again, in his conversation with Mr. Stearns, of Massachusetts, an authentic report of which was given under the sanction of the President:

"You could not have broached the subject of equal suffrage at the North seven years ago; and we must remember that the changes at the South have been more rapid, and that they have been obliged to accept more unpalatable truth than the North has. We must give them time to digest a part; for we cannot expect such large affairs will be comprehended and digested at once. We must give them time to understand their new position."

"I have nothing to conceal in these matters, and have no desire or willingness to take indirect courses to obtain what we want."

"Our Government is a grand and lofty structure, in searching for its foundation we find it rests on the broad basis of popular rights. The elective franchise is not a natural right, but a political right. I am opposed to giving the States too much power, and also to a great consolidation of power in the central Government."

"If I interfered with the vote in the rebel States, to dictate that the negroes shall vote, I might do the same thing for my own purposes in Pennsylvania. Our only safety lies in allowing each State to control the right of voting by its own laws, and we have the power to control the rebel States if they go wrong. If they rebel, we have the Army and can control them by it, and if necessary by legislation also. If the General Government controls the right to vote in the States, it may establish such rules as will restrict the vote to a small number of persons and thus create a central despotism."

"My position here is different from what it would be if I was in Tennessee. There I should try to introduce negro suffrage gradually; first, those who had served in the Army, those who could read and write, and perhaps a property qualification for others, say two hundred or two hundred and fifty dollars."

"It will not do to let the negroes have universal suffrage now, it would breed a war of races."

Such were the opinions of Andrew Johnson expressed then, in which he showed that he was willing to meet the question of suffrage to the negro population, but he desired to do it gradually, and not, as he conceived, by a usurpation of power on his part. It is also shown by the evidence introduced the other day by the honorable Senator from Illinois, that the Freedmen's Bureau, right under the eye of Andrew Johnson, in Nashville, Tennessee, where he knew all that was going on, had organized vast systems for the education of southern negroes. All the plans of General Howard for the education of the freedmen of the South, under which seventy thousand negroes are now being educated by the national Government; all these plans, so far as we know, have met the sanction and approval of Andrew Johnson. It seems to me, therefore, he has evinced no undue hatred or jealousy of the colored population of the southern States, but that he is willing gradually to extend to them the right of suffrage. In the mean time, as he tells us in the late veto message, he strongly desires to protect them in the enjoyment of all their natural rights. Now, I say again, to require impossibilities of the President of the United States, to make any undue demands or exactions of him, will not, in my judgment, be wise.

PRESIDENT'S SPEECH ON TWENTY-SECOND FEBRUARY.

I conclude, therefore, this branch of what I have to say by this general observation: that up to and including the recent veto message of the President of the United States there had been no act of Andrew Johnson which in my judgment was inconsistent with the high obligations he owed to the great Union party of the United States. I would to God that I could end here; but some things that have transpired since, my duty to myself and my State—a duty from which I shall not shrink whether it meets the enmity of friends or opponents—compel me now to speak upon some matters in connection with the President of the United States which I deeply regret. And first of all and most prominent, as being that which now stands in the public eye, I do most deeply regret his speech of the 22d of February. I think there is no true friend of Andrew Johnson who would not be willing to wipe out that speech from the pages of history. It is impossible to conceive a more humiliating spectacle than the President of the United States invoking the wild passions of a mob around him with the utterance of such sentiments as he uttered on that day. Whether he be President or priest, I care not; I must express my deep and hearty regret and condemnation of some passages of that speech. The honorable Senator from Maine the other day read one paragraph in which he arraigns Congress for organizing a central despotism. No charge could be more unfounded. We, in pursuance of a time-honored custom in Congress of gathering through our committees the information that is necessary to enable us to act upon the great questions brought before us, chose to appoint a joint committee. I suppose the President has taken offense at the fact that this committee was organized on the day before his message was sent in, under circumstances, as he thought, of heat, and I have no doubt that much of what was said by the President of the United States is but the exhibition of temper and passion against what he regarded as unjust insults and accusations, but nevertheless no true friend of his will justify him in this arraignment of Congress.

I must confess that I have not seen anything in the conduct of the committee of fifteen in their reports to the two Houses of Congress to justify it. Individual members of that committee or individual members of Congress and citizens of the United States may have criticised with undue severity some of the acts of the President; but every man who holds such a position must expect manly criticism. The people will not stop to choose terms in speaking of those in power. He must expect that. It is a part of the penalty of his greatness. He must not therefore return accusation with accusation. I therefore say that the accusation made by the President of the United States against the action of Congress thus far has been unjust and unfounded. I speak with no feeling on this subject. The other day I objected to the discussion being commenced for fear that irritable remarks might be thrown back from Congress to the President. I do not desire to see it done, but I say to you now as the result of my deliberate reflection—and I know every true friend of the President will say I am right in this—I must express deep and heartfelt regret that he felt himself called upon to address that crowded and seething mass on the 22d of February. Better far, if, when the citizens of the United States called upon him, he had paid the respectful compliment of thanks, instead of speaking to them in the manner he did, assailing independent branches of the Government. Every man, I think, must regret this paragraph:

"I fought traitors and treason in the South. I opposed the Davises, the Toombses, the Slidells, and a long list of others, which you can readily fill without my repeating the names. Now, when I turn round and at the other end of the line find men, I care not by what name you call them, who still stand opposed to the restoration of the Union of these States, I am free to say to you that I am still in the field."

I will say that I read from a report made by the gentleman who reports for us, and which report modifies very much the language of one report that I have seen in one of the city papers; but as this report is an official one, prepared by the gentleman who reports our proceedings, I prefer to take this.

Mr. HOWARD. What paper is it in?

Mr. SHERMAN. The Philadelphia Inquirer. The President went on to say:

"I am called upon to name three at the other end of the line; I am talking to my friends and fellow-citizens, who are interested with me in this Government, and I presume I am free to mention to you the names of those whom I look upon as being opposed to the fundamental principles of this Government, and who are laboring to pervert and destroy it."

"VOICES. 'Name them!' 'Who are they?' "THE PRESIDENT. You ask me who they are. I say Thaddeus Stevens of Pennsylvania is one; I say Mr. Sumner of the Senate is another; and Wendell Phillips is another."

This is extraordinary. The President of the United States is thoroughly combative in his disposition; he has been fighting all the days of his life; but it seems to me he ought to waive this disposition now, and remember the manner in which his lamented predecessor, Abraham Lincoln, received the jeers and blows of friends and foes. His easy good nature was a soft cushion against which everything which was offensive fell dead. His words were always kindly and genial to friend or foe. That is not the character of Mr. Johnson. It is one of the peculiarities of his character that he has not the gentleness of the late President, and yet let me say that in this respect the very courage with which he resists opponents wherever they present themselves, we commended five years ago as the highest virtue of Andrew Johnson's life.

What is the reason given for these personal allusions? Wendell Phillips has arraigned and abused the President in a shameless manner; but he is in the habit of doing that in regard to almost every one. He recently classed him with Arnold and Burr. He said he had taken Jeff Davis's place as leader of the confederacy, and threatened impeachment. This would never be good enough for him. My friend from Massachusetts, before the magnificent oration he gave us covering the whole ground of our difficulties, let drop an expression about "white-washing" in debate in December last that I have no doubt has greatly wounded and irritated the mind of the President. He regards it rather in the light of a personal affront, though I do not believe it was so intended.

In regard to Mr. STEVENS, the other gentleman named by him, we cannot judge fairly without recalling to mind the fact that Mr. STEVENS proclaimed Andrew Johnson to be an alien enemy, a citizen of a foreign State, in the convention that nominated him as Vice President of the United States, and therefore not now legally President. We must not forget that he has shown violent and bitter feeling at various times, and that he wields great influence, and in such a way as to exasperate even a patient man. I know him well—a man of great intellect, with a controlling will, and possessing the dangerous power of keen sarcasm, which he wields against friend and foe, cutting like a Damascus blade. In a recent debate he made use of an expression that would irritate any man, especially when coming from a leader in the House of Representatives. He said of the President that his conversation with a certain "distinguished Senator" was:

"In violation of the privileges of this House, made in such a way that centuries ago, had it been made in Parliament by a British king, it would have cost him his head."

I ask you, Senators, whether the President of the United States, regarding him as he is; a man who never turned his back upon a foe, personal or political; a man whose great virtue has been his combative propensity; as a man who repelled insults here on the very spot where I now stand, when they came from traitors arming themselves for the fight; can you ask him, because he is President, to submit to insult? Every sentiment of manhood, every dictate of our nature, would induce a man, when he heard these words uttered, in the heat of passion, to thrust them back. When a man becomes President he has none the less the feelings of manhood. Whether a peasant or a President, he is a man for a' that. He can never overcome that feeling, and therefore I say, Senators, when we are examining the present condition of affairs, although I condemn the time and manner of repelling these insults as strongly as one can, yet that condemnation must be palliated by the circumstances by which he was surrounded, by our knowledge of his character, by the fact that he believed he was repelling personal insult thrust upon him by high officers of the Government, or by a gentleman like Wendell Phillips, who controls great masses of public opinion, and we are bound to give him the charity of this explanation.

There is another portion of this speech which I think is even still more indefensible than anything I have referred to; and that is that clause which I will not read to the Senate, in which he charges that these men are endeavoring to incite his assassination. No charge can be more idle, no accusation can be more unfounded; and I am astonished to the last degree that such an idea should ever enter the mind of the President of the United States that these gentlemen were conspiring his assassination! I have seen many papers printed on both sides of the question, by Democrats and Union men, and I never have seen one that approves this accusation. I have received many letters pro and con on this subject since this thing occurred, and I have never yet seen an intimation but what this charge was most unfounded. Sir, it is not in the ranks of the Union party the President will find assassins. They are bred only by a different school of politics. The men who have done so much to save this country from anarchy will not play the part of assassins. He need not guard against them; and this accusation seems to me rather the product of resentment, hatched by anger and passion, and hurled without reflection at those he believed wished to badger and insult him.

But, sir, throwing aside these personal allusions and these irritating remarks, what is the left of the speech? Cast over the remarks that I have referred to the mantle of charity, and what is there in the speech with which we can find fault? There may be ideas and sentiments which seem to be out of place; we are not here to criticize the speech of the President by the rules of grammar or syntax; but there are ideas in his speech that are deserving the grave consideration of the Senate. In one clause of the speech he says in speaking of the spirit of his address and conduct to the southern people:

"Coming in that spirit, I say to them, 'When you have complied with the requirements of the Constitution, when you have yielded to the law, when you have acknowledged your allegiance to the Constitution, I will, so far as I can, open the door of the Union to those who had erred and strayed from the fold of their fathers for a time.'"

Now read in connection with that another paragraph of the same speech:

"When those who rebelled comply with the Constitution; when they give sufficient evidence of loyalty; when they show that they can be trusted; when they yield obedience to the law that you and I acknowledge obedience to, I say extend them the right hand of fellowship, and let peace and Union be restored."

TENNESSEE.

Other passages of this speech, and especially one or two in the veto message, show his earnest desire for the admission of Tennessee; and I have no doubt that much of the excitement in the President's mind arose out of the long-delayed admission of Tennessee into this Union. That feeling crops out very strongly in the veto message, and I confess to you that I do sympathize very much with his feelings. What is the condition of Tennessee? It was reconstructed in the sense in which the term is now used before the death of President Lincoln, under his guiding hand, with Andrew Johnson as his mere agent. It was reconstructed by Union men in the midst of war, and Tennessee aided us very much in the closing operations of this war. More than thirty thousand of her brave sons marched under the banner of Thomas and Sherman. Its government was reorganized before President Johnson came here. It was organized by his own personal friends who shared his fortunes. The men that are sent here to represent Tennessee are as true and loyal as either of you Senators, without exception. I have just had brought to me the recent letter of Mr. Maynard to the convention held on the 22d of February, and it breathes the very spirit of patriotism. There are Stokes and many others of these gentlemen who have served the cause of their country. Now I say to you that there is a feeling in the public mind that Tennessee ought to be admitted into the Union, and as soon as possible; that she has complied with every condition imposed upon her; that she has organized civil society so far as it can be; and I think it is the common feeling and desire of the people of the United States, whom we represent, the mass of the Union people, that she should be admitted as soon as possible. One year ago she was declared by the President not to be in insurrection; and I do think our first duty is at once to prepare a mode and manner by which she may be admitted into the Union upon such terms and conditions as will make her way back the way of pleasantness and peace. And, sir, I would follow the marked exception in the case of Tennessee by an encouraging plan for the admission of Arkansas and such other States as may be reconstructed on a loyal basis.

NO PLAN OF RECONSTRUCTION BY CONGRESS.

The weakness of the position of Congress now is not that any one denies your power, but that you hold no lanterns to them, no light, no plan, no mode by which they can get back into the folds of the Union. I say therefore, if the committee on reconstruction can report a joint resolution (instead of this asserting their power) fixing the mode and manner by which Tennessee and other States may come back into the Union, by which their loyal sons may be represented upon this floor, I believe it will meet the hearty plaudit of the American people. I do not wish to go into the general question still before the committee on reconstruction; but if I had any power in arranging a plan, I would mark the line as broad and deep between the loyal people who stood at our side and the rebels who fought against us as between heaven and hell.

Mr. HOWARD. How can you do it?

Mr. SHERMAN. Whenever loyal men present a State organization, complying with such terms and conditions and tests of loyalty as you may prescribe, and will send here loyal representatives, I would admit them; and whenever rebels send or come here I would reject them. The President in his veto message, to which I intend to refer presently, states this point as strongly and as well as I can make it, and I will read it in reply to the honorable Senator:

"I hold it my duty to recommend to you, in the interests of peace and in the interests of Union, the admission of every State to its share in public legislation, when, however insubordinate, insurgent, or rebellious its people may have been, it presents itself not only in an attitude of loyalty and harmony, but in the persons of representatives whose loyalty cannot be questioned under any existing constitutional or legal test."

SENATE.

Representation of Southern States—Mr. Sherman.

39TH CONG. ... 1ST SESS.

Define loyalty in your own terms; show that you have at least a generous appreciation of the position of these men; prescribe what you call a loyal man, if you choose; and then when these loyal men send here loyal men who can be tested by your oath or by any other mode or manner you choose to prescribe, let them come, in the name of God and humanity, and share our councils as they have shared our hearts; and I believe it is the irritation occasioned by this delay that has caused much of the excitement in the mind of the President. You may say that the President's idea of loyalty is not yours, and you may differ upon that. Why do you not define your idea of loyalty, and send it to him, and if it meets his approval, well? If not, then he makes an issue with Congress, and then you can fight it out; but until then you cannot.

VETO MESSAGE.

Now, Mr. President, I come to the veto message. It is well known that I not only voted for the freedmen's bill, but I voted for it against the President's veto. I would vote for it over and over again. I considered it carefully; I find nothing in it but what I can approve; and I am surprised that any one who is willing to support the present Freedmen's Bureau is not willing to vote for this modification of it; but I do not wish to discuss at any length its merits. The honorable Senator from Illinois, in an elaborate and very able speech, has exhausted the whole subject. I am willing to let the veto of the President, with the answer of the Senator from Illinois, go to the people of the country, and upon that I am willing to defend my vote at any time and at all times. But what then? The President of the United States has constitutional powers and rights; he has the same duty imposed upon him to vote for or against that bill that rests upon any of us.

The Constitution declares that every bill shall be submitted for his approval or disapproval. If he does not approve it he sends it back, and it is nothing more nor less than a vote by him of "no" against the passage of that bill. He sends it back with his reasons. Suppose those reasons are not sufficient. That is a question that he must judge as well as you. He alleges that this bill is unnecessary, and I must confess that a recent construction put upon the bill through General Howard very much takes away from the immediate necessity for its passage. I supposed myself that the original Freedmen's Bureau bill expired by its own limitation in May, 1866, because I supposed that the President considered the rebellion as over in May last. He certainly did as to Tennessee. I supposed that the year of the duration of that bill after the war would commence, say some time in May, 1865, and therefore there was immediate necessity to supply some temporary act by which the freedmen in the southern States should be protected. It seems that in that we mistook the construction of the President, and I have here before me the order recently issued by General Howard, in which he says that—

"The President has assured the Commissioner that he regards the present law as continuing the existence of the bureau at least a year from this time."

That is, as no proclamation has been issued fixing the termination of the rebellion, until one year after that proclamation the present Freedmen's Bureau continues. If so, we have all the benefit of that system under the care of the most excellent manager of it now for one year for the protection of the freedmen. There are but very few powers conferred in the second bill that are not included in the first. There are three sections of the second bill that I think ought to be passed in the form of a law.

One provides for the poor negroes on the plantations set apart by General Sherman for them. It did seem to me that it was but reasonable and right for us to secure to them a military possession for a short period of time. They came into possession of that property lawfully under military rule; they were placed upon it when it was abandoned by its owners, and when its owners were fighting this Government. Their title was legal, their possession was legal; and I say there was nothing but a reasonable condition that you should not turn them out without at least two years' preparation. I could see no objection to that. It is true the expense of a Freedmen's Bureau may be large; but how can we help that? We have ourselves, in pursuance of our policy, emancipated the slaves; and whether it costs much or little, we are bound to ease their way from a condition of servitude to a condition of assured freedom. I tell you the people of Ohio do not care as to that. Whatever is necessary to be expended for this great purpose they are willing to pay their share. While they are reasonably economical in all questions, yet when it comes to the question of taking care of a race of people whom we ourselves have emancipated, they are willing to bear their share of the burden.

The sixth section of the bill, I must confess, seemed to me rather arbitrary; I refer to the power given to the President to buy lands at pleasure and without limit. I was disposed to vote to strike that out; but as the whole system was a temporary one, I did not believe the power would be abused by General Howard, and I trusted the President. I was willing to vote for it with that clause in; but that is neither here nor there. He had the right to veto it. What he says about taxation without representation I look upon very much like a stump speech that had no pertinency to the veto. That we have the power to legislate for the southern States is admitted by the President himself. In all the proclamations to which I have referred he by terms extends the Treasury laws over the southern States. He has admitted over and over again our power to legislate for these States by approving and indorsing and ratifying laws we have sent to him; and therefore all he said about taxation I look upon merely as one of those make-weights in an argument that with the people would not have any material influence. If he meant by that part of his veto message simply to say that as a general principle of American constitutional law every people who are affected by laws passed by Congress should be represented, I say that is right; but there are exceptions to that as there are to every other rule. We legislate for the people of this District and they do not vote and cannot have the right to vote. We will not even let them be heard here. We legislate for the Territories and do not give them the right to vote. We legislate for foreigners, who are not represented here, except indirectly, and who have no political power. We legislate for the women and children of our country, who have no vote. We legislate for a great many people who do not vote. They are all inferentially represented, but not directly represented by members of their own choice. Therefore I regard this part of the veto message simply surplusage not to be considered; but whether it is considered or not I am willing to stand by that bill; and let me say, sir, that if any President of the United States, I do not care whether it is Andrew Johnson or his successor, shall fail or neglect to protect from lawless violence the men who have been freed by this Government in the operations of war, that man will be cursed forever and forever. Our obligation to protect them is even more sacred than to protect the white people. My Democratic friends may think that is a very strong expression, but the reason is this: the white people can take care of themselves; they have been trained for generations as freemen; they will defend and maintain their rights; you cannot hold them in slavery. All the powers of hell could not keep in slavery the American people who have once tasted the sweets of freedom.

But it is different with the freed people of the southern States. They are very poor, helpless, dependent upon our bounty and our protection, and are there in the presence of their masters who hate them because they have lost their services. We dare not trust their protection to the white people of the southern States, because we know the instinctive prejudices that govern and control in the southern States. I believe, and I will take the President at his word when he tells me, that his earnest desire is to protect them in all their rights. In the very veto message in which he sends back the measure we sent him, he tells us in most unequivocal terms—

"I share with Congress the strongest desire to secure to the freedmen the full enjoyment of their freedom and property, and their entire independence and equality in making contracts for their labor."

Then he goes on and states his objections to the bill. While he stands by that declaration, while he protects the freed people of the southern States, I will not quarrel with him about the means. Let him fail to do that, and I will denounce him as freely and as bitterly as any Senator on this floor.

WHAT THE UNION PARTY DEMANDS OF THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. President, I feel that I have already detained the Senate too long, but there are some other observations which I shall take this occasion to make so that I may not hereafter feel called upon to trouble the Senate on these various questions of reconstruction. In my judgment, the Union party of the United States, whose representatives we are, demand both of the President and of Congress grave and important duties. I do not think either of us can avoid the fair performance of these duties by any excuse or equivocation. What they demand of the President, who accepted the nomination of the Union party, and who is the agent and representative of the Union party, and who is bound in honor to carry out its principles, is a faithful observance of the principles upon which he was elected. I look upon the common declaration either of a President or a member of Congress that he is the representative of the whole people, and is not under any obligation to the men who elected him, as as false in honor and false in principle. The President, it is true, is President of the United States, but he is the chosen representative of the Union party of the United States, and he is under obligations to that party which he cannot in honor depart from. Now, sir, a debt of honor is even of higher obligation than a debt which can be enforced in a court of law, simply because it rests upon honor alone. No debt can be of higher honor than that which the representative owes to the constituents who elected him. I think therefore that we have a right to expect that the President of the United States shall fulfill his promise upon which he was elected, that he would do all he could to make treason odious and to punish traitors. There is a growing feeling in the public mind that he is forgetting this cardinal principle of his early proclaimed policy. We have a right to expect that in the various departments and agencies of this Government he shall exercise the power intrusted to him through those men who aided and contributed to his election. He is bound as a principle of honor to select as the agents of the Government those who shared with him the political feeling that gave rise to his election. They are numerous enough to form the foundation of any Administration. And if he seeks fellowship, counsel, aid, or association from or with those who either took up arms in the recent contest, or who, regarding the war a failure, would have passively yielded to rebels, he commits that offense from which no man occupying his high position can or will recover. Tolerance of opinion within a political party is indispensable and choice of agents within it is a necessity, but it must be a grave exigency that will justify a betrayal of those by and through whom we obtain trust and power.

Representation of Southern States—Mr. Sherman.

The Union party, in my judgment, is the most powerful political organization that has ever controlled the Government of this country. During the last fall it carried every one of the so-called northern States—northern no more, I hope. The Legislatures of all those States are in a harmony with the Union party. Nine out of ten of the soldiers who carried our flag are adherents of the Union party, and sustained us at the election as they did in the field of battle. The great body of the officers who led the soldiers through all the perils of war are of the same feeling. The great Union party is a sound, conservative, healthy political organization, demanding only of its agents what is reasonable and right. I think its members demand, and have a right to demand, of Mr. Johnson a strict, earnest, faithful adherence to the principles which led to his selection as a candidate for the Vice Presidency, and placed him side by side with the lamented Lincoln; and they demand of him trust and confidence in those who placed him in power.

WHAT IT DEMANDS OF CONGRESS.

And, sir, this party demands of Congress some things, also. It demands of Congress a prompt restoration of some of the rebel States, or at least a prompt plan of restoration of the rebel States. If on account of their present condition any of these States cannot yet come into the Union; if because they are still rebellious, or will not in spite of our laws select men who have not stained their hands with the blood of our countrymen, let them stay out. While the State of Georgia or any other State of the South can find no citizen within her bosom to represent her except those who, more almost than all others, are responsible for the blood that has been shed in the recent war, I will never vote for the admission of its Representatives or Senators. They must first show by their conduct an obedience to the law. Among the laws that stood on the statute-book when they were the force to which they appealed was that law which prescribed a test oath; and I, for one, will never yield that test oath to enable any man whose hand is stained with the blood of my fellow-countrymen to take a seat on the floor of the Senate.

But, sir, I am desirous to see some mode by which loyal men from the southern States, in States that are organized on a secure and safe basis, may be promptly admitted on this floor. The people of the United States demand of Congress some such plan and that right speedily, and they demand a change of the basis of representation. By the provisions of the Constitution of the United States there are four million people of the southern States who, denied all political rights, will still be represented in Congress, and the strange anomaly will present itself of these rebel States, who have done all they could to overthrow the Government, coming back here with increased political power. I think that our constituents will demand of us that before they are admitted we shall have at least adopted a plan by which the basis of representation may be put upon a secure and safe footing.

Let us take some cases disclosed by the census tables and let us make a momentary comparison. The State of Alabama has a total population of 964,201; she is entitled upon the basis of representation to seven Representatives; but the State of Alabama has only 435,080 white people who exercise any political power. The State of Wisconsin has a population of 774,710, or nearly twice as many white people as the State of Alabama, and yet unless you change the basis of representation, Alabama will come back here with seven Representatives while Wisconsin has but six. So with Virginia and Illinois. Virginia has a total population of 1,596,318, and a white population of only 1,047,411, while Illinois has a white population of 1,704,323, or nearly twice as many as the State of Virginia; and yet unless there is some change in the Constitution, Virginia will come back with twelve Representatives while Illinois has but thirteen. I might go through the list. This is a condition of inequality to which our people will not submit now when they have the power to remedy it.

The honorable Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCKALEW] the other day in a very ably prepared argument demonstrated, as I think, very clearly that the inequality of representation in the Senate is even still more marked than this; but he must remember that that inequality is beyond the power of recall; that no change can be made in that respect except either by revolution or by a national convention. Besides, this inequality of representation in the Senate does not really amount to very much, for the reason that the small States are mainly distributed side by side with the large States, and they have a community of interest with the large States. I have myself watched the vote upon the various propositions to see whether this inequality of representation of States in the Senate has operated hard, and I find almost always the large and small States mix and mingle in their votes. It very rarely makes any difference, as whenever the popular majority carries the House of Representatives that same popular majority carries the Senate. This inequality, while it cannot be changed, really does but little harm. The only section of which any complaint can fairly be made is New England, where a group of six small States stand together, and sometimes have peculiar interests of which they are very tenacious; but the West rapidly growing into giant power, strengthened by new States every year, and where there is a community of interests of great States and small States—the great West can soon hold New England in check whenever she unduly avails herself of her unequal political power here.

THE BASIS OF REPRESENTATION—VOTERS.

Mr. President, the real question of difficulty is how this change in the basis of representation shall occur. The committee of fifteen have reported a plan that I shall probably vote for, but I must express my preference for another. I do it now, so that I shall not take up the time of the Senate hereafter. In my judgment the true basis of representation in this country is voters. I know this was discussed in the other House, and I have read the debate there, but the result was not satisfactory to me. All the objections that have been made to that system were objections that might be easily obviated and easily answered. Suppose the basis of representation was the very one suggested by Andrew Johnson, that all men above the age of twenty-one years, citizens of the United States, who by the laws of the respective States are entitled to vote shall be the basis of representation. What then? What is the objection to that plan? It is simple, uniform, applying to all sections without any appearance of legislating against a particular interest or a particular section. It is fair, manly, and honorable. The true basis of representation are men who cast the votes. All the others who stand outside of this circle are voted for by the voters and are represented by the voters.

But one of the objections made to this plan is that in the border States by their laws they exclude a large portion of their population from voting on the ground of disloyalty, having taken share in the rebellion. Suppose they do; suppose Maryland has excluded one third of her population because they were rebels, ought the loyal men of Maryland to vote for those rebels? Whether they are excluded on account of color or crime they are equally to be excluded from the basis of representation, and this argument, which applied only to a narrow interest and of a temporary character which will soon disappear by the march of events, is now made to stand in the way of a just and fair basis of representation. So it is said that in the State of New York where there is a large preponderance of foreigners, the State of New York will lose, because foreigners not being voters will not be counted. Suppose it is, would not that be right? Foreigners are not citizens, but may become such. They pass through a pupillage and then are citizens and may be counted. Because they happen to have the most of them in New York, is that a reason why they should be included in the basis of representation? The States ought not to look upon this question as it affects their own particular interests for the time, but as a question of equality, of right, and of justice in the Electoral College and the House of Representatives.

So of New England. It is said that New England will lose something because she has a great number of beautiful women and children more than she has men. That is true; but I ask you, Mr. President, yourself a distinguished representative from New England, where the men are who represent these women? They are the best blood of your country who go westward and there soon give tone to society, and come back here to represent themselves and the mothers and sisters and kindred they left behind. New England is at this moment not only represented by her twelve Senators, but by six or eight more who are sons of New England who moved to the West and carried with them their religion, their principles, and in some cases their wives, or where they did not we provided wives for them. They came back here as Senators, and now stand here to vote New England ideas and New England principles. Suppose New England should lose a member or two because the young men have gone West, are her women and children unrepresented? No, sir, they are represented by men from every State in the Union.

I say, therefore, that this rule, proposed first I believe by Professor Leiber, is in my judgment the fairest basis of representation. That a change of the basis is demanded there can be no doubt. This in my opinion is the best proposition, but I do not profess to be among the impracticables, and if I cannot get what I want I am willing to take that proposition which was reported from the committee of fifteen, which does at least take away that singular feature by which the South would gain representation by the rebellion.

UNIVERSAL SUFFRAGE.

Sir, perhaps I ought not to say anything further in regard to a proposition made by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. HENDERSON,] so eloquently and ably defended and maintained in a long and elaborate oration by the Senator from Massachusetts, that we ought now to start de novo, to go back to first principles and base representation on population, and take away from the States the power to fix the qualification of voters, and proclaim that nobody should be excluded from voting on account of color. It has always seemed to me best to attempt that which is attainable; and when I say to you that no man can really believe that we can keep these States out from representation here until we can educate the people of the United States up to a change of their Constitution so as to compel any State to adopt negro suffrage, it is a proposition so clear that I need scarcely discuss it.

If we propose to exclude those eleven States from the Union until we can compel three fourths of all the States to vote for negro suffrage, then these eleven States will be a Hungary, a Poland, an Ireland, to be ruled over by the military rod for years to come. You may depend upon it the people of the United States will not acquiesce in that demand. They will not waste their energies and their money in enforcing so impossible a proposition. Therefore, without going into its merits, I say it is simply proposing that which we cannot adopt.

SENATE.

Representation of Southern States—Mr. Sherman.

39TH CONG....1ST SESS.

I beg Senators not to let the protection that is due to the negroes of the southern States depend upon the narrow foundation of a congressional enactment. Suppose you were to pass the law proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, how long would it remain on the statute-book, in the mutations of parties in this country, where nothing is more unstable than party power, especially where no great principles are immediately at stake? How long would it be before a dominant majority in Congress would repeal your law, and then you would have wasted all your power to change the basis of representation and to protect the freedmen of the southern States? What I desire now is to secure a just and fair basis of representation so that the South may have a reasonable share of political power, no more, no less. Then after their representatives have been tried by the tests of loyalty that you may prescribe—let them be reasonable, moderate, kind, forbearing—then I hope to see these States come back into their old places in the Union, shorn of their treason, shorn of their power; equal with us, no better, no worse; white men and white women and white children, on the same footing, side by side, acting in harmony with each other in adopting legislation for the good of our great country.

LET US BE MODERATE.

Such is my view of the subject, and although I shall probably take no part in the debate upon it, but will vote for almost any basis of representation that changes the present one, I do say it is the duty of Congress to adopt some mode by which the basis of representation may be put upon a safe foundation. Sir, the people of the United States now demand of us wisdom and moderation. This is not the time for extreme counsels. It is not the time to attempt great reforms and works. We have just gone through a terrible war, with an overwhelming debt staring us in the face. We have to tax our people to a greater extent than they have ever been taxed before. We have complicated political relations growing out of the condition of the southern States. Do the best we can, we shall have trouble and contention and strife. We know that lawlessness and crime are spreading with giant footsteps all over the southern States. We know that the race that we have redeemed from bondage is now held in fierce terror all over the South. We know that we owe them protection, and we are bound to protect ourselves against undue power of traitors in the southern States. We have to guard our councils against the machinations of traitors here and elsewhere.

I say now is no time to quarrel with the Chief Magistrate of the United States, unless we are compelled to do so by his base betrayal of the obligations he imposed upon himself when he became our candidate. It is a time for moderation and for wisdom. Sir, I would not plead for it, but I believe it is absolutely necessary, not only for our existence as a party, but for our existence as a nation. I fear the storm. I fear struggles and contentions in these eleven States, unless there is some mode by which the local power of those States may be put in loyal hands, and by which their voices may be heard here in council and in command, in deliberation and debate as of old. They will come back here shorn of their undue political power, humbled in their pride, with a consciousness that one man bred under free institutions is as good at least as a man bred under slave institutions. I want to see the loyal people in the South, if they are few, trusted; if they are many, give them power. Prescribe your conditions; but let them come back into the Union upon such terms as you may prescribe. Open the door for them. I hope to see some great spectacle of punishment, some grand tribunal erected to try, not merely Jefferson Davis, but in his person to try the rebellion, to condemn it before the civilized world; the sentence to be recorded in the pages of history, not as the sentence of death merely against "an old man broken with the storms of state," but as the ignominious sentence of a free people against the worst rebellion ever inflicted on mankind. But that over, I do hope that without more bloodshed, of which we have had enough, we may see harmony restored in this great Union of ours; that all these States and all these territories may be here in council for the common good, and that at as speedy a moment as is consistent with the public safety.

OHIO AND INDIANA.

Before I conclude, allow me to read two sets of resolutions framed since we have been engaged in this debate, and which receive my hearty approval: one passed by the Union party of the State of Indiana, and the other reported to the Union members of the Legislature of Ohio, and which, I believe, will receive their sanction. The Indiana Union convention passed the following resolutions:

Resolved, That it is the province of the legislative branch of the Government to determine the question of reconstruction, and in the exercise of that power Congress should have in view the loyalty of the people of those States, and their devotion to the Constitution and obedience to the laws. Until the people of these States prove themselves loyal to the Government they should not be restored to the rights enjoyed before the rebellion.

Resolved, That no man who voluntarily participated in the rebellion ought to be admitted to a seat in Congress, and under the Constitution of the United States the power to determine the qualifications requisite of electors rests with the States respectively.

Resolved, That the Union of these States has not and cannot be dissolved except by successful revolution.

I now present and read kindred resolutions reported to the Union members of the Ohio Legislature recently by a committee of their own number:

Resolved, That the President, Andrew Johnson, in demanding of the revolted States the repeal of their ordinances of secession, the repudiation of their rebel war debts, and the adoption of the amendment of the Constitution abolishing slavery before he would withdraw the military control of the provisional governments, wisely inaugurated the necessary measures of reconstruction, that can only be completed by Congress and the States by the adoption of a further constitutional amendment apportioning representation in Congress among the States according to the numbers of those classes thereof who, by the laws of such States, have a voice in such representation; and that while the safety of the nation and justice to all its parts require that these States should be admitted only with such representation, we deem it inexpedient and unnecessary to press upon them other conditions to a full restoration to their place and rights in the Union.

Resolved, That we deem it the duty of Congress to provide by just and prudent but effective legislation for the protection of the freedmen.

Resolved, That we respectfully and earnestly urge upon Congress and the President to waive extreme opinions, and that in the discharge of the great trust confided to them by the nation they harmoniously provide for us the ways of future concord and the moderate but effectual measures of a lasting reconstruction.

I will also read from a private letter which I have received from a distinguished citizen of my State, expressing an opinion in which I heartily concur:

"Our party is now in the hour of its trial, and it needs to gain strength by prudence rather than prodigally wasted by the very extravagance of rashness. We can never maintain ourselves against the President or anybody else upon a policy of indefinite and unconditional exclusion of the southern States, establishing a Hungary or Poland in the midst of the Republic. We must rather, in my judgment, offer immediate admission to the rebel States upon terms clear, distinct, and announced, and show to our people that it is not revenge but safety that we want."

RÉSUMÉ.

I have thus, Mr. President, endeavored to show that to this hour no act has been done by the President inconsistent with his obligations to the great Union party that elected him.

Differences have arisen, but they have arisen upon new questions, not within the contemplation of either the Union party or the Union people when the President was nominated. I have also shown that he has acted in pursuance of a policy adopted by Mr. Lincoln, and approved by the people, and that no event has yet transpired that will preclude him from a hearty cooperation with the great mass of the Union party in securing to the country the object for which we conducted successfully a great war. That events have transpired, that utterances have been made tending in that direction, no one will deny. The surest evidence is in the joy of the worst enemies of the country over our divisions.

I find in a recent paper this significant paragraph:

DAYTON, OHIO, February 20.

The Democracy of Dayton had a jollification over President Johnson's veto of the Freedmen's Bureau bill this afternoon, firing one hundred guns. Mr. Vallandigham made a brief speech, saying the Democracy did not elect President Johnson, but it is now their duty to stand by him. He announced a mass meeting in future for exultation. A flag floats from Mr. Vallandigham's window.

Mr. CRESWELL. May I ask what kind of a flag?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not know; a good flag in bad hands, I suppose.

Sir, I can imagine no calamity more disgraceful than for us by our divisions to surrender, to men who to their country were enemies in war, any or all of the powers of this Government. He who contributes in any way to this result deserves the execrations of his countrymen. This may be done by thrusting upon the President new issues on which the well-known principles of his life do not agree with the judgment of his political associates. It may be done by irritating controversies of a personal character. It may be done by the President turning his back upon those who trusted him with high power, and thus linking his name with one of the most disgraceful in American history, that of John Tyler. I feel an abiding confidence that Andrew Johnson will not and cannot do this; and, sir, who will deny that the overbearing and intolerant will of Henry Clay contributed very much to the defection of John Tyler? But the division of the Whig party was an event utterly insignificant in comparison with the evil results of a division in the Union party. Where will be the four million slaves whom by your policy you have emancipated? What would be their miserable fate if now surrendered to the custody of the rebels of the South? Will you, by your demand of universal suffrage, destroy the power of the Union party to protect them in their dearly purchased liberty? Will you, by new issues upon which you know you have not the voice of the people, jeopard these rights which you can by the aid of the Union party secure to these freedmen? We know that the President cannot, will not, and never agreed to, unite with us upon the issues of universal suffrage and dead States. No such dogmas were contemplated, when, for his heroic services in the cause of the Union, we placed him side by side with Mr. Lincoln as our standard-bearer. Why, then, present these issues? Why decide upon them? Why not complete the work so gloriously done by our soldiers by securing union and liberty to all men without distinction of color, leaving to the States, as before, the question of suffrage.

Sir, the curse of God, the maledictions of millions of our people, and the tears and blood of new-made freemen will, in my judgment, rest upon those who now for any cause destroy the unity of the great party that has led us through the wilderness of war. We want now peace and repose. We must now look to our public credit. We have duties to perform to the business interests of the country in which we need the assistance of the President. We have every motive for harmony with him and with each other, and for a generous and manly trust in his patriotism. If ever the time shall come when I can no longer confide in his devotion to the principles upon which he was elected, I will bid farewell to Andrew Johnson with unaffected sorrow. I will remember when he stood in this very spot, five years ago, repelling with unexampled courage the assaults of traitors. He left in their hands wife, children, property, and home, and staked them all on the result. I will remember that when a retreating general would have left Nashville to its fate, that again, with heroic courage, he maintained his post. I will remember the fierce conflicts and trials through which he and his fellow-compatriots in East Tennessee maintained our cause in the heart of the confederacy. I will remember the struggles he had with the aristocratic element of Tennessee, never ashamed of his origin and never far from the hearts of the people. Sir, you must not sever the great Union party from this loyal element of the southern States. No new theories of possible utopian good can compensate for the loss of such patriotism and devotion. Time, as he tells you in his message, is a great element of reform, and time is on your side. I remember the homely and encouraging words of a pioneer in the anti-slavery cause, an expelled Methodist preacher from the South, who told those who were behind him in his strong anti-slavery opinions, "Well, friends, I'll block up awhile; we must all travel together." So I say to all who doubt Andrew Johnson, or who wish to move more rapidly than he can, to block up awhile, to consolidate their great victory with the certainty that reason and the Almighty will continue their work. All wisdom will not die with us. The highest human wisdom is to do all the good you can, but not to sacrifice a possible good to attempt the impracticable. God knows that I do not urge harmony and conciliation from any personal motive. The people of my native State have intrusted me with a position here extending four years beyond the termination of the President's term of office. He can grant me no favor.

If I believed for a moment that he would seek an alliance with those who by either arms or counsel or even apathy were against their country in the recent war, and will turn over to them the high powers intrusted to him by the Union party, then, sir, he is dishonored, and will receive no assistance from me; but I will not force him into that attitude. If he shall prove false to the declaration made by him in his veto message, that his strongest desire was to secure to the freedmen the full enjoyment of their freedom and property, then I will not quarrel with him as to the means used. And while, as he tells us in this same message, he only asks for States to be represented who are presented in an attitude of loyalty and harmony and in the persons of representatives whose loyalty cannot be questioned under any constitutional or legal test, surely we ought not to separate from him until, at least, we prescribe a test of their loyalty upon which we are willing to stand. We have not done it yet. I will not try him by new creeds. I will not denounce him for hasty words uttered in repelling personal affronts. I see him yet surrounded by the Cabinet of Abraham Lincoln, pursuing his policy. No word from me shall drive him into political fellowship with those who, when he was one of the moral heroes of this war, denounced him, spit upon him, and despitefully used him. The association must be self-sought, and even then I will part with him in sorrow, but with the abiding hope that the same Almighty power that has guided us through the recent war will be with us still in our new difficulties until every State is restored to its full communion and fellowship, and until our nation, purified by war, will assume among the nations of the earth the grand position hoped for by Washington, Clay, Webster, Lincoln, and hundreds of thousands of unnamed heroes who gave up their lives for its glory.

Rights of Citizens.*SPEECH OF HON. A. J. ROGERS,

OF NEW JERSEY,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

February 26, 1866.

The House having under consideration the joint resolution (H. R. No. 63) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States—

Mr. ROGERS said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I had hoped, after what has transpired in the last few days, that the time had come when the Constitution of the United States would be secure from invasion by Congress. When I heard the words of the President of the United States in commendation of that sacred instrument, and as I rejoiced at the course pursued by conservative men on the other side of the House who are determined to sustain that instrument as it was given to us by our fathers, I had good reason to believe there would be no other amendments to it proposed by this body or the Senate. I felt that the agitation which had been kept up in this House against that instrument in order to amend it, as the President says, so that no more respect would be paid to it than to a mere resolution of a town meeting, had gone by, and that we would now dedicate the balance of our time in Congress to the great doctrine of constitutional liberty that we might give power to a free and patriotic President in his great work of reconstruction, and proclaim to the civilized world that every star representing every State was a component part of the old flag, and that every Representative from every State had taken the vacant seats in Congress which had been intended by the Constitution should be filled by them. I do think, notwithstanding the position which has been assumed by the eloquent and learned gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] who reported this resolution, that no resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States had been offered to this Congress more dangerous to the liberties of the people and the foundations of this Government than the pending resolution. When sifted from top to bottom it will be found to be the embodiment of centralization and the disfranchisement of the States of those sacred and immutable State rights which were reserved to them by the consent of our fathers in our organic law.

When the gentleman says the proposed amendment is intended to authorize no rights except those already embodied in the Constitution, I give him the plain and emphatic answer—if the Constitution provides the requirements contained in this amendment, why, in this time of excitement and public clamor, should we attempt to again ingraft upon it what is already in it?

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman totally misconstrues what I have said.

Mr. ROGERS. Wait until I have finished the point I have commenced. I say that the gentleman takes the position that there is nothing in this proposed amendment with regard to privileges and immunities of citizens of the several States attempted to be ingrafted in the instrument, except those which already exist in it. If those rights already exist in the organic law of the land, I ask him, what is the necessity of so amending the Constitution as to authorize Congress to carry into effect a plain provision which now, according to his views, inheres in the very organic law itself?

I know what the gentleman will attempt to say in answer to that position: that because the Constitution authorizes Congress to carry the powers conferred by it into effect, privileges and immunities are not considered within the meaning of powers, and therefore Congress has no right to carry into effect what the Constitution itself intended when it provided that citizens of each State should have all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States.

Now, sir, the answer to that argument is simply this: that when the Constitution was framed and ratified, its makers did not intend to lodge in the Congress of the United States any power to override a State and settle by congressional legislation the rights, privileges, and immunities of citizens in the several States. That matter was left entirely for the courts, to enforce the privileges and immunities of the citizens under that clause of the organic law. Although our forefathers, in their wisdom, after having exacted and wrested from Great Britain State rights, saw fit to incorporate in the Constitution such a principle in regard to citizens of the several States, yet they never intended to give to Congress the power, by virtue of that clause, to control the local domain of a State or the privileges and immunities of citizens in the State, even though they had come from another State.

Mr. KELLEY. I understand the gentleman to suggest that one reason why the Constitution should not be amended is, that the President fears that so many propositions of amendment will make the instrument as common as a town-meeting resolution. I desire to ask him whether the President is not the same Andrew Johnson who, when a Representative in Congress, submitted no less than nine amendments to that sacred instrument in one session?

Mr. ROGERS. That may all be so. I am not here as the advocate of Andrew Johnson, because he is Andrew Johnson, but simply as the advocate of the great doctrine of constitutional liberty which he lays down. I am not here to support the conduct of Andrew Johnson in all the past years of his life, but to support him as President in his endeavors to so control the legislation of this country as to confer constitutional liberty upon the people, and carry out the letter, spirit, and intent of the organic law. I stand by him because of his reiterating those immortal and undying principles which were ingrafted in the Constitution of the United States, and I stand by him no longer than he stands by his oath to support and defend the organic law. I am wedded to no man, but am devoted to my country and its liberties.

But this proposed amendment goes much further than the Constitution goes in the language which it uses with regard to the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States. It proposes so to amend it that all persons in the several States shall by act of Congress have equal protection in regard to life, liberty, and property. If the bill to protect all persons in the United States in their civil rights and furnish the means of their vindication, which has just passed the Senate by almost the entire vote of the Republican party be constitutional, what, I ask, is the use of this proposed amendment? What is the use of authorizing Congress to do more than Congress has already done, so far as one branch is concerned, in passing a bill to guaranty civil rights and immunities to the people of the United States without distinction of race or color? If it is necessary now to amend the Constitution of the United States in the manner in which the learned gentleman who reported this amendment proclaims, then the vote of the Senate of the United States in passing that bill guarantying civil rights to all without regard to race or color was an attempt to project legislation that was manifestly unconstitutional, and which this proposed amendment is to make legal.

Now, sir, on the 5th of January, 1866, Mr. TRUMBULL introduced a bill into the Senate of the United States, in this language:

That there shall be no discrimination in civil rights or immunities among the inhabitants of any State or Territory of the United States on account of race, color, or previous condition of slavery; but the inhabitants of every race and color, without regard to any previous condition of slavery or involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall have the same right to make and enforce contracts, to sue, be parties, and give evidence, to inherit, purchase, lease, sell, hold, and convey real and personal property.

Sir, I shall deal with these grave questions in a spirit of candor, and with no disrespect to the committee of fifteen as individuals, yet I shall not hesitate to lay bare the wicked despotism which is the result of the making and sustaining such an unauthorized body who are sitting as an inquisition upon the liberties of the people. My whole ambition is to save my country and its liberties, and may God give me wisdom so to act as to further the great objects of the war, and relieve an oppressed people from the exercise of despotic power. I want all errors or wrongs on the part of the southern people, growing out of the war, to be at once buried forever in the deep ocean of oblivion. Great disasters threaten us by the hands of fanaticism. Let us remember that civil wars usually menace liberty, and often end in its overthrow and destruction.

No sentiment of disloyalty to the great doctrines of self-government embodied in the Constitution has or shall ever beat or throb in my heart. To the maintenance of those doctrines I have devoted the whole of my time in this body, and to them and the safeguards of constitutional liberty I shall devote the balance of my life. In devotion to and love of my country, I will yield to no man on earth. My only hope for liberty is in the full restoration of all the States, with the rights of representation in the Congress of the United States upon no condition but to take the oath laid down in the Constitution. In the legislation by the States they should look to the protection, security, advancement, and improvement, physically and intellectually, of all classes, as well the blacks as the whites. Negroes should have the channels of education opened to them by the States, and by the States they should be protected in life, liberty, and property, and by the States should be allowed all the rights of being witnesses, of suing and being sued, of contracting, and doing every act or thing that a white man is authorized by law to do. But to give to them the right of suffrage, and hold office, and marry whites, in my judgment is dangerous and never ought to be extended to them by any State. However, that is a matter belonging solely to the sovereign will of the States. I have faith in the people, and dark and gloomy as the hour is, I do not despair of free government. I plant myself upon the will of God to work out a bright destiny for the American people.

Let old issues, old feuds, and old questions be buried in the past. New and living issues are upon us. Let it be said of us in this period of our country's great trial and agony that there was a band of patriots in this Congress, who devoted their energies and their influence, regardless of party differences, to strengthen the arm of the President in his noble purpose of restoration, and who with honest hearts strained every nerve to make this a more perpetual Union, knowing in that great work no North, East, West, or South, and remembering that as Christ gave His life to save a fallen world, so did that noble band dedicate the part of their lives in which they were engaged as guardians of the people's honor to the forgiveness of their brethren in the South, and the restoration of all the States. With all the States fully represented, our future would be much brighter than was that of our fathers who fled from persecution in the Old World, and under our Constitution commenced this present Government, although we have a vast debt upon our shoulders which, with a united country and an equalization of taxes, we can very soon pay. Whatever is done, let it be the act of calm, dispassionate, and enlightened reason, exercised for the best interests of all, ever remembering that Christian injunction of doing unto others as we would that they should do unto us. In my political course my conscience is clear, and I shall not be content until the bright heritage of our fathers is transmitted to their descendants unimpaired.

I know human nature is frail. We are not so constituted that we can all think alike. I have no feelings against those who disagree with me, and my only regret is that they cannot look at the situation of our country from a stand above and beyond party. I have been treated with great respect by those who disagree with me, and feel bound to believe that they are moved by honest convictions of duty, and in all charitableness I am willing to accord to them the same rights I claim for myself. Let us treat our southern brethren with kindness. They deserve our sympathy and support, for sorely have they been chastened. God gave His only begotten Son to save the world. Can we not give up our passions and prejudices to save the Union? When you refuse representation you dissolve the Union, prostrate the Constitution, and erect an imperial despotism over nearly one third of the Union. The despotisms of Europe will shout over our fall, while the people of Ireland and all the downtrodden masses will shed tears, mingled with blood. Holding eleven States as conquered provinces, and the enforcement of taxes upon them, must alienate all the affections of the South, and finally end in revolution and blood. Congress has no power to dissolve the Union. I cannot join with northern disunionists in such an abominable act.

I call upon the people of the South to fill up the ranks and make a more determined effort to get into the Union than they did to get out. Let the angel of love blot out the memories of the past insurrection, and hover her wings over a united Union.

Who gave the Senate the constitutional power to pass that bill guarantying equal rights to all, if it is necessary to amend the organic law in the manner proposed by this joint resolution? This is but another attempt to consolidate the power of the States in the Federal Government. It is another step to an imperial despotism. It is but another attempt to blot out from that flag the eleven stars that represent the States of the South and to consolidate in the Federal Government, by the action of Congress, all the powers claimed by the Czar of Russia or the Emperor of the French. It provides that all persons in the several States shall have equal protection in the right of life, liberty, and property. Now, it is claimed by gentlemen upon the other side of the House that negroes are citizens of the United States. Suppose that in the State of New Jersey negroes are citizens, as they are claimed to be by the other side of the House, and they change their residence to the State of South Carolina, if this amendment be passed Congress can pass under it a law compelling South Carolina to grant to negroes every right accorded to white people there; and as white men there have the right to marry white women, negroes, under this amendment, would be entitled to the same right; and thus miscegenation and mixture of the races could be authorized in any State, as all citizens under this amendment are entitled to the same privileges and immunities, and the same protection in life, liberty, and property.

Will gentlemen upon the other side dispute my position? I defy contradiction. Why, sir, it says that the people of each State shall have the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States. What is a privilege? What an immunity? Will learned gentlemen deny that the right of marriage is a contract and a privilege. Its source is the law of nature, whence it has flowed into the municipal laws of every civilized country, and into the general law of nations. (Bishop on Marriage and Divorce, section 29.) The organic law says that no person but a natural-born citizen, or a citizen when it was made, shall be eligible to the office of President. This amendment would make all citizens eligible, negroes as well as whites. For if negroes are citizens, they are natural born, because they are the descendants of ancestors for several generations back, who were born here as well as themselves. The negroes cannot be citizens in a new State in which they may take up their residence unless they are entitled to the privileges and immunities of the citizens resident in that State. Most of the States make a distinction in the rights of married women. This would authorize Congress to repeal all such distinctions.

Marriage is a contract as set down in all the books from the Year-books down to the present time. A white citizen of any State may marry a white woman; but if a black citizen goes into the same State he is entitled to the same privileges and immunities that white citizens have, and therefore under this amendment a negro might be allowed to marry a white woman. I will not go for an amendment of the Constitution to give a power so dangerous, so likely to degrade the white men and women of this country, which would put it in the power of fanaticism in times of excitement and civil war to allow the people of any State to mingle and mix themselves by marriage with negroes so as to run the pure white blood of the Anglo-Saxon people of the country into the black blood of the negro or the copper blood of the Indian.

Now, sir, the words "privileges and immunities" in the Constitution of the United States have been construed by the courts of the several States to mean privileges and immunities in a limited extent. It was so expressly decided in Massachusetts by Chief Justice Parker, one of the ablest judges who ever sat upon the bench in the United States. Those words, as now contained in the Constitution of the United States, were used in a qualified sense, and subject to the local control, dominion, and the sovereignty of the States. But this act of Congress proposes to amend the Constitution so as to take away the rights of the States with regard to the life, liberty, and property of the people, so as to enable and empower Congress to pass laws compelling the abrogation of all the statutes of the States which makes a distinction, for instance, between a crime committed by a white man and a crime committed by a black man, or allow white people privileges, immunities, or property not allowed to a black man.

Take the State of Kentucky, for instance. According to her laws, if a negro commits a rape upon a white woman he is punished by death. If a white man commits that offense, the punishment is imprisonment. Now, according to this proposed amendment, the Congress of the United States is to have the right to repeal the law of Kentucky and compel that State to inflict the same punishment upon a white man for rape as upon a black man.

According to the organic law of Indiana a negro is forbidden to come there and hold property. This amendment would abrogate and blot out forever that law, which is valuable in the estimation of the sovereign people of Indiana.

In the State of Pennsylvania there are laws which make a distinction with regard to the schooling of white children and the schooling of black children. It is provided that certain schools shall be designated and set apart for white children, and certain other schools designated and set apart for black children. Under this amendment, Congress would have power to compel the State to provide for white children and black children to attend the same school, upon the principle that all the people in the several States shall have equal protection in all the rights of life, liberty, and property, and all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States.

The effect of this proposed amendment is to take away the power of the States; to interfere with the internal police and regulations of the States; to centralize a consolidated power in this Federal Government which our fathers never intended should be exercised by it. All men who are honest, and love their country, and who believe in the doctrines upon which the constitutional liberty of this country is founded, must admit that the rights of the States were the most jealous rights which our fathers had in view; and when they wrested from England the independence of the several States, they wrested them as thirteen independent States and nations, free from each other, with all rights and privileges given to the people to exercise, carry into effect, and control a Government according to their own exclusive will and judgment.

Let us see what Chief Justice Parker says upon this subject of privileges and immunities of citizens of the several States, as already incorporated in the organic law of this country. He says, in 6 Pickering, pages 92 and 93, in the case of Abbot vs. Bailey:

"The constitutional provision referred to is necessarily limited and qualified; for it cannot be pretended that a citizen of Rhode Island coming into this State to live is ipso facto entitled to the full privileges of the citizen if any term of residence is prescribed as preliminary to the exercise of political or municipal rights. The several States then remain sovereign for some purposes, and foreign to each other, as before the adoption of the Constitution of the United States; and especially in regard to the administration of justice, and in the regulation of property and of estates, the laws of marriage and divorce, and the protection of the persons of those who live under their jurisdiction."

Does this amendment propose to leave the several States foreign to each other as regards the regulation of property and of estates, the laws of marriage and divorce, and the protection of the powers of those who live under their jurisdiction? No, sir; it proposes to take away all those rights of a State, and under this broad principle of equality which during the last five years has been proclaimed throughout the land to empower the Federal Government to exercise an absolute, despotic, uncontrollable power of entering the domain of the States and saying to them, "Your State laws must be repealed wherever they do not give to the colored population of the country the same rights and privileges to which your white citizens are entitled." I will not vote for any amendment to the organic law that is to affect the eleven southern States as long as those States are denied representation. The courts have decided that guarantees, privileges, and immunities are not powers, and when the Constitution authorized Congress to make all laws necessary and proper to carry into execution the powers vested in the Government, it meant powers strictly. Upon this point the honorable gentleman who reported this resolution [Mr. BINGHAM] and I agree. That powers do not mean guarantees and privileges we all agree; and because of that this amendment in part is deemed necessary.

Now, sir, another reason why our fathers never intended that Congress should have the right to interfere in the case of the clause of the organic law which says that "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States," is this: that the eighth section of the first article designates and names the particular powers which Congress may exercise. It is therefore clear that the framers of the Constitution intended to exclude the exercise of all powers except those expressly named. You nowhere find in the Constitution the grant of any power such as is now proposed to be exercised. You nowhere find Congress endowed with the right to interfere with the eminent domain and the sovereign power of a State. But each State has sovereign jurisdiction and power over the property, the liberty, the privileges, and immunities, and the lives of its citizens.

I am pleased to see gentlemen upon the other side of the House coming forward to defend State rights, which I regard as the vital principle of our Government. I am pleased to see the now gallant and noble advocate of liberty and State rights, the gentleman from New York, [Mr. RAYMOND,] standing up in the city of New York and defending those great rights of State jurisdiction, without which the Constitution of this country is worthless, and the liberties of the people a myth. I am willing to follow in the track of him and those who manifest the same noble spirit. I am willing to sink all parties into oblivion, if it be necessary, to save this Union. To save this Union I am willing to sink party organization so low that when Gabriel blows his horn they will never hear it. I am willing to do this in order to preserve those principles of civil liberty which have been handed down to us by our fathers, and embodied by them in our Federal system of Government and in the self-governing constitutions of the independent States of this Union.

It was State rights that our fathers in framing the Constitution sought to preserve in all their just majesty. Through seventy-five years we have enjoyed these rights; and I desire that they shall be handed down unimpaired to our children and our children's children forever. I affirm that when you attempt to take away those rights by constitutional amendment, you make one more stride toward a consolidation of power in one central Government; one more stride toward despotism; one more stride toward the destruction of those great principles which Washington and Jefferson and Madison regarded as the vitalizing ideas of our republican system; one more stride toward the enslavement of your posterity, whose liberties can only be guaranteed by the maintenance of the great principles which our revolutionary fathers vindicated and sought to transmit for the benefit of their posterity.

Sir, one great object which is now sought is to prevent eleven sovereign States of this Union from being represented in the Halls of Congress while they are compelled to bear their full burden of taxation. The tendency of this effort must be to widen and deepen that gulf between the North and South which has been created by northern fanaticism and southern rebellion. The purpose is to make that gulf so broad and vast that the southern States shall never be permitted to take their place in this Union except as mere dependencies of a consolidated central power, by virtue of which Congress shall exercise an unlimited control over the municipal concerns of these States, embracing in its jurisdiction all the most valued rights of life, liberty, and property, which our Constitution designed to be under the guardianship of the individual States, which alone can give the citizen the adequate measure of protection.

Sir, I defy any man upon the other side of the House to name to me any right of the citizen which is not included in the words "life, liberty, property, privileges, and immunities," unless it should be the right of suffrage; and that has been decided by the circuit court of the United States in Corfield vs. Coryell, 4 Washington's Circuit Court Reports, pages 380 and 381, to be included in the words "privileges and immunities;" that "privileges and immunities" are so broad as even to include the right of suffrage. I will not affirm that that position is correct, nor will I deny it; but if it be correct, as that high court has solemnly decided, it is easy to perceive why our fathers refused to authorize Congress to legislate on this subject by granting no power to it to legislate upon the guarantees of the organic law, and confining its legislation to the powers granted. That clause in the organic law which says that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, as well as the other guarantees of the Constitution, have been repeatedly decided by the Supreme Court of the United States to apply only to cases affecting the Federal Government, and not to apply to such cases as are exercised by the States. For instance, if a State should condemn a man to death without due process of law, or take his property for public use without any compensation, the clauses of the Constitution of the United States would have no application to such cases; but if the Federal Government should do the same thing, then these clauses in the organic law would apply. This position no lawyer in this House will deny.

What do we understand by the word property in a legal sense? Included in the right of property is the right to vote. The learned men on the same committee with myself will not deny that it has been so decided. In fact it is an axiom of law in this country, that the right of voting is a right of property. When a man has been refused the right of voting he has the right to prosecute the man who has deprived him of that right. It has been so settled in the courts of the Union, that the right to vote is property. Now, according to the broad construction and latitudinarian ideas of the times, it is easy to get courts to decide that this amendment would give Congress the power to regulate suffrage in the States under the words property, privileges, and immunities.

I know I am a young man, and of course pay much respect to older minds, yet I defy contradiction of any of the legal principles I am laying down. I do not want to pervert or misstate, and am always ready to be corrected if I err. I have taken some pains to study the theory of our Government and the liberties of this Union. Now, sir, I insist that the Federal Government has no power to deprive the States of any of the rights which they have reserved to themselves. I will refer to the case of Campbell vs. Morris, 3 Harris & McHenry's Reports, page 554:

"2. All power, jurisdiction, and rights of sovereignty not granted by the people by that instrument, or relinquished, are still retained by them in their several States, and in their respective State Legislatures, according to their forms of government."

"Uniformity of laws in the States is contemplated by the General Government only in two cases, on the subject of bankruptcies and naturalization."

"The legislative powers of Congress are particularly defined in the eighth section of the first article."

"Those powers do not interfere with or abridge the power of the States to make local regulations, the operation of which is confined to the State."

This Congress, not satisfied with the powers already given by the Constitution of the United States, not believing that they have authority to pass this civil rights bill which passed through the Senate of the United States, not believing according to the letter and spirit of the Constitution, within the meaning of the word "powers," there is any authority in Congress to carry into effect the immunities and privileges which are contained in this section, they now attempt to ingraft and implant upon the Federal system of this country for all time to come, a despotic and supreme power which would sap the very life-blood of the States and deprive them of the most precious and heretofore indestructible rights which they have enjoyed from the formation of the Government down to this time. It cannot be expected that the southern States or any one of the border States in this Union will indorse through their Legislatures an amendment of this character. If this amendment were submitted to the people it would not receive the sanction of one State except Massachusetts. The name of this committee ought to be changed from the committee on reconstruction to the committee on destruction. It is a source of despotism and partakes of the character of the English Inquisition and the Jacobin committee of France. It usurps the power to regulate the affairs of the Union, sits in secret inquisition over the liberties of the people, issues edicts and mandates to Congress, and with imperial dignity orders Congress to pass laws which would sap the life-blood of the nation, prostrate the Constitution, break down the Union, and destroy the rights and liberties of the people of America. Its conduct has been recorded for posterity to judge of, and that judgment will consign its acts to oblivion and eternal shame. It was established to prevent the southern States from having representation in the Union, to reduce them to conquered provinces, and to blot from the flag of our country eleven of its stars, and to allow none to even come in by act of Congress, until it would ratify these abominable, despotic, and accursed amendments to the Constitution. This is wicked, pestilent, and odious despotism. I say that the liberties of France were no more invaded, when Napoleon sought to regulate the destinies of France. The bloody acts of Nero and Caligula were not conceived in a more determined hatred of law, liberty, and order, than are the results of the action of this committee. I do not believe they intend to do wrong, but they are mad and know not what they do. They are like John Brown, who believed he was doing God's will in the murders at Harper's Ferry. I know they would not do an intentional wrong, but fanaticism has made them delirious in their vengeance upon the South. Do not inaugurate this spirit of despotism within the portals of this Capitol dedicated to the immortal Washington.

But of all the amendments that have been proposed there are none so dangerous and outrageous as this.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I call the gentleman to order; he is addressing the galleries and not the Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. ROGERS. I have great respect for the Chair, and if I turned my back it was not from disrespect.

Mr. KELLEY. If the gentleman will allow me I will show we are not either oppressed or in any of the dangers that the French people were from Bonaparte or any other revolutionary character.

Mr. ROGERS. I yield.

Mr. KELLEY. I ask to read eight lines from a book I chance to have in my hand at the time. I will make no other speech. It is Thiers's description of Bonaparte after his return from Egypt.

"The general had not been above a week in Paris when the management of affairs came almost involuntarily into his hands. In default of his will, which as yet was nothing, he was asked for his opinion. On his part, he affected, with his usual reserve, to withdraw himself from the assiduities of which he was the object. There were many whom he refused to see; he showed himself but little, and went abroad only, as it were, by stealth. His face had become thinner, and his complexion darker. He wore, since his return, a gray frock-coat, and a Turkish saber fastened to a silken cord. To those who had been fortunate enough to obtain a sight of it, this was an emblem that reminded them of the East, the Pyramids, Mount Tabor, and Aboukir. The officers of the garrison, the forty adjutants of the national guard, and the staff of the place, desired to be presented to him. He delayed from day to day, and seemed to lend himself with regret to all this homage. He listened, he observed everything, but as yet he opened his mind to none. This was deep policy. When a man is necessary, he need not be afraid to wait. He irritates impatience of people; they hasten to him; and he has nothing to do but to choose."—Thiers's Hist. French Revolution, vol. 5, pp. 411, 412. London, 1838.

Our Bonaparte does not wait.

Mr. ROGERS. We have no Bonaparte. We have a pure man. We have a man who came from the humble walks of life, a man who has never been bound down by the aristocracy, a man who is the embodiment of civil liberty, who believes that this Government was made for the benefit of white men and white women. [Applause in the galleries suppressed by the Chair.]

In regard to this committee, I say that a more fatal and bloody tyranny did not insult humanity when Louis XIV proclaimed his edicts than through the operation of that committee is stalking forth over this country. The Emperor Tiberius harbored no more vengeance toward the Roman people than do the radical portion of this committee toward the liberty and rights of the people of America. When Charles I sent his file of soldiers to the British Parliament to arrest members of that body, he did not defile liberty more than is proposed to be done by these constitutional amendments in sweeping away the civil, religious, and political rights of the people of the States.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. The gentleman has stated that tyranny, such as never before has been known in our country, has been exercised by the committee of fifteen. I desire to ask whether he is at liberty to communicate to this House the character of that tyranny? What are the doings of the committee which he thus characterizes?

Mr. ROGERS. I am privileged to speak no further about it than what has already taken place. But if the gentleman will look at the amendments to the Constitution and the concurrent resolution declaring these eleven States out of the Union, and requiring an act of Congress to admit them; depriving by an amendment a State from paying its own debt, depriving the States of representation unless they grant unqualified suffrage to negroes, and this present joint resolution, all reported from this committee, and the assertion of the honorable chairman [THADDEUS STEVENS] that the committee had determined to admit the Tennessee delegation until the President used his constitutional power of veto, he will find the character of tyranny to which I refer. It is more than tyranny. It is treason to the Constitution, because it dissolves the Union. This concurrent resolution has done more than all the armies of the South were able to do. It drives eleven States out of the Union, and it destroys the representative character of our Government. The object of the committee is to compel these States to accept these despotic amendments before they shall have representation. I am a member of that committee, but it shall not seal my mouth. I hope no southern State that ever had independence will ever ratify such laws. Before I will see the liberty of the people trampled down through fanaticism and the Union destroyed by radicalism, I am willing to resort to arms as our fathers did to defend our liberty and our Union.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman allow me to ask a question?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. The gentleman has stated that he is not at liberty to state anything in reference to the action or conduct of that committee, which he characterizes as tyrannous. Now, sir, I ask the reason why he is not at liberty to communicate that; whether any additional secrecy has been imposed upon him by that committee in their proceedings for the consideration of Congress.

Mr. ROGERS. Enough has already been said upon what the committee have reported to show what it has done. Did not the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] a man for the honesty of whose opinions I have great respect, although I disagree with him, say the other day that because the President of the United States, in the exercise of constitutional power had seen fit to put his veto upon an odious and despotic act of this Congress, the committee had changed their mind upon the question of allowing the gallant, loyal members from the State of Tennessee to take their seats in this Hall? Why, sir, what is despotism, what is tyranny, what is disunion, unless such conduct as this constitutes them, conduct that obliterates from our flag eleven stars, representing eleven States in the American Union? What more could secession, rebellion, insurrection, invasion, and revolution do? I do not speak in disrespect of the members of that committee as individuals, but am condemning their political action, which is fairly open to the criticism of any member. I feel it my duty to warn the people of the dangers emanating from this star-chamber committee.

Mr. KELLEY. I desire to ask the gentleman a simple question.

Mr. ROGERS. I will yield for a question.

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman says that the committee proposes to prevent the States from paying their debts. I desire to ask him what debts it is proposed to prohibit the payment of.

Mr. ROGERS. It is proposed to prohibit the States from paying the debts they contracted in aid of the rebellion. I would not have one cent of it paid by the Federal Government, because it would have no right to do so, and it would be an outrage to do so. My ground is, that each State is sovereign upon the question of its debts. There is no more sacred right in any State than the right to say what debts it will pay, to whom it will pay them, and when and how it will pay them; and an amendment to the organic law for the purpose of preventing a State paying any debt it pleases is but the emblem of despotism and tyranny. Congress has no power, by an amendment to the Constitution or otherwise, to prevent New Jersey from paying any debt she pleases.

Mr. KELLEY. I beg leave to ask the gentleman from New Jersey whether the State of New Jersey contracted any debt in support of the so-called confederacy?

Mr. ROGERS. I hope the gentleman does not intend to insult me. If I was in a southern State I should oppose its paying the rebel debt. But I am talking about the power of the Federal Government and the rights of the States. If a southern State sees fit to pay a rebel debt, it is no business of all or any of the other States, or of the Congress or Federal Government.

Mr. KELLEY. I only ask the gentleman because he insists that we want to prevent New Jersey from paying her debts.

Mr. ROGERS. I used that argument to show that New Jersey stands in the Union the same as South Carolina; that New York and Pennsylvania have no more rights in the Union than South Carolina has, and that South Carolina has as much right to be represented here, and to have her Representatives admitted, as Pennsylvania, New York, or New Jersey has.

Mr. KELLEY. I am satisfied.

Mr. ROGERS. That is my doctrine, whether my Democratic brethren subscribe to it or not. Some policy ones may not; I do not know. Three different views are entertained in this House upon the status of the so-called confederate States. One view is, that the confederate States are in the condition of conquered provinces, subject to the control of the Congress the same as the Territories. Another view is, that they are in the Union, and possess the right of local and domestic legislation, but have not absolute right to demand representation in Congress without conditions and qualifications. Another view is that they are in the Union and States in the fullest sense of the term, and have a positive right to representation in Congress. To this latter view I subscribe with all my heart.

I concede that the first view of this case is a logical one, if the premises are correct. But there is nothing logical in the middle view. If they are States in the Union for any purpose they are entitled to all the rights of the other States, North or South. The Constitution is based upon the equality of the States, and there can be no such thing as a State being in the Union without the rights of the other States. My ground is that when a Representative from Virginia or Tennessee or South Carolina goes to the Speaker's desk with all the muniments of a regular election, having been duly elected according to law, he is entitled to have the oath submitted to him that is laid down in the Constitution—I mean the oath to support the Constitution of the United States—and any other oath put to any man is worth no more than the oath put by the highwayman to the victim whose purse he demands and whose life he attempts to take on the highway, that he will not tell of it. There are only two conclusions: either this war has broken up the Union and driven the States out, or else it has kept the States in the Union. If the States are in the Union, if they are a part and parcel of the Federal Union, what authority is there in the Constitution to impose different qualifications and obligations upon their Representatives from those laid down in the Constitution of the United States?

Mr. McKEE. I wish to ask the gentleman from New Jersey if he is in favor of nullifying a law of the national Congress before the constitutionality of that law has been decided by the proper tribunal?

Mr. ROGERS. No, sir; I am not for annulling a law of Congress. I am for standing by a law until that law is decided illegal by the highest court of the United States. But I have a right, as a representative of the people, to stand here and protest against laws that I believe to be unconstitutional, and I believe that the oath administered here is worth no more than the Jacobin oath of France or the oath of Charles I. It is only such tyranny as that that keeps these States out of the Union, and until you repeal the law imposing that odious test oath, you can never expect that the Representatives of all the States can take their seats in this House. That oath of itself is an indirect way of depriving the States of representation. The worst species of tyranny in the Old World was imposed on the people by virtue of odious and wicked test oaths. The President in his speech says that a man who takes the oath to support the Constitution must necessarily be loyal. You have just as much right to deprive a State of representation entirely as to compel it to send such members as can honestly take that oath. The Constitution defines the crime of treason, and the penalty is death. No such penalty as this test oath is known to the law for the commission of treason. If Congress can add to the oath directed by the Constitution, it can do away with it altogether. The power to add to necessarily gives power to diminish.

Mr. McKEE. Will the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROGERS] yield to me for a single other question?

Mr. ROGERS. All right.

Mr. McKEE. As the gentleman is not in favor of nullifying laws until they are decided by the proper tribunals to be unconstitutional, then I would ask the gentleman how the Representatives from South Carolina are to be got into this House before we have such a judicial decision?

Mr. ROGERS. The way to get them into the House is to repeal the law; to declare here, in a spirit of Christian magnanimity, that these restrictions shall be removed; that we will act toward them like brethren, remembering that their fathers and our fathers died on the battlefields of the Revolution to achieve our independence. If the Speaker of the House believes it unconstitutional, he has the right to swear a member in the manner provided in our organic law. Repeal this odious, obnoxious, and unjust legislation, and let every one of the Representatives take their seats.

I hope that I may live to see the sun shine upon this Capitol when its rays shall strike down upon the Representatives of every State of this Union. I want to see here in these seats the Representatives of all the States. I pray God that I may be a member of Congress when I can go home and have the proud satisfaction of saying to my constituents that the Union has been restored, with the rights and equalities of the several States unimpaired, in pursuance of the Crittenden resolution and the statesman-like utterances of President Johnson.

I am no disunionist. But I protest against the exercise of despotic power by any class of men. When the rebels undertook to violate the Constitution of the United States, and to trample upon the Union, I protested against their acts. This House knows that all the time I voted the necessary men and money to enable the Government to put down the rebellion, because I was unwilling to have this Union destroyed merely for the purpose of satisfying the fanatical schemes of Wendell Phillips, William Lloyd Garrison, and other disunion traitors in this country for the last forty years.

I say this was never, within the meaning of public or international law, a civil war or a war between two nations so far as its results were concerned. It was an insurrection and an invasion of the States, which the people of the States, through the constitutional power at the Federal head, were bound to put down. The soldiers who gathered around the tomb of the immortal Washington, and laid down their lives to preserve the glorious heritage bequeathed to us by our fathers, went to quell an insurrection and to repel an invasion and to restore liberty to the people of the South who were unable to protect themselves against the powers of secession and despotism which attempted to break down the safeguards of the Union.

The Constitution of the United States says that Congress shall have power to raise and support armies. It also says that it shall have power to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions. "To raise and support armies." What does that mean? It means that Congress is authorized to raise and support a general army, called the regular Army, for protection against foreign foes, and which was intended to be under the sole and exclusive control of the Federal Government. The other part of the section provides for the very difficulty which has arisen in this country; I mean the rebellion in the South against the Government of the United States. Was it not an insurrection and an invasion of those States? Ad facto government invaded those States, and each one of them had an insurrection therein, and the President of the United States called upon Congress to call out the militia; and did he not, in the very first proclamation he ever issued, say that there was an insurrection in the South, and that he called upon the Governors of the several States to bring forth from the militia a sufficient number to put down, under the Constitution of the United States, that insurrection and repel that invasion? The armies were raised and the war carried on in pursuance of a solemn guarantee that each State gave to the other, that the United States should guaranty to every State a republican form of government, and protect each of them against invasion, and on application of the Legislature, or of the Executive, (when the Legislature could not be convened,) against domestic violence. This guarantee is found in the fourth section of the fifth article of the Federal Constitution.

Now, sir, when we examine the legislation of Congress we find that since the commencement of the war that legislation has uniformly treated the movement of the southern States in their opposition to the laws as an insurrection. Under the authority to suppress insurrection and repel invasion, the President of the United States called upon the militia of the several States to come forward to assist in the work of quelling the insurrection and repelling the invasion.

The first act of Congress in reference to the rebellion declares, after certain recitals,

"Then and in such case it may and shall be lawful for the President by proclamation to declare that the inhabitants of such State or States, or any section or part thereof where such insurrection exists, are in a state of insurrection against the United States, and thereupon all commercial intercourse by and between the same and the citizens thereof, and the citizens of the rest of the United States, shall cease and be unlawful, so long as such condition of hostility shall continue."

The act of July, 1861, directs the President to reduce the standing Army to twenty-five thousand within one year after the end of the "existing insurrection and rebellion."

Sir, there was another act of Congress passed on the 7th of June, 1862, and amended as late as February, 1863, which provided that the tax commissioners in insurrectionary districts, after bidding in for the United States lands sold for unpaid taxes, should, in the name of the United States, enter upon and take possession of the same, and lease the same "until the said rebellion and insurrection in said State shall be put down; and the civil authority of the United States established, and until the people of said State shall elect a Legislature and State officers, who shall take an oath to support the Constitution of the United States; to be announced by the proclamation of the President."

Sir, this law is still in force, and the people of the insurrectionary States have elected Legislatures and State officers and taken an oath to support the Constitution of the United States.

By the act of July 22, 1861, the President was authorized to accept five hundred thousand volunteers for the purpose of suppressing insurrection, "provided that the services of the volunteers shall be for such time as the President may direct, not exceeding three years, nor less than six months, and they shall be disbanded at the end of the war."

Now, sir, that act says in so many words that these soldiers are called for under the act of July 22, 1861, for the purpose of suppressing insurrection.

In March, 1862, to take effect March, 1863, Congress apportioned the Representatives upon the basis that the insurgent States were in the Union, designating the number of each. That law is still in force. Under that law the present House of Representatives was chosen; under that law the present House is organized; under that law those eleven States of the South have right to representation.

The Constitution says:

"Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union according to their respective numbers."

Under that authority, Congress, after the passage of the Collamer statute, did both—apportioned both direct taxes and Representatives among the several States, including the southern as well as the northern and western States of this Union.

It was under the power to suppress an insurrection and repel an invasion, that millions of men were enlisted at the North, and it was under the provision of the Constitution which provides that the Governors of the different States shall, at the call of the President, furnish militiamen that the insurrection was suppressed and the invasion repelled.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ROGERS. I trust that the House will consent to extend my time for half an hour.

The SPEAKER. Is there any objection?

Mr. PRICE. I object.

Mr. ROGERS. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection. I have never had an opportunity heretofore to discuss this subject, and I am, I think, presenting it in a different light from any in which it has been presented.

Mr. KELLEY. I trust the gentleman from Iowa will withdraw his objection, as the gentleman from New Jersey has been interrupted so often.

Mr. PRICE. I object for the reason that I think the gentleman from New Jersey has had sufficient physical exercise to-day, and I am very certain that the House has suffered indiction enough for one time.

Mr. SCHENCK. I trust that we shall, at any rate, allow the gentleman ten minutes longer.

Mr. ROGERS. That is not sufficient time to enable me to say what I desire to say.

Mr. SCHENCK. There is one question which I would like to address to the gentleman from New Jersey. I always listen with great interest to his views on constitutional questions—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. HIGBY] is entitled to the floor at present, objection being made to extending the time of the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. KELLEY. I trust that the gentleman from Iowa will withdraw his objection, and that the gentleman from New Jersey will be permitted to go on.

39TH CONG.... 1ST SESS.

Mr. PRICE. In compliance with the urgent request of several gentlemen, but against the dictates of my own judgment, I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. There being no objection, the time of the gentleman from New Jersey is extended for one half hour.

Mr. BROOMALL. I trust that the gentleman will confine himself to the bill before the House.

Mr. SCHENCK. Will the gentleman from New Jersey allow me to make a single inquiry?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. SCHENCK. I observe that the gentleman opposes every amendment proposed to the Constitution of the United States. I wish to understand whether I apprehend rightly his position. Is he opposed to every alteration of the Constitution on the ground that it has a tendency to change the instrument? [Laughter.]

Mr. ROGERS. That is one ground, that it has a tendency to change that instrument and even destroys it. [Laughter.] Another ground is that it is dangerous to interfere with the old landmarks, made in compromise and wisdom by our fathers, in a time of excitement and by an appeal to the passions of the people. Another ground is that these amendments to the Constitution of the United States have a tendency to deprive the southern States of representation and to prevent the consummation of that grand object which our soldiers had in view when they laid down and imperiled their lives in defense of the country.

Now, sir, gentlemen undertake to base the theory which they adopt here that these States are out of the Union, that they are conquered provinces, and that they have no right to come in except by a law of Congress, upon the clause of the Constitution that the United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government.

That clause of the Constitution says the United States shall guaranty to every State a republican form of government, and protect it against invasion, and suppress an insurrection in it. In order to carry out that clause of the Constitution, Congress is—"To provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions."—Article I, section 8.

That invasion has been repelled and the insurrection suppressed. The object was to protect the State, and to carry out that object in the preamble of the Constitution that this Government was made in order to form a more perfect Union. It was to form a more perfect and perpetual Union. It was that the States should be left as they were, to maintain them in the condition in which they were before the acts of secession were passed. That object has been accomplished. The States still live. The States are not out of the Union. Insurrection was put down. The militia was called forth by the President of the United States, in conformity to the requirements of the Constitution, to suppress insurrection and to repel invasion. It was not under the general power of Congress to raise and support armies at all, but under the power to authorize the President of the United States to call upon the several States for a sufficient number of militia to put down insurrection in the States.

What does the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] say of the States lately in rebellion? He says:

"They have torn their constitutional States into atoms, and built on their foundations fabrics of a totally different character. Dead men cannot raise themselves; dead States cannot restore their own existence as it was."

Then, referring to the Constitution, he quotes from the third section of the fourth article the following:

"New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union."

And proceeds thus:

"In my judgment, this is the controlling provision in this case. Unless the law of nations is a dead letter, the late war between the two acknowledged belligerents severed their original compact and broke all the ties which bound them together. The future condition of the conquered Power depends upon the will of the conquerors. They must come in as new States, or remain as conquered provinces."

In another place in the same speech he says:

"To prove that they are and for four years have been out of the Union, for all legal purposes, and being now conquered, subject to the absolute disposal of Congress, I will suggest a few ideas and adduce a few authorities."

The law of nations with regard to the status of these States has no application whatever, for, as I have shown in the commencement of my argument, the right of the States in the Union exists by virtue of the Constitution itself; and that neither international laws nor State laws can regulate and control the status of a State during war, before war, or after war. I hold that they were States when they went into the war, that they were States during the war, and that they were States when they came out of the war, and that every man in the South, if he be elected according to the local laws of his State and the Constitution of the United States, is entitled to be admitted on the same conditions on which I have been admitted to a seat upon this floor.

It is provided in the organic law that each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members, and on that basis some members in this House go in for excluding members from the southern States; and they claim they have unlimited, despotic, and sovereign power within themselves as members of this body to say what State shall come in and what State shall not come in; what States shall be represented and what States shall not be represented.

The Constitution also says that each House may punish its members for disorderly behavior, and with the concurrence of two thirds expel them. Now, is there anybody on the other side who believes that our fathers intended, when they made the Constitution, to authorize the Congress of the United States to expel a member without any cause whatever? Did they intend to confer upon Congress the exercise of omnipotent power in that respect? Not at all, but only the power to expel after investigation and proof according to the forms of law, for some reasonable and lawful cause. We might just as well construe the second clause of the Constitution to mean that Congress has the right, by the intendment of the framers of that instrument, and within the spirit of the organic act itself, to expel a member without cause at pleasure, and without investigation; as to say we can keep southern members out who have all the qualifications laid down in the Constitution.

Every lawyer knows that when you undertake to construe a statute or constitutional provision you must do it according to the reason and spirit of it; according to the object or intent which the framers had in view at the time they made it. You must consider the evil they intended to remedy, and the difficulty that existed at the time of its passage. Now, sir, our fathers intended, when they made this provision in regard to extending a republican government to a State, that no State had a right to go out of the Union or withdraw its allegiance; and if it should undertake to do so they intended, by the exercise of force, to bring it back. It was an act of insurrection, and if other States should participate in such an act of insurrection and bring their armies into that State, it was an invasion of that State. Therefore, this war was carried on by the North to prevent the invasion of one State by another by a confederated, illegal government, and to put down the insurrection that existed in every State that attempted the act of secession.

It has been settled by the Supreme Court of the United States, and no gentleman on the other side dare deny it—if so, I will produce the opinion—that the Federal Government cannot make war upon any State. A provision was attempted to be inserted in the Constitution, that the Federal Government should have power to coerce a State; but it was voted down, on the ground that it would be a declaration of war on the part of the Federal Government against a State. And then they provided, in order to prevent a war between one section of the country and the other, that the United States should guaranty a republican form of government to each State, and should do it by repelling invasion and suppressing insurrection in the State.

If the people rise in any one State against the laws of the United States, as they did in South Carolina in nullification times, and use force, it is an insurrection. If they take up arms and undertake to enforce their rights by war, then the Federal Government is called into action by virtue of this provision which declares that the United States shall guaranty to each State a republican form of government, and shall prevent or put down insurrection and invasion. If ten or eleven States confederate together for the purpose of breaking down the Union and carrying on invasion, then the Constitution calls upon the Federal Government to send an army there to protect the minority of the people who could not protect themselves from the invasion; and to protect them from the insurrection of the people in the several States in the localities where these minorities exist. Otherwise if a mere majority, or even less than a majority, should, by some form of legislative action, carry the State out of the protection of the Union by the force of the bayonet; and despotically compel the people to participate in the unlawful government, the minority being unable to protect themselves against this majority, would be bound, in order to have protection at all, to seek it from this de facto Government. For that would be a de facto Government which was acknowledged by the nations of the world as a belligerent for the purposes of international law and Christian warfare.

I hold it to be a self-evident principle that a man who lives in a de facto Government is bound to support that Government, and is not bound to adhere to a Government that does not protect him. That doctrine has been settled in many cases, and it is the only Christian rule of law that can be established.

"A State, in the meaning of public law, is a complete or self-sufficient body of persons united together in one community for the defense of their rights. It has affairs and interests; it deliberates, and becomes a moral person, having understanding and will, and is susceptible of obligations and laws."

But our States are not subject to the definition given in public law, because under our Constitution a State is one thing and its government another. Our Constitution talks about guarantying to every State a republican form of government, meaning the State as one thing and its government another. It was the government of the States under the Constitution that the rebellion for a time suspended and usurped. Mexico has had its Government several times changed and overthrown, yet the State of Mexico, as a State, still exists.

Bishop on Law, in section one hundred and thirty-two, volume one, remarks:

"Except, therefore, for the clause guarantying republican governments to the States, the United States might, if it chose, after a State has committed what is called an act of secession, legislate for it forever to the exclusion of any subsequent State legislation. But the clause under consideration provides that the United States shall guaranty to the State a republican form of government. Therefore, as soon as the guarantee is executed, the right of legislation which the United States received from the defunct State government flows out to the new State government."

"When for any reason, as for instance when a State has passed what is termed in these days an ordinance of secession, there ceases to be within the State a government under the Constitution of the United States, the 'guarantee' mentioned in this section of the Constitution attaches, and the 'United States' becomes obligated to give the State a republican form of government."

"All persons residing within this territory are to be treated as enemies, though not foreigners." "But, in defining the meaning of the term 'enemies' property, we will be led into error if we refer to Flet or Lord Coke. It is a technical phrase, peculiar to prize courts, and depends upon principles of public policy as distinguished from the common law."—Prize Cases, 674.

Following this argument, the Supreme Court of the United States, in the prize cases, says: "The laws of war, as established among nations, have their foundation in reason, and all tend to mitigate the cruelties and misery produced by the scourge of war; hence the parties to a civil war usually concede to each other belligerent rights; they exchange prisoners, and adopt other courtesies and rules common to public or national wars."

There refer to the case of Luther vs. Borden, 7 Howard's Reports, where, while discussing the fourth section of the fourth article of the Constitution, Chief Justice Taney says:

"Under this article" * * * "it rests with Congress to decide what government is the established one in a State. For, as the United States guaranty to each State a republican government, Congress must necessarily decide what government is established in a State before it can determine whether it is republican or not."

Then, referring to the clause relating to domestic violence, the Chief Justice adds:

"So, too, as relates to the clause in the above mentioned article of the Constitution providing for cases of domestic violence. It rested with Congress to determine the means proper to be adopted to fulfill this guarantee. They might, if they had deemed it most advisable to do so, have placed it in the power of a court to decide when the contingency had happened which required the Federal Government to interfere. But Congress thought otherwise, and no doubt wisely; and by the act of February 28, 1795, provided that 'in case of an insurrection in any State against the Government thereof it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to call forth such numbers of the militia of any State or States as may be applied for as he may judge sufficient to suppress the insurrection.' By this act the power of deciding whether the exigency had arisen upon which the Government of the United States is bound to interfere is given to the President." * * * "If there is an armed conflict" * * * "it is a case of domestic violence, and one of the parties must be in insurrection against the lawful Government. And the President must of necessity decide which is the government and which party is unlawfully arrayed against it before he can perform the duty imposed on him by Congress."

In the case of the Amy Warwick, in admiralty, Judge Sprague, of Massachusetts, said:

"It has been supposed that if the Government have the rights of a belligerent, then, after the rebellion is suppressed, it will have the rights of conquest; that a State and its inhabitants may be permanently divested of all political privileges, and treated as foreign territory acquired by arms." * * * "This is an error, a grave and dangerous error. Belligerent right cannot be exercised where there are no belligerents. Conquest of a foreign country gives absolute unlimited sovereign rights, but no nation ever makes such a conquest of its own territory. If a hostile Power, either from without or within, take and holds possession and dominion over any portion of its territory, and the nation by force of arms expel or overthrow the enemy and suppress hostilities, it acquires no new title, but merely regains the possession of that of which it had been temporarily deprived. The nation acquires no new sovereignty, but merely maintains its previous rights."

When the United States take possession of a rebel district, they merely vindicate their preëxisting title. Under despotic Governments the right of confiscation may be unlimited; but under our Government the right of sovereignty over any portion of a State is given and limited by the Constitution, and will be the same after the war as it was before.

The Constitution says that each State shall have at least one Representative. (Article I, section 2.) It also says that no State without its consent shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate even by an amendment to the Constitution. Yet we are violating our oaths of office to support the Constitution by refusing the positive commands of it. It says the States shall have their equal suffrage in the Senate and at least one Representative. We say they shall not.

Sir, we are now doing what the confederacy attempted to do, and what the whole United States attempted to prevent during the war. The confederates claimed that these were States. They even introduced into their system the Constitution of the United States, with, I believe, only two exceptions, the one extending the time during which the President should hold his position and excluding him from reelection, and the other doing away with compelling one State to surrender to another fugitive slaves, as the law existed before the southern States made war on the Union. The South fought four years to preserve these as States, and the North did the same. We spent $3,000,000,000 in debt and the States $1,800,000,000, and we called out two million brave men to prevent these States from destroying themselves and going out; and yet after all this action of the Federal Government and all the power exerted by the two armies sustaining the individuality and the status of the States, we have here honorable gentlemen, men of learning and intelligence, and, I hope and believe, of patriotism, who are claiming that these States are out of the Union and dead States, and have no right to participate in the legislation of the country without a law of Congress for that purpose.

I say to you men on the other side who are conservative, pause and think before you allow radicalism in this House to destroy these States and the liberties of the people of this country. I say sink and perish any party rather than give up the glorious old stars and stripes of the old Union. I will join with you in every act or movement by whatever name you may call it, against radicalism and for the purpose of perpetuating those liberties which your fathers and my fathers intended should be transmitted by us to our descendants to the remotest generations of the world. Yet there is no party that can save the country but the Democratic, and in that organization I propose we all rally.

Sir, the President of the United States is doing all he can to secure representation to these States. He treats them as States in the Union, as they have always been treated, and it is only because he is using the constitutional powers given to him to carry out that view he is denounced upon the floor of this House as a man who two hundred years ago would have had his head brought to the block. All that I ask is that the President of the United States may have wisdom to persevere in his present course. I believe that he is an instrument in the hands of Almighty God, placed here to save the liberties of this people. I believe that the Almighty has, before this, intervened for the Democratic party; and I believe that He will now so guide this people that the radicals here and elsewhere will be unable to thwart the wise movement of the President of the United States in sustaining the Constitution, in perpetuating our form of government, and in using his power so that every stripe and every star shall be retained that ever graced the glorious banner of the United States of America.

I have confidence, too, that that Providence which watched over this Republic in its infancy, which hovered over the cradle where this nation was born, will, through the agency of Andrew Johnson, still work out the salvation of the American people. Looking to our greatness in all the elements of national power, our population, our wealth, our mechanical skill and industry, the day is not far distant when that bright and beautiful flag will gather back to its starry folds every star that ever represented an independent State of this Union, and our banner shall be lifted up, the symbol of the proud principle of civil liberty, which will give us strength and power to smother treason at home and repel invasion from abroad; and under that proud banner, we will proclaim to the halls of the Montezumas and to the monarchies of the Old World that every man, woman, and child on the western continent are free. May God speed the day when the people will rally in their might and at the ballot-box decide whether they want this Union dissolved or not.

I am for the Union, the indivisible Union, the Union of our fathers, the Union made by Washington, by Jay, and by Jefferson; the Union that has given to us peace, happiness, greatness, grandeur, and glory such as never belonged to any other nation since the foundation of the civilized world. I do not want such a Union as the radicals of this country are trying to set up for me. Their Union is a Union of despotism, a Union of tyranny, a Union not of independent fraternal States each legislating for itself upon its own domestic affairs.

I agree with Bancroft and the preachers of the gospel all over the land, that God, in His wise providence, acts in mysterious ways. And I believe that the angel of peace is now hovering over us; and will soon proclaim the glad tidings to the land, of peace and good-will toward all men. Mr. Johnson acts as President through the interposition of Providence, and I believe he will carry out His great purpose. I am willing to welcome them back like prodigal sons, and say to them, let us join together in such a way that if we get into a war with a foreign country we can marshal an army in the South as well as in the North, and show such an array of numbers, patriotism, and talent as to defy the combined Powers of Europe in attempting to establish monarchy and despotism anywhere throughout this great continent.

I am a radical for constitutional liberty. You will never find me voting to sustain any man unless that man stands within the very line, letter, and spirit of the Constitution. I was one of the eight, as is well known, who voted against thanking Andrew Johnson for keeping military power and control over the southern States; and although I respect him, and will stand by him in his reconstruction policy and every constitutional movement he makes to restore these States to the Union, when he violates the Constitution, I shall protest, as I did against the last Administration.

Mr. SPALDING. I would inquire of the Chair how much time remains of that allowed the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROGERS.]

The SPEAKER. About five minutes. Mr. SPALDING. I move that his time be extended without limitation. [Cries of "That's right,"]

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I object.

Mr. MOULTON. I would like to ask the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROGERS] a question.

Mr. ROGERS. All right; go on.

Mr. MOULTON. I understand the gentleman to say that on one occasion he refused to vote to eulogize President Johnson.

Mr. ROGERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. MOULTON. I would like to ask him whether that was before or after the veto message.

Mr. ROGERS. It was after the veto message.

Mr. MOULTON. On what occasion?

Mr. ROGERS. It was on a resolution which was passed on the afternoon of the day when the veto message was sent into the Senate.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania. It was while the veto message was being read in the Senate.

Mr. ROGERS. It was then known all over the House that the President had vetoed that bill.

I want my constituents and the country to understand that I support Andrew Johnson only so far as he supports the Constitution. When he goes against the Constitution, I will go against him. I will protest against despotism and tyranny when exercised by any President, tyrant, or monarch on the face of the earth.

Mr. LONGYEAR. I desire to ask the gentleman from New Jersey whether he had heard of the veto or knew that it was coming before he gave that vote.

Mr. ROGERS. Yes, sir; I knew that it was coming probably before the gentleman did. I will bet that I did. [Laughter.]

Mr. KELLEY. I desire to ask the gentleman from New Jersey a question: If I am correct in my recollection, the gentleman dissented from the Chicago platform upon which General McClellan was nominated.

Mr. HOGAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. I submit that the Chicago platform is not under discussion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

SENATE.

Representation of Rebel States—Mr. Wilson.

39TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Mr. VAN HORN, of Missouri. The Chicago platform was decided out of order in 1864. Mr. KELLEY. I made that remark about the Chicago platform as a preliminary to another question which I wish to ask.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey must confine his remarks to the constitutional amendment, or questions relative thereto.

Mr. ROGERS. Well, sir, I am trying to do so; and I think I am in the true line of the argument when I argue to show that the object of this constitutional amendment is to prevent the eleven southern States from resuming their rightful places in the Union. I believe, that I have adhered to the question under discussion.

The SPEAKER. You have adhered to the subject under debate.

Mr. KELLEY. If the gentleman from New Jersey were permitted to answer my question, the gentleman from Missouri would discover that the inquiry which I propose to make is entirely in order.

Mr. ROGERS. I have no objection to answering. I have never in my life done anything politically of which I am ashamed.

Mr. KELLEY. I am aware that the gentleman does not object to answering.

Mr. ROGERS. I am perfectly willing to be catechised. I hope there will be no objection on this side of the House.

Mr. HOGAN. I will not insist on the point of order.

Mr. KELLEY. I desire to know whether the gentleman from New Jersey dissented from the Chicago platform on which General McClellan was nominated, or whether he sustained it.

Mr. ROGERS. I supported General McClellan. I necessarily sustained the main part of that platform; although, if I had had the drawing of it, I would have embraced in it a declaration in favor of a more vigorous prosecution of the war than had been carried out by the Republican party up to the time when the Chicago convention sat.

Mr. KELLEY. I now come to the main question which I propose to ask. The gentleman has asserted the indivisibility of the Union. That is a declaration which, coming from the gentleman, astonished me; and I wish to know when he adopted that view.

Mr. ROGERS. Well, sir, I do talk about the indivisibility of the Union. I always held that opinion. I say that it never was divided. The Chicago platform never declared that it was divided. It simply declared that so far the war was a failure, as was the fact. When the Democracy saw that they would have to submit to the unlawful stretch of power involved in the abolition of slavery or allow the rebellion to succeed, they rallied in their might, and when all hopes of pacification and compromise were gone, they used their most powerful efforts for the prosecution of the war, and the result was, they and the whole people North succeeded in suppressing the rebellion.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HIGBY, who, on obtaining the floor, had yielded to Mr. ROGERS, whose time was extended, resumed the floor.

Mr. ROGERS. I thought that my time had been again extended.

The SPEAKER. A proposition was made to extend the gentleman's time, but objection was made.

Mr. KELLEY. I hope the House will extend the gentleman's time. I hope that the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROGERS] will be allowed to finish his speech.

Mr. BINGHAM. If it can be made the special order for an early day, and the discussion confined within a reasonable time and the vote be then taken, I have no objection to it. I desire a full discussion of this measure. I believe the interest of the country requires the House should act on it, and act on it at an early day.

Mr. SMITH. What has become of the proposition granting an extension of time to the gentleman from New Jersey to enable him to finish his speech?

The SPEAKER. Objection was made, but the Chair will again put it to the House.

Mr. SMITH. Is all that has since taken place to be put into his speech? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. No, sir.

Mr. KELLEY. I am not willing that the gentleman from New Jersey shall go on tomorrow, but I am willing to give him the rest of the day to finish the ingenious address which he has been making to the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Objection was made.

Mr. KELLEY. I ask that the gentleman from New Jersey have leave to print the balance of his speech.

Mr. ROGERS. I do not ask for leave to print. I never write speeches.

Representation of Rebel States.

SPEECH OF HON. HENRY WILSON,

OF MASSACHUSETTS,

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

March 2, 1866.

The Senate having under consideration the following resolution:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring), That in order to close agitation upon a question which seems likely to disturb the action of the Government, as well as to quiet the uncertainty which is agitating the minds of the people of the eleven States which have been declared to be in insurrection, no Senator or Representative shall be admitted into either branch of Congress from any of said States until Congress shall have declared such State entitled to such representation.

Mr. WILSON said:
Mr. PRESIDENT: A stranger from the Old World listening to-day to honorable Senators might come to believe that eleven "wayward sisters," robed in the garments of humility and penitence, are pleading in tender accents for readmission into this sisterhood of States; and that their supplicating appeals are sternly and rudely repelled by the other members of the family. But that stranger, though unacquainted with American affairs, would quickly discern that these "wayward sisters" are not seeking the protection of the laws, for they are already completely subject to the rules and regulations of the household; but they are seeking for power, for authority to frame rules and regulations for the government of their loyal sisters. He would speedily discover that the nation is divided into two classes; that the one class imperiously demands the immediate and unconditional admission into these Halls of legislation of the rebellious States, rebel end foremost; that the other class seeks their admission into Congress at an early day loyal end foremost. He would hear, too, the blended voices of unrepentant rebels and rebel sympathizers and apologists mingling in full chorus—not for the restoration of a broken Union, for the unity and indivisibility of the Republic has been assured on bloody fields of victory, but for the restoration to these vacant chairs of the "natural leaders" of the South.

Politicians here and elsewhere may deceive themselves—they may affect to see what cannot be seen with the clear vision of intelligent patriotism, but the people who have given two and a half million men, the blood of six hundred thousand heroes, and $3,000,000,000 for the unity of the Republic and the liberties of the people, clearly comprehend the issues. A loyal people instinctively see, amid the turmoil and excitement of the present, that this is not a struggle for the readmission of the rebel States into the Union, but a struggle for the admission of rebels into the legislative branches of the Government; not a struggle to put rebels under the laws of the country, but a struggle to enable rebels to frame the laws of the country. A loyal people see that the confederate States reconstructed since the surrender of the rebel armies are as completely in the hands of rebels now as on the day Jeff. Davis was incarcerated at Fortress Monroe.

Mr. President, we have indeed fallen upon eventful, exciting, and sad times. Unrepentant rebels, rebel sympathizers, and apologists—the men whose hands are stained with the blood of more than half a million loyal heroes; who starved the country's defenders at Andersonville, Salisbury, and Belle Isle; plotted in the dark and troubled night of civil war in the secret lodges of the "Knights of the Golden Circle" and the "Sons of Liberty" for the overthrow of their struggling country; lighted the fires of riot and arson in the city of New York, and planned the assassination of Abraham Lincoln, are leaping with joy and shouting with exultation over the present deplorable aspect of national affairs. Rebel presses boast that they have published nothing since the victory at Manassas so gratifying as the President's veto to the bill for the Freedmen's Bureau. Rebel leaders bear themselves toward northern men, officers of the Army, and the tried and true loyal men of the South more insolently than ever. Returned rebel soldiers and kindred spirits are avenging themselves for the humiliations of defeat by insults, outrages, barbarities, and murders of harmless freedmen. Politicians in the loyal States, who rejoiced over the disasters of their country and sorrowed over the victories of its heroes on land and wave, are inspired anew in the work of vituperation and detraction. William B. Reed, the Democratic leader in Pennsylvania, gives as a sentiment to be drank in flowing bowls by the élite of the Democracy of Philadelphia, "Our illustrious statesman incarcerated at Fortress Monroe." Vallandigham, who kept watch and ward in the summer of 1864 over the border for the development of incipient treason in the great Northwest, now flies his flag. Returned rebels, and men of questionable loyalty, desecrate Washington's birthday here in the national capital. Presses that one year ago sneered at Abraham Lincoln as an "ignorant rail-splitter," and at Andrew Johnson as a "boorish tailor," now pour their malignity upon the Congress of the United States, and more than hint at the dispersion of the representatives of the people by the hand of lawless violence or executive usurpation. All that is disloyal from the Susquehanna to the Rio Grande, and the champions of slavery and caste everywhere, are exultant, defiant, aggressive.

The poor freedmen, who a few months ago were leaping and laughing with the joy of newfound liberty, invoking the blessings of Heaven upon the Government that had stricken the galling manacles from their limbs, are now trembling with apprehension, everywhere subject to indignity, insult, outrage, and murder. During the past four months, in Alabama alone, fourteen hundred cases of assault upon freedmen have been brought before the Freedmen's Bureau. Thousands and tens of thousands of harmless black men, from the Potomac to the Rio Grande, have been wronged and outraged by violence, and hundreds upon hundreds have been murdered. The offices and the agencies of the Freedmen's Bureau, of the officers of our armies, and the office of Judge Advocate General Holt are filled with the records of outrage and murder. The local authorities screen the murderers; the people protest against the punishment of white men for the murder of black men, and the murderers go unpunished.

Mr. President, in hundreds of thousands of the homes of the loyal people, who in the autumn of 1864 offered up their daily prayers on bonded knees for the triumph of their struggling country, and for the election of Abraham Lincoln and Andrew Johnson, there are manly hearts throbbing heavily with anxieties and gloomy forebodings. Noble men, and noble women too, have prayed and hoped and toiled through many a year for the triumph of liberty, justice, and humanity in America. They hoped when the slaveholders' rebellion was crushed, when the cause their hearts love and their judgments approve was supported by twenty-three out of the twenty-five loyal States, that the Administration they had intrusted with power would give the coming three years to patriotism and liberty, justice and humanity. They indulged the hope that the executive, legislative, and judicial branches of the Government would crowd these years with deeds that should consolidate free institutions, guard and hedge about popular rights, extend the rule of justice, and quicken the charities and humanities of the people. Their hearts are now throbbing heavily with a great sorrow, for they see that instead of spending the coming three years in strengthening the patriotism, securing the liberties, and extending the mild sway of equal justice to men of every race, these precious years are to be wasted, squandered in wicked wrangles, and in the use of the corrupt and corrupting patronage of the Government to debauch the public morals and to degrade the nation in the face of earth and of heaven. Surely the spectacle is enough to make the patriotic people, who, in November, 1864, consecrated their treasure, life, and blood to the maintenance of the unity of the country and the preservation of the menaced life of the nation, hang their heads in mortification, shame, disappointment, and sadness. The loyal people who stood by their country amid the storms of civil war with unwavering constancy will hold their public servants in all positions, in Congress, in the Cabinet, in the executive chair, to a stern responsibility.

Sir, why is it that the heart of a loyal people throbs heavily with disappointment and sorrow? What, in God's name, have the loyal people of America done that they should be so disappointed, so punished, so humiliated? What has the House of Representatives done that it should be threatened with violence by revolutionary utterances? What has the Senate of the United States done that a Senator should rise here this day and emphatically proclaim that, "By the Eternal he would advise the President to say to men elected to the Senate in the southern States, 'Come here, unite with the Democrats and conservative Republicans, call yourselves the Senate of the United States, and I will recognize you as the Senate of the United States?'" Sir, what have we done that we should be forced to listen to these revolutionary and treasonable utterances? These times remind me of those dark days four years ago, when our ears were pained with revolutionary and treasonable avowals; when in the secret councils of the Knights of the Golden Circle plans of treason were matured; when the Legislature of Illinois attempted to impair the power of a faithful Executive who was arming and sending her gallant sons to fight the battles of the endangered country. Sir, in those dark hours, when there were mutterings and threats of insurrection in the North, the heroic sons of the Northwest, from battle-fields they had made immortal by their constancy and valor, sent home messages of rebuke to the men who were organizing incipient treason, and those guilty men quailed and covered before the patriotism of the nation's defenders. The Senator from Kentucky, [MR. DAVIS,] as is his wont, indulges in prophetic utterances regarding the temper and action of the people. He will find, others will find, that the patriotic, liberty-loving men of the free and loyal States, who furnished the money to put down this rebellion, who filled the ranks of the armies, who furnished the talent that guided the civil and military councils of the country during the rebellion, will see to it that the men who utter these words, who make these threats, shall never control the destinies of the regenerated nation.

Why all this vituperation of the Senate and House of Representatives? Why these fierce attacks upon long-tried and long-trusted public servants whose devotion to country and to liberty should shield them from imputations upon their motives and characters? It is answered that Congress differs from the policy of the President. Surely the members of Congress have a right, a constitutional right, a moral right, to differ with the President upon some matters of public policy, and the President of the United States has a right to differ from the policy enunciated by Congress, but it is the part of patriotism for the President and for Congress to endeavor by thought, word, and deed to harmonize differences. Unwise words may have fallen from the lips of men in Congress, from Cabinet officers, and even from the Executive, but a patriotic and liberty-loving people will forget the unwise words of Senators and Representatives and Cabinet officers and the President, if they perform deeds that will cement the unity of the Republic, hedge about and secure the rights of the laboring poor, and bring enduring peace and prosperity to the country recently swept by the storms of civil war.

On the 1st of May last, ten months ago, the rebel States were prostrate at the feet of the nation, completely conquered and subjugated. They had fought, and fought bravely, for four years against the authority of the country; but they had been defeated, and their people could then have been molded at the nation's will. Abraham Lincoln had been assassinated. The people of the rebellious States saw that the Government of the United States had a million men in arms, and they were ready to accept any policy the nation chose to impose upon them, and to accept it freely. The leaders of southern opinion, in May and June of last year, all expected the reorganization of the insurgent States upon the basis of the equality of all men before the law. The public sentiment in the South was fast settling down into complete acquiescence in any conditions the Government should demand. Many of the eminent men of the South cheerfully avowed their readiness to accept the enfranchisement of the black man, and Mr. Reagan and Mr. Mallory, members of Jeff. Davis's cabinet, publicly advised the granting of suffrage to the new-made freedmen.

Sir, in the North the religious associations, at their anniversary meetings, with voices approaching unanimity, demanded suffrage for the freedmen. The literary journals and the religious press ably and earnestly advocated enfranchisement. The Republican press was unanimous for suffrage; the New York Herald, always quick to discern the currents of public opinion, proposed a plan of qualified suffrage, embracing colored persons who had served in the Army or Navy who could read, who possessed a small amount of property, or were members of Christian churches; the New York News, edited by Ben Wood; a late member of the House of Representatives, took ground in favor of suffrage in an elaborate article; the New York World, that may perhaps be accepted as the leading Democratic organ of the country, declared that suffrage to the black man must come sooner or later; the Boston Post, the leading Democratic journal of New England, was ready to extend suffrage to the colored race; other journals, supporting the Democratic party, manifested their readiness to settle the controversy about the rights of the negro by giving him suffrage for his own protection. The holders of the public securities, with the quick instinct of self-interest, would extend suffrage for the better security of the public credit, and the people North and South were then ready most cheerfully to acquiesce in the extension of suffrage to colored men in the rebel States.

Tens of thousands of the most progressive and liberal men of the Democratic party—ninety-five of every hundred who in November, 1864, thronged to the polls, and consecrated their treasure, blood, and lives to the unity of the Republic and the liberties of the people—believed with Andrew Johnson that—

"All men should have an equal start and a fair chance in the race of life, and that merit should be rewarded without regard to color."

and, in the immortal words of Abraham Lincoln, that—

"The ballot of the black man in some trying time to come may keep the jewel of liberty in the family of freedom."

Thoughtful men, anxious to heal the wounds of civil war and bury in forgetfulness the memories of old contests, were speaking for universal amnesty and universal suffrage; for forgiving and restoring all. The nobler sentiments of the liberty-loving men of the country at that time are caught and expressed in the verse of Whittier:

"From you alone the guaranty
Of Union, freedom, peace, we claim;
We urge no conqueror's terms of shame.

"Alas! no victor's pride is ours,
Who bend above our triumphs won
Like David o'er his rebel son.

"Be men, not beggars. Cancel all
By one brave, generous action; trust
Your better instincts, and be just!

"Make all men peers before the law,
Take hands off the negro's throat,
Give black and white an equal vote.

"Keep all your forfeit lives and lands,
But give the common law's redress
To labor's utter nakedness."

If the President of the United States had seized that golden moment, that grand opportunity then vouchsafed by Providence to weapon the hand of the new-made freeman with the ballot, these sectional controversies would have perished forever, the representatives of the rebellious States would ere this have filled these vacant chairs, and the heavens would be raining their choicest blessings upon the nation for a deed so wise and so just. But the President, though frankly avowing himself in favor of qualified suffrage, declined to assume the responsibility which the condition of the country imposed upon him, and the great opportunity God gave the nation to destroy caste, to clothe the emancipated race with power to guard their own liberties, rights, and interests without a struggle, passed by—perhaps forever.

The President began the work of reorganization by the appointment of Governor Holden in North Carolina, and the appointment of provisional governors for other States soon followed. Many of the most eminent men of the country doubted the wisdom of the President's policy. The President, to allay the doubt and distrust of the people, declared that his policy was an experiment, that final action was reserved to the Government, and that if these States were not properly organized the Executive and Congress could change, correct, or set aside the action of the reconstructed State governments; but the work went on, conventions were held, the old rebel journals were revived and began to fire again the southern heart and to delude and deceive a people who had once been so deluded and deceived as to plunge into civil war. These rebel journals, while praising the President, bitterly denounced the leading men of the party of the Administration. Presses in the North echoed their utterances and maledictions, and oft-baffled politicians began to gather about and to denounce the Senate and House of Representatives even before Congress assembled. The history of the world records nothing more wicked than the attacks that have been made upon the Senate and House of Representatives since they assembled in December last.

Sir, when Congress assembled, the demand was made for the immediate admission of Senators and Representatives from these reconstructed States, nearly all of whom are unrepentant rebels—men who cannot take the oath unless they are as false as were the Senators and Representatives who left these Chambers in 1861. Congress, to secure unity of purpose and action between the two Houses, promptly appointed a joint committee of fifteen to inquire into the condition of the States lately in rebellion. That committee, representing fourteen States, is composed of men of known and recognized capacity and character. The President nearly two months ago was called upon to furnish the papers relating to the reorganization of these insurrectionary States, but he has thought proper, doubtless for sufficient reasons, to withhold those papers. Possibly those papers might satisfy Congress that these re-constructed States are prepared to take part in the government of the country. It is understood that the committee are proceeding to take testimony, and it is hoped that the testimony will soon be reported to the country, and that it will satisfy all fair-minded men that these States will soon be prepared for participation in the legislation of Congress. The loyal people of the United States who have poured out so much blood, and given so much treasure for its preservation, are in favor of fully protecting the people of the rebellious States, white and black, loyal and disloyal, but they have the right to demand, and they should demand, before intrusting the legislation of the country to the framers and administrators of confederate governments, and to the soldiers who have met their sons on bloody battle-fields, ample security for the rights of loyal men of every race, and for the money loaned the country in its hour of need to arm, clothe, feed, equip, and pay the defenders of the Republic.

Sir, politicians and presses are flippantly denouncing the Congress of the United States, and branding nine tenths of the men who placed the present Administration in power as radicals. For more than thirty years there has been a class of men in our country who have instinctively clung to every lingering wrong and wailed over every rotten institution as it fell. Have these political Bourbons yet to learn that for the past thirty years the patriotism, freedom, justice, humanity, and the progressive development of the Republic, have been represented by the radicals? Have they forgotten that for thirty years, on every issue before the country, the radicals have been vindicated by events and by the verdict of history? Surely gentlemen who prate of their conservatism cannot have forgotten the glorious facts that the radicals never plotted; never betrayed the cause of freedom; never fired upon the flag of their country; never murdered the country's defenders. Have these conservative gentlemen forgotten what the world will ever remember, that the radicals never imprisoned women for teaching little children to read God's holy Word; never lashed on the bare back laboring white men for expressing the opinion that it would be better for workmen if slavery did not exist; never murdered editors nor hung ministers of the living God for questioning the divinity of slavery; never seized and stuffed ballot-boxes to overrule the will of a free people; never reddened the midnight skies with the sacked and burning dwellings of a harmless race; nor never gave halls for free discussion, nor asylums for orphan children to the flames. Yes, sir, let it ever be remembered that during the past generation the denounced and branded radicals, moving in harmony with the eternal forces of nature and God, have achieved glorious victories and won enduring triumphs in all the struggles for country, for the rights of man, for justice, for humanity, and for Christian civilization. While timid conservatism has ever retreated from one lost battle for old abuses to another, radicalism has met every demand of slavery, of injustice, and of treason with a prompt and emphatic "No," and moved right on to assured victories—victories that history will record and coming generations will remember. In the struggles of the present and the future, wherever there is a wrong to be righted, a grievance to be redressed, or a right to be vindicated, conservative presses and conservative politicians will find that the radicals will go into the contest with the light of past victories on their faces.

Sir, let conservative gentlemen who are ever boastfully vaunting their conservatism remember that the crimes against country, against liberty, against justice, and against humanity that have marked the past thirty years in America, were committed in the name of conservatism. Let conservative gentlemen remember that conservatives trampled down for years in Congress the sacred right of petition and the freedom of speech; arraigned before the bar of the House of Representatives the illustrious Adams, and censured the fearless Giddings; manacled colored seamen on the decks of Massachusetts ships, and expelled their counsel, the aged Samuel Hoar, from South Carolina; annexed Texas to make slavery perpetual, and opposed the admission of free California; rejected the prohibition of slavery in New Mexico and Utah, and enacted the fugitive slave law; repealed the prohibition of slavery in Kansas, enacted slave codes, murdered free State settlers and framed Lecompton constitutions; struck down a Senator on the floor of the Senate and fired upon the flag covering bread for the starving garrison of Sumter; organized treason and plunged the nation into civil war; plotted insurrection in the secret councils of the Knights of the Golden Circle and fired orphan asylums in the city of New York; slaughtered the captured garrison of Fort Pillow and sacked and burned defenseless Lawrence; starved Union prisoners at Andersonville, and assassinated the Chief Magistrate of the Republic. Every crime for a generation against liberty and the rights of man in America has been committed by men who vaunt their conservatism and denounce the advocates of freedom, justice and humanity as reckless agitators and radicals. Conservatism has come to be a word in the political vocabulary of America synonymous with cowardice, treachery, baseness, and crime. It is a word every man in America should blush to use as a word descriptive of any decent political organization.

Mr. President, the House, the Senate, the Cabinet, the President, each and all should not now forget to remember that they were clothed with authority by a party inspired by patriotism and liberty, a party that proclaims as its living faith the sublime creed of the equal rights of man and the brotherhood of all humanity, embodied in the New Testament and in the Declaration of Independence. Let Representatives, Senators, Cabinet ministers, and the President, amid the trials and temptations of the present, fully realize that the great Republican party, embracing in its ranks more of moral and intellectual worth than was ever embodied in any political organization in any age or in any land, was created by no man or set of men, that it was brought into being by Almighty God to represent the higher and better sentiments of Christian America, to bear the flag of patriotism and liberty, of justice and humanity. Brought into being in 1864 to resist the repeal of the prohibition of slavery in Kansas and Nebraska, the further expansion of slavery into the depths of the continent, and the longer domination of the slave power, it has for twelve years, in defeat and in victory, ever been true to country, ever faithful to its flag, ever devoted to the rights of struggling humanity. No political party in any country or in any age has fought on a plain so lofty, or achieved so much for country, republican institutions, the cause of freedom, of justice, and of Christian civilization. If it should perish now in the pride of strength and of power, by the hand of suicide, or by the follies or treacheries of men it has generously trusted, it will leave to after times a brilliant record of honor and of glory. The enduring interests of the regenerated nation, the rights of man, and the elevation of an emancipated race alike demand that the great Union Republican party, the outgrowth and development of advancing civilization in America, shall continue to administer the Government it preserved, and frame the laws for the nation it saved.

Sir, I trust this resolution will pass; that the policy of the Senate and House of Representatives will be settled.

Mr. SHERMAN. I dislike to interrupt the Senator from Massachusetts, but I should like to address the Senate about ten minutes on a matter personal to the Chief Justice, if he will allow me that time before the vote is taken.

Mr. WILSON. I will close in a few moments.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well.

Mr. WILSON. When the policy of Congress shall be determined, I hope the committee will report at the earliest possible day upon the condition of the States, and especially upon the condition of Tennessee. When the facts are before us, I trust the Senate will proceed to act with calmness and dignity, uninfluenced by anything that may have been said or done elsewhere. We have indeed fallen upon evil times, when a Senator or Representative can rise unrebuked in these Chambers and tell us what the President of the United States will or will not do.

Sir, there was a time when a Senator who should have said what we have recently heard on this floor would have sunk into his seat under the withering rebuke of his associates. No Senator or Representative has a right to tell us what the Executive will do. The President acts upon his own responsibility. We are Senators; this is the Senate of the United States, and it becomes us to maintain the rights and the dignity of the Senate of the United States. The people demand that their Senators and Representatives shall enact the needed measures to restore, at the earliest possible day, the complete practical relations of the seceded States to the national Government and protect the rights and liberties of all the people without regard to color, race, or descent. I confess, Mr. President, that I am saddened at the present aspects of public affairs; but I am confident that the nation will pass through the trials that thicken around us. God has not carried the country through this great struggle to abandon it now. I have faith in the people, faith in the eminent men, civil and military, who have carried us triumphantly through this great civil war. Two years ago, in a trying hour of the country, we placed a great soldier at the head of all our armies and he led those armies to victory and the country to peace. Perhaps a patriotic and liberty-loving people, if disappointed in their aspirations and their hopes, may again turn to that great captain and summon him to marshal them to victory.

SPEECH OF HON. B. F. LOAN,

OF MISSOURI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 3, 1866,

On the relation of the rebel States to the Government, and the duty of the Government in reestablishing the Union.

Mr. LOAN said:

Mr. SPEAKER: The absorbing question that demands the attention of national authority at this time, relates to national unity. Discord and civil war have divided our unhappy country, and threatened its destruction. Guided by an insane and malignant purpose, eleven States, in violation of all law, formally renounced their allegiance to this Government and organized for themselves separate de facto governments, and attempted to achieve their independence by war. After four years of civil war such as no other nation could endure and live, the rebel armies surrendered and the contest upon the battle-field for the dismemberment of the Republic has ceased for the present. The rebels yielded, not because they were willing to surrender the cause for which they fought, not because they repented of their treason, not because they desired to return to their allegiance, but because they were exhausted and overwhelmed by an irresistible force. "Defeated but not conquered, subdued but not subjugated," their determination to destroy this Government and to erect another on its ruins, the chief corner-stone of which is to be African slavery, remains as fixed and steadfast as it was when they embarked in rebellion in 1860-1. The decision of war to which they first appealed having been given against them, they seek to transfer the contest to the Halls of the grand council of the nation, into which their chosen agents are now demanding admission, and where it is hoped, if they can once enter, they can by diplomacy and fraud achieve that success which they failed to secure by force. In relation to this matter our action should be guided by the utmost prudence; we cannot afford to make any blunders. In the physical conflict the disasters resulting from incapacity, cowardice, or disloyalty, could be repaired. They only incurred the unnecessary waste of treasure and the loss of the lives of a greater, or less, number of our patriotic fellow-citizens, who were freely offering themselves as sacrifices upon the altar of their country's safety. But here a mistake would probably prove fatal. We are the chosen few to whom has been confided, under God, the destiny of this great Republic, not for a day, nor for a year, but for all time; and what we do is irrevocable and earns for us an imperishable fame, or damns us to eternal infamy.

If we have the intelligence and manhood to act in the interests of universal liberty and the inalienable rights of man, untold generations will bless our memories for having secured them the liberty they enjoy. But if we suffer ourselves to yield to the seduction of apparent peace, and in our haste to restore the rebels to amicable relations with this Government, we forget the rights of humanity, and ignore justice in reestablishing the Union of these States, we will only be remembered to be scorned and despised as the betrayers of a sacred trust.

In the contest through which we have just passed more than three hundred thousand of the bravest and the best of our fellow-citizens have willingly laid down their lives, that the Republic might live. We owe it to themselves, to their widowed wives and orphan children, that the fruits of the victories that cost them and us so much should not be carelessly or recklessly thrown away. While our patriot dead have given so much to their country in the discharge of their duties, ought we to hesitate in the discharge of ours, to make any sacrifice that the interest of the country demands? The honors of place, the blandishments of power, the success of this party or of that, sink into utter insignificance in the presence of such important duties as those are which we are now required to perform.

The times demand the highest patriotism, the most utter abnegation of all personal considerations, the greatest intelligence, and the utmost care. Our gallant armies have well and faithfully performed the part required of them, in the contest waged against the nation's life; it remains for us to perform our part with equal ability, and the same fidelity. To do this successfully requires of us a thorough knowledge of "the situation;" and to this end I propose to add, to what has already been so well said, on the condition of affairs, a few suggestions upon some points which, in my opinion, have not been sufficiently elaborated.

It is very desirable that we should ascertain, if possible, the precise relation, in fact, as well as in law, which the revolted States bear to the Government. At a time prior to the rebellion, they were in law, and in fact, States in this Union, with all the rights and privileges, and under all the obligations that pertain to any and all the States in the Union. Afterwards, they formally, as States, renounced their allegiance to this Government, surrendered all their rights and privileges under it, and declared themselves absolved from all obligations to it. They then proceeded to organize independent governments, State and confederate, and entered into compacts with each other for mutual defense and support, and announced their determination to maintain their independence by acts of war. Had our Government acquiesced in what they did, and "accepted the situation" and "let them alone," as they desired we should do, the rebellion they inaugurated would have become a successful revolution. The separation of the rebel States from the nation would have been final and complete, and the confederate government would have been as thoroughly established as was ours when Great Britain accepted the result of the seven years' war of the Revolution. Dismemberment, or war, was the alternative that the action of the rebels offered to the Republic. Hence it appears that the only rights that the Government could assert over that part of the national domain, which was included within the rebel States and over the inhabitants there, were just those that it could acquire by force of arms. The rebels had effected a dissolution of the Union in fact, but not in law.

In this connection it becomes material to inquire whether a dissolution of the union of the States would, as some contend, necessarily destroy the Government. On this point I am inclined to think that many are led into serious error in supposing the phrase "the Union" and "the Government" to be synonymous to express the national authority. Such is not the case. They are very different and distinct things. The Union is subordinate to the Government, and the Government may exist independent of the Union. The union of States in 1800 was not the same union of States that existed in 1820, nor was that the union of States that existed in 1840. During each period new States were added, but the Government remained the same, only enlarged and increased by its growth as the boy grows into manhood, and yet retaining the same individuality. The Union may be enlarged or diminished. States may be admitted into it or taken out of it, as by the conquest of a foreign Power, by treason or otherwise, without necessarily destroying the Government or our existence as a nation. Consequently when eleven States entered the chaos of rebellion, withdrew their representatives from the Halls of Congress, and inaugurated civil war, the Union of these States was, de facto, as much dissolved as it would have been if the rebels had proved victorious in the war and we had acknowledged their independence. Since the revolt of these States they have held no political relations to the Federal Government other than those of rebellious subjects. The Government exists without them. The Executive of the nation administers the law in the appointed forms. The supreme judicial tribunal of the nation holds its regular sessions as prescribed by law, and the Legislature of the nation holds its regular sessions and makes laws for the Republic entirely unaided by any representatives from the revolted States. At the time appointed by law the loyal people elected a President and Vice President for the nation. It having been previously declared by law that participation on the part of the States in rebellion in the formation of the Electoral College was not necessary for a valid election of those officers, and our President to-day holds his office in consequence of an election by a college of electors formed in pursuance of that law. The dissolution of the Union effected by the rebels in 1861 continues to this day. The political relations of those States to the Government have not been restored, and their right to representation in these Halls is not yet recognized. But this dissolution of the Union, however disastrous it may prove to the traitors and rebels who effected it, did not in the least impair the right of the nation to exercise its authority over all its territory and over all its subjects. The thief who steals a horse and runs off with him changes de facto the possession of the horse from the owner to the thief, but such change does not impair the owner's right to pursue the thief and recover possession of his property, nor will it avail the thief when tried for the larceny to deny that he stole the horse, because the theft was in violation of law and is therefore a nullity.

Notwithstanding the rebels had effected a dissolution of the Union of the States, the vitality and the energy of the Government remained, and it was the national authority that opposed war to rebellion, not, as has been frequently said, for the maintenance of the Union, not to compel the revolting States to accept and enjoy the rights and privileges of States in the Union, but for the maintenance of national supremacy and to preserve the integrity of the Republic. National safety imperatively requires us to preserve our national boundaries intact. We could not safely permit a foreign flag to float over the peninsula of Florida nor over the mouth of the Mississippi river—that great outlet to the markets of the world for the inhabitants of those great States that lie in and around the basin of that river. And therefore the nation purchased those provinces with the common treasure for the national benefit, and not for the especial convenience and advantages of the inhabitants thereof. So, when the rebels undertook to divide our territory, change our boundaries, and establish a foreign government on our borders, it was to prevent them from succeeding that induced us to make war upon them, and not a desire to whip them into the Union for their good. After four years of war success crowned our efforts, and the flag of the Republic floats in triumph over every foot of territory that ever belonged to the national domain. Organized rebel armies have all been dispersed, and organized rebel governments have disappeared, it is to be hoped, forever. It would hardly seem possible that any question could arise as to the authority that should control the future political destiny of these rebel districts; but strange as it may appear, it is considered by some whose opinions are entitled to great weight to be a debatable question whether the subdued rebels or the lawfully constituted legislative authority of the Republic that still holds those districts in the iron grasp of military power shall determine their relations to and their rights under the Government.

There are those who insist that the relations of the revolted States to the Federal Government are of such a mysterious and wonderful power that they cannot be destroyed; that the Federal Government is powerless to change them; that the war they made upon the Republic had no effect upon them; that the ordinances of secession passed by them and the establishment of a de facto rebel government did not in the least impair the rights and privileges of these States as members of the Union. In effect, they maintain the indestructibility of a State which has once been admitted into the Union of States. Once a State always a State is a favorite phrase with such persons. They do not hesitate to tell us that a State in the Union may have a beginning, but that it can never have an end; that its vitality may be impaired, but it cannot be extinguished; that its functions may be suspended, but not destroyed; that its component parts may all be annihilated, yet it will still exist; that all the inhabitants may be hung for treason without working the destruction of the State; all of which I consider to be absurdities so gross and glaring that to attempt a refutation of them would be to oppose argument against unresisting imbecility.

These same persons also tell us that a State cannot commit or incur any forfeiture; that it is only a corporation, and as such "has nobody to be hung or soul to be damned" for the crimes it commits; that its powers, rights, and privileges are self-existent and indestructible; that they may be held in abeyance, but they are ever ready to be called into action by the loyal people of the State without regard to the smallness of their number, and that they can exercise all the powers and perform all the functions belonging to such States; that, unaided by any other authority or power, they have the right and the ability, at their option, to resume their relations with the Federal Government, even against its consent. All of which all loyal men know to be as false and heretical as were the doctrines of State-rights and the other like fallacies that culminated in rebellion. We know that the States, as such, owe allegiance to the Federal Government as the paramount authority; that as States they are represented in the Senate as the people are in this House of the Congress of the United States. If the States that joined in the rebellion had remained faithful as States in the Union, we know there could have been no organization of the people in the interests of treason; and we also know that they formally, as States, renounced their allegiance to the Federal Government, recalled their Senators from the Congress of the United States, and then entered the portals of organized rebellion and disappeared forever.

On their ruins the traitor inhabitants there erected eleven rebel States and they established a central government, known as the confederate States of America, all of which they claimed to be independent of and entirely disconnected with this Government. They declared that they had severed every tie that bound them to it, and for more than four years waged a war against it which, for gigantic proportions, savage barbarity, and wanton cruelty, has no parallel in modern times. In the progress of this war, to enable us to oppose it successfully, and to maintain our just authority over our national domain, it became necessary to proclaim the freedom of all the slaves in the rebel States and to call large numbers of them into our armies. Finally, we succeeded in dispersing the rebel armies, and the confederate government was dissolved, and the armies of the Republic took possession of and still hold all the rebellious territory. The military authorities deposed the rebel governments found there and established military, or, as they are more popularly known, provisional governments, in their places. On the consummation of these happy results the popular mind greatly rejoiced in the fond belief that the war of the great rebellion was closed and the nation saved; and the people hoped for a speedy return to peace, with all its attendant joys and blessings. Never was there a greater mistake nor a more delusive hope. Like the spider, whose web is suddenly swept away, the rebel chieftains, shrewd, wily, and irrepressible, on the dispersion of their armies realized the utter and irretrievable failure of their attempt to divide or destroy this Republic by force, and at once comprehended the necessity for changing their plans. Fraud is the inevitable alternative of those who find themselves too weak to succeed by force, and the rebel leaders have transferred the contest which they waged for the division of the Republic from the battle-field to the political arena. There, in the guise of friends, in the name of loyalty, in the avowed cause of peace, harmony, and union, they have assumed to organize in the late rebellious districts civil State governments, and demand for them the recognition of political relations with the Federal Government as States in the Union, their real object and purpose being to secure a position which will enable them to form political combinations by which they can, as formerly, control the policy of the Government, that they may direct it to national destruction, for they have found it to possess a power that they cannot resist, and one that will control them unless they can destroy it.

Recent events give to these demands and purposes a significance and importance which show them to be more dangerous to the safety of the Republic than were the rebel armies in the days of their most brilliant victories. In this hidden danger, which cannot be seen and appreciated as could the rebel hosts in battle array, lies the greatest peril of the Republic. The utmost caution, the highest statesmanship, and the most devoted patriotism are required to guide safely the ship of state through these impending dangers. A mistake here would probably prove fatal. There is no opportunity for experiment; our action in the premises may be final and conclusive. Let us once permit any of these reconstructed rebel States to resume their political relations with the Federal Government and our power over them as disorganized communities will cease.

They are now without the protection of our Constitution, placed there by their crimes deliberately perpetrated, and we can lawfully deal with them in any way that in our opinion the best interests and the safety of the country may demand. Therefore, before we conclude ourselves by any action in the premises, we should know that the political power in the State seeking recognition is confided exclusively to loyal hands, and that equal privileges and exact justice have been secured by law alike to all loyal citizens. I think I can safely say that Congress could not in the faithful discharge of its duties in relation to those districts recognize the political relations of any States organized therein to the Federal Government until the inhabitants thereof give some evidence of their hatred of treason and of love for their country and its republican institutions, nor until rebel sentiments, rebel flags, rebel generals, rebel valor, rebel memories, and rebel debts are repudiated; nor until the love of justice, law, and order is so firmly ingrafted in the minds of the people as to give unquestioned assurance of an enduring peace.

Timid peace men who are afraid to do right for fear they might do wrong, and the apologists for traitors and rebels, insist that they have done enough to entitle them to be restored to their rights and privileges in the Union. Such men tell us that the rebels have laid down their arms, that they are disposed to acquiesce in the results of the war, and that they are willing to accept the situation. It is true, the rebels laid down their arms when they had no power to retain them any longer; that they are disposed to acquiesce in the results of the war, because they are powerless to do otherwise; and they are willing to accept the situation, because they have no option to refuse it. It is said that the rebels are disposed to be loyal, and are willing to return to their allegiance, but when they come they come in the interests of treason. Without authority of law, conventions were called to organize State governments in the rebellious districts; at the elections held to select delegates to these conventions nearly all the loyal people there were excluded from the polls, and candidates were voted for and elected because of their services in the armies of the rebellion, and of their assured fidelity to the cause of the traitors. In the constitutions they adopted, the political and nearly all the personal rights which this nation stands pledged to guaranty to its colored soldiers and its colored citizens—the only considerable portion of the inhabitants there that is or has recently been loyal to the Republic—are ignored; and standing armies and martial law are yet required to enforce national authority and to protect the loyal people against rebel violence and outrage. In violation of common decency and in contempt of law, these reconstructed rebels have, in many instances, elected as Representatives to this Congress, notorious, defiant rebels, whose infamous career in treachery and crime renders it impossible for them to take the oaths of office prescribed by law without committing perjury.

The allegiance they offer is not based upon a thorough and heartfelt repentance of their treason, nor does it arise from a patriotic devotion to their country, nor from a just pride in its glory and greatness and power. But it is offered in the hope that it will prove the means of affording them another opportunity to again betray the country, and, if possible, to effect its destruction.

Let no one suppose, that in expressing these views, I am opposed to the speedy restoration of the rebel States to their places as States in the Union. I am as anxious as any one can be to see harmonious relations existing between every part of this country. I will allow no feelings of vengeance, or any memories of the past, to interpose to prevent the restoration of amicable relations between the Republic and the States lately in revolt. When the war of the rebellion is closed and peace is proclaimed; when the order establishing martial law in those States shall have been revoked and civil authority established; when loyal citizens from every part of the Republic are protected there by the civil law as distinguished from the military; when the leading traitors who sought the division of the Republic and the destruction of our Government are scorned and despised for their treason, and loyal men are honored and trusted for their fidelity to their country; when these States are organized in the interests of loyalty; when the rights of all citizens are alike protected by the law; when there is no exclusion of any from the ballot-box who may have borne or who are liable to bear arms in defense of our common country—in a word, when they come as loyal States, organized and controlled by loyal men, I shall be ready and willing to receive them into the sisterhood of States, without inquiring how or by what authority they were organized. But they will never come as loyal States so long as unrepentant rebels are permitted to control their political destiny and rule the loyal people there. "Conciliation and kindness" have ever been thrown away when bestowed upon rebels. "Extending confidence to them does not beget confidence in return."

The ordinary motives that govern human action have no application to the rebels. The demon of slavery has corrupted their natures, and they are no longer under human influences. In the war they prosecuted for the destruction of this Government, they disregarded all laws human and divine. Assassination and murder, arson and robbery, were recognized by them as legitimate modes of warfare. Who does not remember the massacre at Lawrence, where they surrounded at daybreak a peaceable town remote from the theater of actual hostilities, and murdered the citizens by hundreds in cold blood, and then sacked and burned the town? And the massacre at Fort Pillow, where the garrison, after having surrendered, were deliberately murdered, some of whom were crucified by nailing them to a cross, and were afterward, while alive, thrown into the flames of burning buildings? Or those still more cruel and heartless atrocities perpetrated at Salisbury, Andersonville, and Libby prisons, where our soldiers by thousands and tens of thousands were compelled to endure the lingering tortures of death by starvation and exposure to the elements? These were not the rash and inconsiderate acts of irresponsible subordinates in the confederate service; but they were the deliberate and well-considered acts of the confederate government, and were authorized and permitted by the general officers in its armies; in many instances the same men who have reorganized the rebel States, and who now control them, and who are asking for them recognition as loyal States in the Union. They assert that they are loyal now, and as a proof of their loyalty they propose to swallow as many of what they facetiously term "our iron-clad oaths" as will satisfy us of the fact.

Bitter experiences in my State have taught the people there the impolicy of trusting to the loyalty of a rebel who offers no better evidence of conversion from treason to loyalty than can be found in the virtue of an "iron-clad" or any other oath.

The late President, whose excellent judgment was frequently warped by the kindness of his heart, fondly believed that a people whom civil war and rivers of blood had divided could, by merely being placed in juxtaposition, be reunited in bonds of amity and friendship, and he determined to try the experiment, and selected our State as the place for the trial.

By his amnesty proclamation, appended to his annual message to Congress in December, 1863, he had invited the rebel soldiers to lay down their arms and return to their homes, promising that they should be protected there on taking the oath prescribed in the proclamation. As the war had been conducted in Missouri with more than ordinary cruelty and outrage on the part of the rebels, those of them who availed themselves of the President's proclamation of amnesty were not received by the Union men on their return home with the utmost kindness; in fact it was dangerous in some localities for them to remain at home, even under the President's promise for their protection. When informed of this fact the President was very desirous that they should have the protection promised them. He therefore permitted the Union men, who at the risk of all that was near and dear to them had been for years, as soldiers under the Union flag, exposing themselves to the bullets of their rebel neighbors in the character of rebel soldiers, bushwhackers, and guerrillas, to be disarmed and the flag taken from them and given, with their arms, to their rebel neighbors who had taken the amnesty oath. When, in the name and on behalf of my outraged fellow-soldiers, I expostulated with him for allowing this great wrong to be committed, he replied that it was a necessity, that there must come a time when the rebels and the Union men would have to live together in harmony and on terms of friendship, when they would have to go to the same mill and the same post office, and to meet at the same ballot-box, and the sooner that time should come the easier it would be for them to resume friendly relations; that as the Union men were not disposed to give protection to returning rebels, and in many instances were inclined to drive them off by force, it was prudent to disarm the Union men and thereby deprive them of the means of driving the armed rebels from their homes. But as such rebels were coming home at intervals and in comparatively small numbers, they would not probably be sufficiently strong to resist the Union men who, although disarmed, might be disposed to drive the rebels out of the country; therefore it was necessary to organize them as soldiers, arm them as such and place them under the protection of the national flag, where he believed the Union men dared not disturb them, and as they had laid down their arms and left the rebel armies, thereby manifesting a desire to live peaceably at home, there was no reason to believe that they would interfere with the Union men if they would behave themselves, and thus peace would be secured to all parties.

The theory was plausible and speaks well for the kindness of the heart that suggested it. But in practice it proved to be only another illustration of the folly of warming into life a poisonous snake, under the delusion that with returning strength its disposition to inflict injury and death would cease. It is hardly necessary to add that the experiment was a failure. The State government approved of the President's plan of arming the returned rebels and their sympathizers, and aided him in doing it. The rebels were thus virtually supported by the confederate, national, and State governments in their opposition to the Union men. In this condition of affairs but one alternative was left them. What they did in this crisis, or how it was done, are matters not necessary to be repeated here. Suffice it to say, that the State and its government are now in the possession of loyal men, and that every rebel and every rebel sympathizer within the State is permanently disfranchised by provisions in its constitution, and that peace, prosperity, and happiness dwell within her borders.

In dealing with the revolted States, let us profit by this experience, and let us also give practical application to the statements so frequently repeated, "that treason is a crime," "that none but loyal men must govern the country," and "that rebels must take back seats;" to do this effectually, we must see that the disloyal are permanently disfranchised. There should be no understanding that their disabilities might be removed in the future; it is enough for them that they are permitted to live safely in a country, in which nearly every household to-day mourns the loss of some dear relative, whose death was occasioned by their infamous crimes. All loyal men in those States must be enfranchised without regard to color. Those races who bear arms to defend a Republic must be allowed to participate in its Government.

A military necessity required us to emancipate the negro and accept his services as a soldier that the Republic might be saved. We all remember when victory after victory was crowning the rebel armies on almost every battle-field and the armies of the Republic were ingloriously retiring before the advancing banners of rebellion, that national peril compelled us to proclaim the freedom of the slave and call him to our aid. Before the ranks of our armies had been swelled by two hundred thousand of these colored soldiers the tide of victory was changed, the rebel armies suffered defeat after defeat in rapid succession until they were finally dispersed and the war ended. The services of our soldiers are no longer required to defend the country; it now becomes a political necessity to preserve the fruits of our victories and to secure a permanent peace that we confide the ballot to the hands of all our loyal citizens before we take from them as soldiers the implements of war.

The ballot is the freeman's only safety in this country when he is deprived of the ballot. The ballot and peace or the bullet and war are the alternatives between which the Republic must choose.

In conclusion permit me to say that in all our action relating to the restoration of the Union of these States we should carefully avoid all compromises with wrong, oppression, and injustice. We should resolve to stand firmly by the right, and when the Union is reorganized let it be on the basis of universal freedom and universal suffrage for all loyal men.

SPEECH OF HON. W. SAULSBURY,

OF DELAWARE,

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

March 6, 1866.

The Senate having under consideration the joint resolution (H. R. No. 51) proposing to amend the Constitution of the United States—

Mr. SAULSBURY said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: As I understand that there are one or two other Senators who intend to speak on this subject, if it is agreeable to them to address the Senate to-day, I will with pleasure yield the floor. If no one else is prepared to go on I will proceed to make some remarks upon this resolution. And yet, I confess, Mr. President, that never since I have been a member of this body have I felt so little disposition to participate in its debates. Coming into public life at a time when the mind of the country was excited upon great sectional issues, when the spirit of party was at its height, I felt it my duty then by such feeble utterance as I could make and by my votes in this body to do all I could to allay sectional animosities and the spirit of party, and to prevent so far as I could in my feeble way the opening of that bloody scene which we have so recently and for four long years witnessed. Foreseeing, then, that unless reason could resume its throne and passion and madness cease their hold upon the public mind, war must be the result, and believing, then, as experience has proved, that war was disunion, I felt it a duty which I owed to myself, to my State, and to my country, to do all that I could to avert the calamities of war. But, sir, war came, and with it consequences which perhaps those who advocated it did not anticipate. In witnessing the results of that war I am reminded of some utterances by a very distinguished writer upon constitutional law. Says Mr. Rawle:

"Natural life and political existence alike give way at the appointed measure of time, and the birth, decay, and extinction of empires only serve to prove the tenacity and illusion of the deepest schemes of the statesman and most elaborate theories of the philosopher."

Sir, the examples of all ancient republics awaken a doubt in the mind of the philosophical and thoughtful student whether it is possible for a purely republican form of government permanently to endure. Nor does modern history afford much encouragement for hope; for of all the republics which have existed in Europe in modern times, one, and only one, remains; and every republic founded upon this continent to-day is but a republic in name, and the great Republic of the United States of America is no exception to this general remark. For what is the proposition now before this body? Does it not show that the Republic founded by our fathers does not this day exist? Where are eleven of the States that composed in part the Federal Union? Where are twenty-two Senators who have a right to a voice in this body to-day? Excluded from participation in the deliberations of this body and in the councils of the nation, and excluded for a purpose—a purpose to pass in their absence, although their people and the States which they are entitled to represent are to be seriously affected by this proposed legislation, this measure in this body by less than the constitutional vote.

Sir, I come not here to reflect unjustly upon any member of this body or upon any party in this body, but truth demands the utterance that for the accomplishment of mere party purposes, regardless of the great interests of the whole American people, a committee of fifteen has been appointed by this Congress who in fact control the legislation of this Chamber and of the House of Representatives, and all they have to do is to meet in secret with closed doors, (the public eye not watching their deliberations or consultations,) and walk into this Chamber and into the other House and present a recommendation; and so far, all their recommendations have prevailed, however contrary to the spirit of the Constitution and destructive of the rights and liberties of the people.

Now, sir, if there be any other object for the presentation of such a proposition as that now before the Senate than that which I have named—the accomplishment of a party purpose—I should like some one to tell me what that object is. Why, sir, it was distinctly avowed in the House of Representatives that the object of this resolution was to deny to the southern States that voice in the legislation of the country to which they are entitled by the Constitution as it now exists.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will suggest to the Senator that it is not in order in this body to allude to the proceedings of the other House.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do not wish to violate the rules of the Senate. I have been one of those unfortunate members of the body who generally have not understood the rules very well, and pay very little attention to mere paper rules so long as I govern myself according to those high principles of honor which should characterize intercourse among gentlemen.

Then, sir, I say it was distinctly avowed by leading Republicans, but I do not say where, that one of the objects of keeping out southern representatives from legislation in these Halls was to pass measures of this character in their absence which could not be passed if they were present, and thus to deprive that section of the country of its equal representation according to the Constitution as it now exists; and it was said that if this was not done they, uniting with those who have been politely, and I was about to say gentlemanly, termed "copperheads," would control the politics of the country in the future.

SENATE.

Mr. President, we all know that there was a time when the States of this Union were equal. There was a time when the Federal Constitution did not exist, and when the States of this Union being all equal, all separate, all independent, all, according to the second of the Articles of Confederation, having reserved to themselves absolute sovereignty, met together in council to form a more perfect Union; and one of the most difficult subjects requiring their deliberation, and which came as near almost as any other preventing the formation of that Constitution and the permanent establishment of that Union, was this very question of taxation and representation. As has been often said in this Chamber and elsewhere, one of the great compromises of the Constitution was this very compromise of taxation according to representation. The proposition now, however, is to deny that equal representation and to make taxation unequal. As the clause of the Constitution now stands it reads thus:

"Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union according to their respective numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three fifths of all other persons."

The proposition now before the Senate is:

Representation shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union according to the respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed: Provided, That whenever the elective franchise shall be denied or abridged in any State on account of race or color, all persons therein of such race or color shall be excluded from the basis of representation.

Now, Mr. President, I wish to make this suggestion and ask this question: whether, if this proposition, now before the Senate, had been made to the delegates of the several States who formed the Constitution, you would ever had the Federal Union?

The proposition is to increase the taxation of the southern people and to decrease their representation. Suppose such a proposition as that had been made in the Convention which framed the Constitution, I ask you, sir, do you believe you would ever have had this Union? Certainly not. You propose—that is the effect of it—by your legislation here, in the absence of the representatives of that section of the country which is mostly to be affected by it, to do an act of injustice which had it been proposed by your fathers in the Convention which framed the Constitution would not have been submitted to, which would have forever prevented the formation of the Federal Union. Then I ask you, why do you do it now? Simply because you have the power, as you suppose, to inflict an unfair and unjust measure upon—yes, I will use the word—a conquered and submissive people; you propose to change the fundamental law at a time when one third of the country, and that the third of the country that is to be affected injuriously by it, have no representative on this floor to speak in behalf of their interests.

Attempt such an injustice toward the States of New York, Pennsylvania, and Ohio, and every hill-top and valley will glitter with the weapons of resistance in the hands of a people acting responsively to the call of liberty as magically as did the Scottish heights at the command of Roderick Dhu.

In discussing questions of this kind, it is proper that we should go back and consider what it was our fathers meant to do in the establishment of this Government, and what kind of a Government it was which they did establish. As I said before, the time was when these States lived under what were called the Articles of Confederation. These Articles of Confederation having been found by experience not sufficient for all the general purposes of the States, they sent delegates to a Convention to frame the Constitution under which we now live. To show you how guarded they were in reference to the character and form of the Government which should be established, how jealous they were of their rights as States, and how jealous they were of the spirit of liberty, I ask your attention for one moment to a few of the instructions which they gave to their representatives:

"The powers to these deputies were the following: "By New Hampshire, 'to discuss and decide upon the most effectual means to remedy the defects of the Federal Union.'"

"Massachusetts, 'in conformity with the resolution of Congress recommending a convention for the sole purpose of revising the Articles of Confederation, to render the Federal Constitution adequate to the preservation of the Union.'"

"Connecticut, 'for the sole and express purpose of revising the Articles of Confederation, to render the Federal Constitution adequate to the exigencies of government and the preservation of the Union.'"

"New York, in the same words.

"New Jersey, 'for the purpose of taking into consideration the state of the Union, as to trade and other important subjects, and of devising such other provisions as shall appear to be necessary to render the Constitution of the Federal Government adequate to the exigencies thereof.'"

"Pennsylvania, 'to devise such alterations and further provisions as may be necessary to render the Federal Constitution fully adequate to the exigencies of the Union.'"

"Delaware, in the same words, with a proviso that each State shall have one vote in Congress.

"Maryland, in the same words, without the proviso.

"Virginia, in the same words. This State passed the first law for appointing delegates to the Convention.

"North Carolina, 'for the purpose of revising the Federal Constitution.'"

"South Carolina, 'to devise such alterations as may be thought necessary to render the Federal Constitution entirely adequate to the actual situation and future good government of the confederated States.'"

"Georgia, 'to devise such alterations as may render the Federal Constitution adequate to the exigencies of the Union.'"

I read these instructions to the delegates to the General Convention for the purpose of showing that the object of the States in sending their delegates to a General Convention in 1787 was not for the purpose of establishing a different kind of Government, but only to perfect the existing Federal Government under the Articles of Confederation, and to make it adequate for the general purposes common to all. And, in fact, this is all the Convention did, if Mr. Madison is to be considered authority. In the fortieth number of the Federalist he remarks:

"We have seen in the new Government, as in the old, the general powers are limited, and that the States in all unenumerated cases are left in the enjoyment of their sovereign and independent jurisdiction. The truth is that the great principles of the Constitution proposed by the Convention may be considered less as absolutely new than as the expansion of principles which are found in the Articles of Confederation."

We know very well that when the delegates met together there was great diversity of opinion among them as to the true nature and character of the Government which should be formed. We had the plan of Mr. Randolph, of Virginia; we had the plan of Mr. Pinckney, of South Carolina; we had the plan of Mr. Hamilton; we had the plan of Mr. Patterson; and we had the more republican and Federal form as presented by Mr. Dickinson, of my own State. During the progress of the debates, and for weeks it was attempted in that Convention to introduce the term "National Legislature," "National Judiciary," "National Executive." Some wished to clothe the Executive with power during good behavior; Mr. Hamilton, the Senate of the United States during good behavior.

Mr. Randolph, of Virginia, offered sundry resolutions even after the word national had been rejected by all the States, proposing, among other things,

"That a national Legislature shall have the right to legislate in all cases in which the harmony of the United States may be interrupted by the exercise of individual legislation, and to negative all laws passed by the several States contravening, in the opinion of the national Legislature, the articles of the Union or any treaty under the Union."

So the controversy among these patriotic fathers went on until some of the members, among others Mr. Lansing, of New York, and Mr. Luther Martin, of Maryland, retired from the Convention, giving up all hope of ever forming such a system of Government as the States would agree to live under. It was then that the representatives from New Hampshire came in. After further deliberation, the Convention came to the conclusion not to form a "national" Government with a "national" Executive, a "national" Legislature, and a "national" Judiciary, but to continue a Federal Government, on the principles of the Articles of Confederation, and hence, instead of incorporating in the Constitution of the United States, as indicating the depositary of legislative power, the word "Parliament" or "national Legislature," they adopted the term "Congress of the United States," which was a fit, apt, and appropriate term to show the nature of the power intended to be deposited, or to be preserved or created in that Constitution by the representatives of sovereign and independent States, and to show the character of that Government, its relations to the States, and the relation of the States to each other.

The relation of the Government formed by the States was that of the creature to the creator, of the common agent to associated principals; and the relation of the States to each other was that of equality. As equal, independent political sovereignties, they agreed in the Constitution which they formed that no State, without its consent, should be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate. This provision manifestly establishes not only the equality of the States, but the indestructibility of one State by the others, and establishes the further fact, which is of the greatest importance at the present time, that this Senate has not, under any pretense whatever, any power on earth, without the consent of a State, to deny such State representation, and equal representation, in the Senate. And here, sir, I take occasion to express my unqualified dissent from the opinion recently expressed on this floor by the Senator from Pennsylvania. [Mr. BUCKALEW,] that this provision of the Constitution, in relation to Senators, can be changed by amendment, if he meant to be understood as saying that such change can be made without the consent of the State to be affected thereby. This is an unalterable compact between the States. The union of England and Scotland, effected by compact, contains stipulations beyond the power of the united Government to alter, especially that in relation to the religion of the latter kingdom. The stipulation in our Constitution referred to is equally beyond the power of the States to alter. The Convention which framed the Constitution considered no questions more thoroughly, nor were any more difficult of adjustment than those of representation and taxation. As a compromise, and the only one upon which they could agree, they declared that—

"Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union, according to their respective numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three fifths of all other persons."

Then, I say, that had the proposition which is now before us been presented to the fathers, it would not have been entertained for a moment. I might go on and cite extracts from the Federalist showing the views of Mr. Madison, Mr. Hamilton, Mr. Jay, the authors of that celebrated work, in reference to the Constitution as finally presented for the consideration of the States, to show that it was only claimed that but a very few powers were delegated to the

SENATE.

Federal Government, and that all other powers except those expressly delegated were reserved to the States or the people; and that according to Mr. Hamilton those powers thus reserved were of the same character and as sovereign in their nature as were the powers delegated to the Federal Government. I shall content myself with reading a very few brief extracts. In the thirty-first number of the Federalist Mr. Hamilton observes:

"The State governments by their original constitutions are invested with complete sovereignty."

In the thirty-second number he remarks:

"An entire consolidation of the States into one complete national sovereignty would imply an entire subordination of the parts, and whatever powers might remain in them would be altogether dependent on the general will. But as the plan of the Convention aimed only at a partial union or consolidation, the State governments would clearly retain all the rights of sovereignty which they before had, and which were not by that act exclusively delegated to the United States. This exclusive delegation, or rather this alienation, of State sovereignty would only exist in three cases: where the Constitution in express terms granted an exclusive authority to the Union; where it granted in one instance an authority to the Union and in another prohibited the States from exercising the like authority; and where it granted an authority to the Union to which a similar authority in the States would be absolutely and totally contradictory and repugnant."

In further explanation of the true character of our Federal system of government, in a departure from the spirit and genius of which the proposition under consideration has its origin, I refer to the views of Mr. Madison, as expressed in the Federalist. He says:

"The powers delegated by the proposed Constitution to the Federal Government are few and defined. Those which are to remain in the State governments are numerous and indefinite. The former will be exercised principally on external objects, as war, peace, negotiation, and foreign commerce, with which last the power of taxation will for the most part be connected. The powers reserved to the several States will extend to all the objects which in the ordinary course of affairs concern the lives, liberties, and properties of the people, and the internal order, improvement, and prosperity of the State."

This kind of a government having been framed, republican in character, Federal and not national in form and substance; and this new Government having started out to take a new position among the nations of the earth, and having prospered and grown beyond the most sanguine expectations of its friends, I come now to trace the causes which led to the unfortunate situation in which we find ourselves, and which situation is made the pretext of the unjust and unconstitutional legislation proposed.

Mr. President, numbering originally three million people and thirteen States, regarding with great strictness and care the fundamental principles of constitutional liberty as they were found in that written Constitution, in a few short years we became the wonder of the world. No people were so happy; for the records of human society do not show such a rapid growth, expansion, and development of any people in so short a time. And to what was it owing? To the free principles of government which our fathers secured for themselves and for their posterity, and a cheerful acquiescence by the great mass of the American people while those fathers lived in those constitutional principles of liberty applicable to the citizen, and those constitutional rights secured to the States as separate and distinct political communities. If to-day I shall appear to travel for a few moments out of what may seem to be the record of this case to notice the causes which have been instrumental in bringing this once happy country into its present lamentable condition, I shall not in fact be traveling out of the record.

Sir, I am tired of sitting in this Chamber and hearing, when a political difference grows up between the Executive of the United States and a portion of his party, those with whom I have acted from early life in political matters called "copperheads," "disunionists," and "traitors." Sir, parrots can repeat words, the meaning of which they have not understanding enough to comprehend. When such words are applied in debate it is high time for those whose political opinions and associations are thus unwarrantably and unjustifiably assailed to turn around and ask who is the traitor and who is the disunionist. I do not propose to apply the term to the masses of any political party. I believe, on the contrary, that there are hundreds and thousands of good and patriotic people in all political parties. Could the great mass of that political party who refused every offer of compromise and rejected every possible mode of adjusting sectional differences have foreseen in 1860 what they have since witnessed, I do not believe that there are very many of that party, even, who would have hazarded and imperiled all that was dear to the American heart, and brought their country to the verge of disruption; ay, sir, to positive, actual disruption. Some of us did think, even then, sir, that we foresaw the consequences which have resulted from that course. We thought that if the storm could be allayed, if the mad passions of the hour could be calmed, it was a patriotic duty which we owed to ourselves, to our country, and to the world to advise peace, reconciliation, and harmony. But, sir, that was not the spirit that then governed the councils of the country. The interests of party were held to be superior to those of the country. There were, however, traitors then prating of patriotism and accusing others of disloyalty as there are disunionists and destructives now who boast of their devotion to the Union and attempt to impeach the patriotic fidelity of others by the use of vulgar epithets. I do not intend, for one, without uttering my protest, to allow gentlemen who for years and years were engaged in a course of political action in itself contrary to the teachings of the fathers and to the just rights of the people, when war rages in the land, or after the war has ceased, to assume for themselves all the patriotism and denounce all those who oppose their measures as being less patriotic than themselves.

Sir, one of the embarrassing questions with which the fathers had to deal in the formation of the Constitution was the subject of domestic slavery. I do not know that there was much sentimental opposition to slavery in those days. I do not know that it was then talked of generally as being so contrary to the Word of God and the rights of man as it is now. It was not so apparent then that it might become necessary for one section of the country to increase its own representation and to decrease the representation of another section by excluding this class from representation, or by a proffered bribe of superior friendship make them political allies, for it could not then have been foreseen that all the States, except the few southern States where slavery recently existed, would be so soon rid of that institution. At the time of the Declaration of Independence every colony was a slaveholding colony, and even at the time of the adoption of the Constitution of the United States every State except one was a slaveholding State, and their delegates met as the representatives of political communities recognizing the relation of master and slave. Hence, being there as the representatives of States making this recognition, they did not find it necessary to get rid of representation according to population, or to exclude from representation all classes and colors who were not allowed to vote.

The Constitution had not long been in existence, however, before there did arise in this country a few pestilent fellows who commenced presenting their petitions to Congress for the abolition of slavery in the States. In 1819 and 1820, by the gradual abolition of the institution of slavery in the northern States—some were so unkind as to say that their slaves were sold down South; I do not know anything about that—sectional power had become so nearly and equally balanced that when Missouri applied for admission into the Union what did we hear? We heard the text from the mouth of Rufus King, of New York, which has been attributed, I believe, to Mr. Seward. Mr. King in that controversy declared that no laws and no constitutions could bind the conscience of the people, and that he would not recognize any such constitutional obligations as those imposed by the Constitution in reference to the rendition of fugitive slaves.

That difficulty, by the wisdom of the distinguished statesman from Kentucky and those who acted with him, was happily adjusted. But, sir, abolitionism was not content. It was comparatively quiet for a few years; but between 1833 and 1838 it convulsed the whole land by the presentation of petitions to Congress to do an unconstitutional act; and when Texas, by the constitutional act of Congress and the Executive of the United States, was admitted into the Union, abolitionism howled and threatened to do just what the southern people have vainly attempted to do. While I am on this matter, though I do not propose to attack any State or the people of any State, but as it is relevant to the question, I propose to read something that was said in another section of the country. I do not wish to make a sectional speech, but I do it for the purpose of showing that if the action of the southern people has been wrong, there are other people in this country who have been criminal also, and therefore when you meet in legislative halls, it should not be to legislate in the spirit of vengeance, but you should take into consideration the circumstances in which those people were placed, and the doctrines which they were taught to believe and the doctrines which you yourselves taught them to believe. Now, sir, when that subject of the annexation of Texas was being agitated, what do we find? We find Massachusetts resolving, as follows:

"Resolved, That the power to unite an independent foreign State with the United States is not among the powers delegated to the General Government by the Constitution of the United States."

"Resolved, That the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, faithful to the compact between the people of the United States, according to the plain meaning and intent in which it was understood and acceded to by them, is sincerely anxious for its preservation, but that it is determined, as it doubts not the other States are, not to submit to undelimited powers in any body of men on earth. That the project of the annexation of Texas, unless arrested on the threshold, may tend to drive these States into a dissolution of the Union, and will furnish new calumnies against republican Governments by exposing the gross contradiction of a people professing to be free, and yet seeking to extend and perpetuate the subjection of their slaves."

I do not quote this in any unkind spirit toward the people of Massachusetts or any other State, for, sir, I was proud when Massachusetts, South Carolina, and all the States were not only in the Union, but represented upon this floor, and if their statesmen uttered sentiments and advanced opinions which did not meet the approval of my judgment, I was not one of those to question their independent right to do so. But I say here that by her legislative resolve, Massachusetts, in 1844, used, in effect, the very same language which the Legislature of South Carolina and the people of the other southern States have used since. But, sir, that is not all. She passed some more resolves in 1845, the first of which I will read:

"Resolved, That Massachusetts has never delegated the power to admit into the Union States or Territories without or beyond the original territory of the States and Territories belonging to the Union at the adoption of the Constitution of the United States; and that in whatever manner the consent of Massachusetts may have been given or inferred to the admission of the States already by general consent forming part of the Union, from such territory, the admission of such States, in the judgment of Massachusetts, forms no precedent for the admission of Texas, and can never be interpreted to rest on powers granted in the Constitution."

The cause that led the South finally to take the fatal step of attempting to secede was the agitation of this slavery question by that portion of the people who were not at all interested in it, and the desire of a few men in the South to break up the Union; for I do not doubt there were such men in the South just as there were in Massachusetts and other sections of the country. I have no doubt there were a few men in both sections who wished to break up the Union for the purpose of breaking it up; but the great mass of either section did not want the Union destroyed. While I am on this subject let me refresh the minds of gentlemen on the other side who choose to give me their attention, and remind them that if the South attempted to secede, you taught them the doctrine. You had advocated it yourselves, and in its advocacy you were just as criminal as they, and in some respects, not only in its advocacy, but by your practical actions, you were just as criminal as they. You say that the southern States had no right to secede. Admit it; I think so, too. You say that they had no right to oppose a constitutional act of Congress. So say I. But, sir, you threatened secession yourselves, and you proclaimed—when I say “you” I mean your people in the northern States—that secession was a constitutional right. The first writer upon the Constitution of the United States, whose work was generally recognized, and which was, until a very late period, if it is not now, the text-book at your Military Academy at West Point, as I am informed, distinctly and plainly announced the right of a State to secede. You placed that book in the hands of the students in your Military Academy, and some of the ablest men in the land proclaimed that the doctrine was true. It was a doctrine the rightfulness of which had never been decided by any authority having the power to execute its decrees.

Before citing Mr. Rawle on this point I will state that the people of the northern States had in fact done the same thing that the people of the southern States have done, except that they did not meet in convention and attempt to repeal the act by which they ratified the Constitution of the United States. But, sir, can you not oppose the law and the Constitution without repealing your ratification of the Constitution? If the people of the southern States used force in asserting their right to oppose Federal authority, and you have done the same, what is the difference? During the existence of the fugitive slave law, a law enacted by the law-making power of the land, recognized by the judicial tribunals of the States and of the United States to be constitutional and binding, did you not oppose it? What, allow such an act as that to be executed within the limits of the northern States! It was sometimes executed and it was sometimes opposed, and opposed by force, and blood sometimes ran down your streets in the attempt to execute that law. In this aspect of the case the difference between portions of the northern people and a portion of the southern people was not a difference in principle; it was only a difference to the extent of the exercise of the power of resistance; the principle was the same in both cases, and it was as fully treasonable in Massachusetts, Ohio, or Wisconsin to oppose by force the execution of that law as it was in South Carolina to fire on Fort Sumter.

We know there were men in all sections of the country who honestly believed in the right of a State to secede. You did not, sir; nor do I; but I will show you who did. Mr. Rawle, in his day the great lawyer of Pennsylvania, and who was offered by Mr. Jefferson more than once the office of Attorney General of the United States and declined it, in his work upon the Constitution, says this:

“The Union is an association of the people of republics; its preservation is calculated to depend on the preservation of those republics. The people of each pledge themselves to preserve that form of government in all. Thus each becomes responsible to the rest, that no other form of government shall prevail in it; and all are bound to preserve it in every one. But the mere compact, without the power to enforce it, would be of little value. Now, this power can be nowhere so properly lodged as in the Union itself. Hence the term guarantee indicates that the United States are authorized to oppose, and, if possible, prevent every State in the Union from relinquishing the republican form of government, and, as auxiliary means, they are expressly authorized and required to employ their force on the application of the constituted authorities of each State ‘to repress domestic violence.’ If a faction should attempt to subvert the government of a State for the purpose of destroying its republican form, the paternal power of the Union could thus be called forth to subdue it. Yet it is not to be understood that its interposition would be justifiable if the people of a State should determine to retire from the Union, whether they adopted another or retained the same form of government, or if they should, with the express intention of seceding, expunge the representative system from their code, and thereby incapacitate themselves from concurring, according to the mode now prescribed, in the choice of certain public officers of the United States. “The principle of representation, although certainly the wisest and best, is not essential to the being of a republic; but to continue a member of the Union it must be preserved, and therefore the guarantee must be so construed. It depends on the State itself to retain or abolish the principle of representation, because it depends on itself whether it will continue a member of the Union. To deny this right would be inconsistent with the principle on which all our political systems are founded, which is, that the people have in all cases a right to determine how they will be governed.”

I refer to this, not because I hold to the doctrine of secession, or ever did, or ever uttered such a sentiment, but to show that in his day the ablest writer upon constitutional law in this country, and whose work you placed in your Military Academy, held distinctly and unequivocally to the right of a State to secede. I cite it not to say that it is true, but to make an appeal to this Senate, to you, sir, and to the country, that if men have been taught by the ablest writers upon constitutional law to believe it, if it was a common belief among the people in one section, and if it was adopted and avowed by whole States in the other section of the country, and they unhappily, having erringly essayed the ways of secession, now find themselves unsuccessful and helpless, but honest in their conviction of right, it is no cause for vengeance at your hands; and because they have acted upon their honest belief of right, you have not a right to come into the Congress of the United States and deny them equal representation according to the Constitution, and to impose upon them unjust and unequal taxation. Happy, sir, would they be to be here, through their representatives, in peace, acting in harmony with you. In the spirit of vengeance and for the purpose of retaining political power in your hands against the will of the people, you unconstitutionally bar these doors against those representatives and impose upon them unjust burdens, and deprive them of clear constitutional rights.

Sir, your leading men, as well as those of their section, taught them that this doctrine was a true doctrine. You taught it to them in the council chambers of the nation. We hear a great deal of censure with reference to the southern gentlemen who avowed this doctrine upon this floor and the floor of the other House; but, sir, in some portions of the other section of the country they have idolized men who have preached the same doctrine, as I will proceed to show. When the question of the admission of Louisiana into the Union was before the House of Representatives in 1811, Mr. Josiah Quincy, an able Representative from Massachusetts, in opposing it, said:

“To me, it appears that it would justify a revolution in this country, and that in no great length of time may produce it.”

Under the sanction of this rule of conduct, I am compelled to declare it as my deliberate opinion that, if this bill passes, the bonds of this Union are virtually dissolved; that the States which compose it are free from their moral obligations, and that, as it will be the right of all, so it will be the duty of some, to prepare definitely for a separation—amicably if they can, violently if they must.”

What did the southern gentlemen when they were in this Hall say more than that? And yet Mr. Quincy was never visited by his section of the country with any dire punishment or any mark of disapprobation for uttering this doctrine. Having shown that the course pursued by the citizens of the southern States was a course having the approval of their leading men, and that the same doctrine had the approval of leading men in other sections of the country, I have accomplished my purpose, it being simply to ask you, if that be true, whether they are in such a condition as to merit a further visitation of punishment even if you had the power to inflict it after what they have already suffered?

While referring to the work of Mr. Rawle, I wish to notice for a moment one ground upon which authority is claimed for this kind of legislation. It is said that Congress by the Constitution is bound to guaranty to every State a republican form of government. Mr. Rawle says that when a State resolves to go out of the Union, that clause does not apply. Let us see whether it does or not. It is claimed that you have authority to pass this joint resolution because the southern States withhold the right of voting from the negro population, and that Congress have a right to withhold representation in Congress from a State, or the adhering States, upon the basis provided for in the Constitution until the right of suffrage shall by authority of such State be extended to all the inhabitants of such State without distinction of race or color, and that this right in Congress is founded in or based upon its authority and duty under the Constitution of guarantying to each State a republican form of government; no government being, according to the opinion of the advocates of this theory, republican in form under which universal suffrage is denied. Indeed, so wild and extravagant has opinion become in radical circles in reference to this question, that it is gravely contended by some that Congress can by simple legislative enactment declare that all persons without any sort of distinction shall be entitled to the full and free enjoyment of the elective franchise within a State.

The words of the Constitution are, “The United States shall guaranty to every State in the Union a republican form of government.” What is the true meaning of this provision of the Constitution? By it a legal relation is created, and by it a contract is formed. There are parties to that relation or contract; those parties are the United States as guarantor and the State as guarantee. This relation necessarily creates an obligation in reference to the United States, and imposes a duty upon them. It also gives the right to a State to demand, whenever the necessity shall exist, the discharge of that obligation and the performance of that duty. But who is to determine when this duty is to be performed? Is the guarantor to make haste to redeem his pledge when the guarantee is perfectly satisfied? Is he to pay before demand, before notice, and when his kind offices are respectfully declined? If a portion of the people of a State in the Union shall attempt, or if any extraneous power shall attempt, to subvert the republican form of government in such State, the United States shall upon application of the legal authorities of such State, see to it that its republican form of government shall be maintained.

But suppose the entire people of a State, speaking through their State organization, their regularly constituted authorities, say, “We do not want a republican form of government.” Suppose your State (Connecticut,) New York, or any other State says so, what are the United States to do? You answer, send an army there and make them have it. We are bound to force republicanism upon a people whether they desire or disdain it. If they do not want it, we will whip it into them. Do you not see that this is destructive of the very essence of republicanism, which consists of freedom of choice? Sir, I always thought that the existence of the guarantee asking the performance of duty and the discharge of obligation was as necessary in law as the existence of the guarantor. Sir, this clause of the Constitution was never meant to be applied to a case like that we are now considering. It was meant to protect a State against the violence of faction, against the attempt of a portion of the people of a State combining together or acting in conjunction with others not of the State to subvert its republican form of government while such State was a member of the Union or desired to maintain its relations to the Federal Government. The framers of the Constitution were too deeply read in history not to know that all Governments were liable to internal commotions, to convulsions, and to disruptions. They doubtless supposed it possible that this Government might be subjected to dangers of this character. But, sir, they did not provide specifically in the Constitution against the attempt by one third of the States to withdraw themselves from the Federal Union or for the employment of military force by the adhering States, acting through the agency of the Federal Government, to compel adherence by the other States to the Federal Union. In fact, it may safely be asserted that the framers of the Constitution, if we are to judge of their meaning by the just interpretation of their language in the exposition of that instrument, anticipated and justified the use of force on the part of the State governments to repel usurpations on the part of the Federal Government should such attempts at usurpation be made. Says Mr. Hamilton, (Federalist, No. 28:)

"It may safely be received as an axiom in our political system, that the State governments will, in all possible contingencies, afford complete security against invasions of the public liberty by the national authority. Projects of usurpation cannot be masked under pretenses so likely to escape the penetration of select men as of the people at large.

"The Legislatures will have better means of information; they can discover the danger at a distance, and possessing all the organs of civil power and the confidence of the people, they can at once adopt a regular plan of opposition in which they can combine all the resources of the community. They can readily communicate with each other in the different States, and unite their common forces for the protection of their common liberty."

Again, in the Federalist, No. 45, Mr. Hamilton remarks:

"But ambitious encroachments of the Federal Government on the authority of the State governments would not excite the opposition of a single State or of a few States only. They would be signals of general alarm. Every government would espouse the common cause. A correspondence would be opened. Plans of resistance would be concerted. One spirit would animate and conduct the whole. The same combination, in short, would result from an apprehension of the Federal as was produced by the dread of a foreign yoke; and unless the projected innovations should be voluntarily renounced, the same appeal to a trial of force would be made in the one case as was made in the other. But what degree of madness could ever drive the Federal Government to such an extremity?"

Sir, we unhappily have witnessed and suffered from this exhibition of madness on the part of both the State and Federal Governments; and to-day we are dealing with questions of the most momentous character resulting from the indulgence of this spirit of madness. Relieved from the horrors of the battle-field, we find ourselves in the midst of a frightful civil revolution, that threatens the destruction of our very system of government. If the attempts of the revolutionists are not thwarted they will pull down the pillars of the Constitution and convert the once free Republic of the United States into the worst despotism on earth.

But to return. A republican government may exist and be a very different sort of government from that under which we have lived. There are many different kinds of republics, and one Senator has enlightened us by reading from all the old musty books he could find in the Congressional Library definitions of republican governments, under the supposition, I suppose, that when the clause was placed in the Constitution that the United States should guaranty to every State a republican form of government, its framers meant they should not guaranty to the States the kind of old republics that used to exist, and not even the kind of governments that existed in the States when the Constitution was formed. Why, Mr. President, do you suppose the framers of that Constitution, when they made it, did not suppose they themselves were living under a republican form of government? Did they mean by placing that guarantee in the Constitution, to guaranty to the States another kind of republican form of government, or one having more extensive privileges of a republican character, than the one existing at the time? In those days, in many of the States, there was a property qualification for voting, and negroes were excluded in most, if not all of them, and notwithstanding the very framers of the great model Republic themselves lived in States recognizing this inequality of rights, we have some of the advocates of this joint resolution placing it upon the ground, when asked for the constitutional authority to enact it, that Congress has a right, under that clause of the Constitution, that the United States shall guaranty to every State a republican form of government, to pass this resolution. The proposition is too absurd for argument.

This brings me to notice for a few minutes what is the true situation of these southern States, what are the rights of the people, and whether they have any rights. I know that I differ on this subject with not only gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber, but I have no doubt I differ with many gentlemen with whom I act politically. In 1862, in a speech on confiscation in this body, when it was dangerous for men to utter their honest sentiments, even in the Senate Hall and in the Hall of the House of Representatives, I took the ground that a State had no constitutional right to secede from the Federal Union, and that if it had any right of resistance at all it did not arise under the Constitution, but independently of it, and only when evils became so insufferable that it would be better to resort to war to redress them than to further bear them. I maintained then the doctrine which I maintain now, and as I escaped a fort and bastille then for the utterance, I presume now, since there is no further use for Fort La Fayette and Fort Delaware and Fort McHenry under the more enlightened present administration of the country than of the late one, I may repeat a doctrine which I then held, and which I believe to be founded in correct principles of law, that if the State had no right to secede, but did secede, or half a dozen or a dozen States seceded and established a government having the power to enforce its commands and to punish disobedience to its commands; the Government of the United States being the Government de jure and that other government thus wrongfully established, if you please, being the government de facto; the Government of the United States not having the power to protect the people of those States from the consequences of disobedience to the command of the government de facto, and the government de facto having power to punish them if they did not yield obedience, it was not treason in the people of those States, being thus circumstanced, to act in obedience to the commands of a government de facto; the Government de jure withholding its protection from them, it was not treason in those people in the eye of the law, and that upon a fair trial before any impartial tribunal in any State of this Union a man so circumstanced could not legally be convicted of treason.

I say nothing in reference to the men who set a revolution in motion; who attempt to revolutionize and break up a Government; but, sir, there never was any people on earth yet, the whole of whom were traitors and ought to be punished as traitors. Men who deliberately plot the destruction of a Government, and make war upon a Government by uniting with mobs or great masses of men, and not acting under the commands of a Government that can compel their obedience, may be liable to the penalties of treason, and are liable to the penalties of treason; but the great mass of the people living under a Government, although wrongfully established, having the power to punish them if they refuse to obey its commands, and yielding obedience to authority and power which they cannot resist, are not traitors; and so it has been decided before this civil war was fought, or even before your Constitution was framed. The doctrine is older than Blackstone, and is cited by him as law. His language, volume four, page 221, is:

"A usurper who has got possession of the throne is a king within the meaning of the statute, as there is a temporary allegiance to him for his administration of the Government and temporary protection of the public; and, therefore, treasons committed against Henry VI were punished under Edward IV though all the line of Lancaster had previously been declared usurpers by act of Parliament. When, therefore, a usurper is in possession, the subject is excused and justified in obeying and giving his assistance; otherwise, under a usurpation, no man would be safe if the lawful prince had a right to hang him for obedience to the power in being, as the usurper would certainly do for disobedience."

I invite you to turn your attention at your leisure to Dallas's Reports, and you will find—I will not say the volume is full of such cases, but you will find many cases of this character: when Pennsylvania set up an independent government for herself and renounced allegiance to George III; when she established a government of her own, and even before she united with the other colonies under any Articles of Confederation, persons who within six and twelve months after the establishment of that single State government refused to yield obedience to it and joined with the Tories of the Revolution, and adhered to the interests and fortunes of George III, were indicted and convicted and executed for treason against the State of Pennsylvania; and upon what principle? A doctrine clearly recognized in law and fully stated there, that Pennsylvania having established a government de facto, with powers to compel obedience, to punish disobedience, and to afford protection, and allegiance and protection being reciprocal, and George III not having it in his power to protect them against the commands of the government of the State of Pennsylvania, their allegiance was due to the State of Pennsylvania after the establishment of such a government.

Now, Mr. President, let me ask you this question: is it possible that there is any such law in this land, or is it possible there ever was any such law in any Christian land, that a man shall be liable to be punished if he does a thing, and that he shall be liable to be punished if he does not do it? Here are two governments claiming the right to control the action of the individual citizen of a State. The one which is the rightful government, the Government of the United States, if you please, and which, perhaps, he would gladly serve, has not the power to protect him, or having the power, fails to exercise it in his behalf, yet declares that if he yields obedience to the government which has the power to punish him, "If he refuses to obey it I will hang him;" and the other government, the government de facto, says, "I have got you in my possession; if you do not yield obedience I will hang you." Is there any such law that a man shall be subjected to the penalty of death for yielding to circumstances which he is unable to resist and against which there is no power that can or will protect him?

Vain will be the boast of our love of liberty and our regard for law should we in practice discard the humane and just principle announced by Blackstone, and attempt to act upon a principle which the Government of England for four hundred years has repudiated, and which is not recognized to-day by any civilized Government on earth.

Why do I refer to this principle? The ignorant, the thoughtless, a miserable vitiated press may say, "because there is sympathy with traitors and treason." I never notice the utterances of fools. It is because we find ourselves placed to-day, in legislating for our country, in a situation that imperiously demands of the American legislator to think, and think properly, and to so apply his action that injustice and wrong and cruelty and crime shall not be committed simply to appease maddened partisans and superlative patriots who perhaps amid the hours of battle skulked and hid and robbed the Treasury, and cried "copperhead" and "traitor" against others.

I call your attention to this principle of law as applicable to the great mass of the southern people, and ask you, sir, if that be their legal status and real condition, whether your proposed legislation, even had you the constitutional authority to justify it in the absence from this Chamber of their representatives, is just and right, and whether those persons should be excluded from a participation in the Government or their representation in it diminished simply because they have yielded obedience to a power that they could not resist and a power against whose commands you could not protect them? Why, Mr. President, the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. COWAN] the other day, in that very able and exhaustive speech which he made on this subject, a speech which would do credit to any American statesman that this Government has ever produced, showed you that the number of people in these southern States who were really anxious for disunion was comparatively small, and yet, although there were comparatively few who really desired the breaking up of the Union and who took steps to do it, your legislation proposes to deprive the whole mass of a constitutional right by a poor, miserable effort to amend the Constitution in the absence of everybody that is to be affected by it.

Now, suppose your constitutional amendment passes. If it passes, it ought to meet with the respect of somebody. If this constitutional amendment shall be presented to the States who are now represented in Congress and shall be adopted by simply three fourths of those States, is there anybody that will have the least respect for it? Then suppose you could go with the bayonet, which I think now under the brighter dawn of a better day which we begin to realize you are not going to have the liberty to do; suppose you were to go with the bayonet and present it to the other eleven States, and they, acting under duress, not as free agents and as free men, could get some people in their section so miserable and poor in spirit and craven in soul as to vote to adopt in their Legislatures such an amendment, would it command the respect of anybody in this land? Not at all. Open your doors, sir; admit the representatives of the southern States to seats in this body; require no miserable degrading oath of them; administer to them the very oath that you first took when you entered this body, and the only oath that the Constitution of the United States requires, and the only oath which Congress has any right to exact, an oath to support the Constitution of the United States; and then if you think your Constitution is defective, if you think it needs further amendment, or if you have not sufficiently exhausted your bowels of mercy and love and kindness toward your sable friends whose shadows darken this gallery every day, submit your amendments to the States represented in the Congress of the United States; and if they choose, acting freely as citizens of their States, to agree to your amendments, it will command the respect of themselves, but still it will not command mine. I should despise a people who would voluntarily assume so degrading a position.

Mr. President, I will continue these desultory remarks for a moment longer, because another idea suggests itself to my mind, and because, perhaps, I shall present a view which I know will not be recognized by gentlemen on the other side, but which I never have had any doubt of since the commencement of this war. You said—and this is not a new point, but we keep ringing it in your ears—you said directly after the inception of this war, that it was prosecuted for certain purposes, not for the destruction of any institutions or rights of the States, but to restore the Union with all the rights of the States unimpaired. I have looked carefully through the Constitution to see where it is that you get the right to make war upon a State. I can see no such right arising under any provision of the Constitution; but still I do see where the Federal Government has a right to resort to force to put down opposition to its constitutional authority. If I held the views which I have read to you from Mr. Rawle, I could not admit the right in this Government to exercise force within a State except to put down insurrection or rebellion, or to suppress domestic violence, which are nothing but the operations of unorganized men, not the operations of political communities. But, sir, admitting the right in the Federal Government to use force to put down, if you please, the unanimous opposition of the people of a State to remaining in the Federal Union, what is the basis of your authority? From what source is it derived?

Why, Mr. President, if this had only been a league between the States, or the simplest kind of confederation, it has been held, I believe, by all writers that the violation of a league or of a treaty as between independent nations gives the right to resort to force. There is another principle applicable to nations as well as to individuals; it is this, that the great overruling principle of self-preservation gives the right to use force. Applying this principle this war was treated in its earliest stages as an insurrection and rebellion, and I believe that the late President of the United States never called it anything else than an insurrection. He may occasionally have called it a rebellion. It was treated in this Chamber as both an insurrection and rebellion. Here lately, when it becomes necessary to declare that these States are not entitled to representation in Congress, some persons who formerly adjudged it only to be an insurrection or a rebellion find out that it was a great civil war. The mistake they make is not in calling it a great civil war, but in attempting to apply to a civil war between independent States, united together for common purposes, under a written constitution of government, the principles applicable to wars among foreign Powers.

Now, Mr. President, here is a point to which I wish to call your attention and the attention of the country. If you have any right to make war to prevent a State seceding from the Union and setting up an independent government, you have that right only for the purpose of compelling that State to live up to the contract that she made when she entered the Union with you, or because the exercise of that right is necessary to your self-preservation. It gives you no right of government over that State, to hold it as your property, to appoint for it a territorial government, or to limit or abridge its right in any respect after the opposing forces shall have been once subdued and peace shall have been restored. Between political communities there is no chosen umpire to decide. Each decides for itself. This was the doctrine laid down by the fathers, and the doctrine cited the other day in the very able speech of the honorable Senator from Maryland [Mr. JOHNSON] from the writings of Mr. Madison. The judicial powers of the United States only extend to questions of law and equity arising under the Constitution. While it is, therefore, competent to decide upon questions of law and equity between individuals, it has not the power to decide great political questions unless you find that power delegated to it in the Constitution. Then, sir, I liken this case of a controversy between one portion of the States adhering to the Federal Government, and another portion of the States attempting to throw off their obligation to that Federal Government, to the case of a contract between individuals. There is no common arbiter to decide between these States. If it was a case in chancery between individuals, one party to the contract filing his bill of complaint, showing that he had faithfully performed his part of the agreement, might ask for a specific performance of that contract as against the defaulting party, and he might have a decree for the specific performance of that contract, but the chancellor could not interpolate anything in that contract. It must be performed according to its terms. So among the States of this Union, if a controversy arises, as has arisen, the great chancellor or umpire to which an appeal is made is war. The same principle is applicable to a controversy of that kind, and in a tribunal of that kind, as is applicable to the civil case to which I have referred, in equity. Then your right to wage war was simply to compel the southern States to remain in the Union upon the terms that they agreed to live in the Union with you.

The principle, then, for which I contend is this: that when once the military power of the so-called confederate States has been put down; when there is no further resistance to the rightful exercise of the Federal authority, they are in the Union with all the constitutional rights of States in the Union just as fully and completely as if they had never attempted to secede. During the war honorable members of this body contended, just as inflexibly as I did, that those States had no right to go out of the Union. You all said they could not go out of the Union. You all said they should not go out of the Union. A bloody war was waged for four years to decide that issue; and after it is decided by the wager of battle, and peace reigns throughout the whole land; when you find the people of those eleven States not only anxious to live in peace with you and to resume their relations with the Federal Government, but so submissive that when they are told by telegraph to make an amendment to their constitution they do it; when you find the people throughout the whole of those States manifesting such an anxious desire to get back to their father's house, and to live in friendship and kindness with the other members of the family, you turn around and say no. You preach now practically what they asserted in the commencement of this controversy. They said they had gone out, and you said they had not. They said they would stay out, and you said they should not. And now, when they have shown that they could not get out, and when they are in the old house, you lock up eleven rooms of the thirty-six, and tell them they shall not at present abide in the house; that they shall not come to the common table; they shall not participate in any of the advantages and blessings of the Government; but if they will do something else, something which they are under no obligation to do, and which would be destructive to their interests to do, then they may come here with their representatives. What is that? "You have got some four million people down there that you have never thought entitled to exercise the right of voting; give them that power and come back." You attempt to do by indirection what you must know you cannot do directly; for you must know that there is not one of those eleven States in whose sons there is a particle of manhood that will ever submit to this amendment. Let them live in peace; that they ought to do. Let them obey the Federal law; that they ought to do. And if they be denied this right of representation, and are still taxed, let them be patient and learn to wait, for a brighter day is dawning. At the head of this nation to-day there is a man whose patriotism you never doubted in the darkest hour of the country's troubles, who has placed himself fairly and squarely upon the great republican doctrine of representation according to population, and of the right of each and every State to decide for itself who shall, or who shall not, exercise the elective franchise within its borders.

I have alluded to the fact that the present Executive has planted himself upon this great doctrine. I am not of his party. I did not vote for him. If there is any difficulty in the Republican party; if there is distraction in their councils, and divisions between them and the Executive, I have a right, without being of their party, to approve by my vote of a principle which I asserted and acted upon before the division among themselves.

But, sir, is there any bona fide intention now of permitting these southern States to be represented in either House of Congress, at least until after the presidential election? Can it be said that the object of all this is political? Are these States to be denied the exercise of a clear constitutional right—representation; are they to be taxed, and are their representatives to be kept out of the Halls of Congress until there shall be another mockery of an election in favor of the party in power? What does this mean? Although it is not in order to refer to what has been said, as I understand the ruling of the Chair, in the House of Representatives, it is in order, I believe, to read a joint resolution reported by the committee of fifteen, and introduced by them in the House of Representatives, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That whereas the people of Tennessee have made known to the Congress of the United States their desire that the constitutional relations heretofore existing between them and the United States be fully established, and did, on the 22d day of February, 1865, by a large popular vote, adopt and ratify a constitution of government, republican in form, and not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States, and a State government has been organized under the provisions thereof, which said provisions, and the laws passed in pursuance thereof, proclaim and denote loyalty to the Union; and whereas the people of Tennessee are found to be in a condition to exercise the functions of a State within this Union, and can only exercise the same by the consent of the law-making power of the United States: Therefore,

The State of Tennessee is hereby declared to be one of the United States of America, on an equal footing with the other States, upon the express condition that the people of Tennessee will maintain and enforce in good faith their existing constitution and laws, excluding those who have been engaged in rebellion against the United States from the exercise of the elective franchise for the respective periods of time therein provided for, and shall exclude the same persons for the like respective periods of time from eligibility to office; and the State of Tennessee shall never assume or pay any debt or obligation contracted or incurred in aid of the late rebellion; nor shall the said State ever in any manner claim from the United States or make any allowance or compensation for slaves emancipated or liberated in any way whatever; which conditions shall be ratified by the Legislature of Tennessee, or the people thereof, as the Legislature may direct, before this act shall take effect.

My first remark is that there is no constitutional authority in Congress to say upon what terms or conditions Tennessee shall be a member of the Federal Union. "Congress may admit new States into this Union," says the Constitution. Congress may exercise delegated powers, and can exercise none but delegated powers. Under this delegated authority Congress did by act, approved June 1, 1796, admit Tennessee into the Union as a State. There is no power delegated to Congress to expel a State from the Union, or declare that a State once a member of the Union is out of it, or the terms and conditions upon which a State shall remain in the Union. If Congress may do this in reference to Tennessee it may do so in reference to Pennsylvania or New York. When new States are admitted into the Union they are in the equals of the original States, and are no more subject to the power of Congress than are the original States. It will not be pretended that the original thirteen States became members of the Union through the action of the law-making power of the Government. They became such members by their own separate ratification of the Constitution. This unconstitutional form for the recognition of Tennessee is to be the form to be applied to Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia, original States, the creators in part of Congress, and of the executive and judicial departments of the Government, States without whose co-operative action Congress would never have existed, or the Union itself have been formed. Congress never had authority to say whether one of these original States should be members of the Union or not, and yet Congress modestly asserts the power of deciding whether they are members of the Union. I believed when you were preaching Union and charging others with being disunionists that you meant disunion, because I knew you were violating daily the Constitution of the country, the bond of the Union, and by the exclusion of representatives from the southern States from Congress, and the assumption of the right to determine whether those States are in the Union, and the presentation of the joint resolution in reference to Tennessee, and the determination thereby that she is not in the Union and can only be so upon the conditions therein contained, the party in power conclusively prove themselves to be disunionists.

What does the resolution propose? It declares Tennessee to be one of the United States of America, on an equal footing with the other States, and then annexes conditions providing in effect she shall never alter her constitution; that certain persons shall not be allowed to vote; and providing that certain persons shall not be allowed to hold office. All these are conditions annexed to a State on an equal footing with the other States in the Union, and the resolution expressly declares that it shall not take effect until Tennessee agrees to accept the proposed terms of recognition. Why, sir, would Tennessee or any other State be in the Union on an equal footing with the other States, would she be an equal member of this Union, with such clogs and conditions as these annexed? You of Connecticut can exclude negroes from voting; you may make a qualification as to white men; you may admit men who have been engaged in the rebellion to share in the councils of your State and exercise the right of suffrage; but Tennessee, if she is in the Union, cannot be in the Union on equal terms with you. Sir, the time was when any State of this Union would have spurned any such offer of equality. I will not enter into the discussion of this resolution now. I only refer to it as of a kindred nature and character with the proposed amendment of the Constitution and the resolution which has passed both Houses saying that those States shall not be represented in Congress until Congress shall pass an act declaring them entitled to representation.

I have already detained the Senate too long, much longer than I anticipated. If I know my own heart, Mr. President, I have no other desire than to see this afflicted and distracted country once more in the enjoyment of all the blessings and all the constitutional rights which it enjoyed before the unfortunate civil war. If I have referred to the action of States which never assumed to secede from the Union, it has been simply to show that if there has been fault in the southern section of the country, there has been fault among themselves. I have no doubt that there have been bad men in all sections of the country; that there have been unwise men in all sections of the country; that politicians for the sake of party triumph in their respective States have uttered sentiments, avowed doctrines, and advised a policy which had they known would have led to such disastrous consequences as have resulted from them, they would not have uttered or advised. But now, sir, the clangor of arms is hushed, peace reigns everywhere, and there is not a member in either House of Congress who believes that if the representatives of these southern States were admitted into these Halls—constitutionally they have the right to be here—there would be any attempt whatever again to disturb their peaceful relations to the Federal Union. They know that war has its calamities. There are too many hearths around which fond parents with bleeding hearts sit in anguish to-day; there are too many new and precious graves on southern soil; there are too many wounded and lame; there are too many young men in the fullness of promise and the brightness of hope who have gone down to an early grave for the people in the southern States again to wish to renew this fruitless strife. Beware of danger, not from them, but from yourselves. Injustice and wrong cannot always be practiced with impunity.

We are told by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER,] in the elaborate speech that he made—and we heard it from the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. YATES]—that if the right of suffrage was not given to this negro race there would be trouble. I do not know whether the remark was made as a threat or predicted as a consequence; but this I do know: if your policy is to be forced upon the country, and if you do keep from representation in Congress these States until they ratify what they never will ratify, you may meet with trouble in quarters where you least expect it. I ask you, sir, to consider a moment these important questions. Suppose you, for the accomplishment of mere party purposes, exclude representatives from these eleven States from admission to the Halls of Congress until after the next presidential election; suppose the party opposed to you in the States which have never been in revolt nominate an electoral ticket; suppose that these excluded States also nominate an electoral ticket; and they will, undoubtedly; and suppose those who are opposed to your policy shall have a majority of the Electoral College; suppose you simply, because you have kept out Representatives from the House of Representatives, should refuse to count those votes, and should declare that a minority candidate of the whole people of the United States shall act as the chief executive officer of this Government for four years more, do you believe the people would submit to it? I do not know what they will do, but I know you had better not attempt it.

Apportionment of Representation.

SPEECH OF HON. LOT M. MORRILL,

OF MAINE,

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
March 8, 1866.

The Senate having under consideration the joint resolution (H. R. No. 51) proposing to amend the Constitution of the United States—

Mr. MORRILL said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: I rise to discuss one or two topics connected with this question, and I shall not occupy much of the time of the Senate. That it is important is evidenced from the expression of sentiment in the Senate and in the country. To show, independent of this, that it is important, it only needs to be stated that it proposes to change the basis of representation in the popular branch of the national Congress. Its importance is rendered, I was about to say painfully, significant by the discussions which have obtained upon this floor in the last few weeks, during which it has occupied the attention of the Senate.

It is said to be unnecessary, unimportant, and by one class of Senators that it is unjust to the States, particularly the States which have so recently been in rebellion. It is said, on the other hand, by those who take a different view of the subject, that it is particularly unjust to the freedmen, whom it is the duty of the nation to protect and provide for. It was said yesterday that we violate a great principle of American law and American liberty in the attempt to pass it; that it is fundamentally wrong and unjust to a defenseless and unprotected race, the wards and allies of the nation, whose duty it is to give them protection.

It is plain that between these cross-purposes, if persisted in, the measure is to come to naught. My purpose, so far as I have any object, and so far as I have any method in the treatment of the subject to-day, will be to show that neither of these propositions is just. It is not unjust to the States recently in rebellion; it does not, as is supposed, violate a great fundamental principle of American representative law; and on the other hand, it does not violate, as is supposed, the principles of popular liberty in the person of this dependent race. Upon the contrary, I shall maintain affirmatively that its tendency is in the direction of popular liberty. Although I shall not pretend that it is an adequate measure, and that it deals out full and ample justice to this feeble race, who I believe all must agree it is the high duty of the nation to protect and defend; yet I shall maintain that its tendency is in that direction, and that those who have faith in it, those who would do what they can, now that they cannot do all they would, may accept it, and ought to accept it.

Sir, what is the issue precisely? It is said it is to change the great fundamental basis of representation on the one side. I do not quite agree to that. Rather, I maintain that it is to adjust the nation to the great events of the war. Those who have been at all watchful of the passing events of the last five years doubtless recognize some changes in the condition of the country. The great civil war through which the nation has passed in its march, and in the sweep of its events, has worked radical changes in public affairs. Sir, it has worked among other things a fundamental change in the basis of representation provided for in your Constitution. That change renders this proposition necessary. In the Constitution of the United States representation in the popular branch of Congress was based upon "the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years, and, excluding Indians not taxed, three fifths of all other persons."

One of the great changes which have eventuated from this war is an amendment of your Constitution which forever sweeps away from the Constitution of the United States the "other persons" mentioned in the Constitution, and which constitute a portion of the basis of representation. Slavery and involuntary servitude have been swept from the pale of the Constitution; and thus has changed the fundamental basis of representation in the popular branch of Congress. How is the fact, however? Notwithstanding this radical change, the fact is that to-day Representatives from States are demanding admission into the lower branch of Congress based upon the system of slavery, which is among the things that were; which is altogether in the past. The question is presented, shall the American Congress admit into its councils some thirty Representatives in the lower branch of Congress based upon a provision of the Constitution now rendered obsolete by the changes to which I have alluded? Why, Mr. President, to do that would be to bring again into your presence the institution of slavery itself. It would be to say that, notwithstanding events that have transpired, you still recognize its existence as a political power in the nation. To-day, thirty Representatives, in theory and in fact, demand admission into the lower House of Congress based entirely upon the representative system as originally provided for by the Constitution of the United States, ignoring all changes.

To those who deny that an amendment to the Constitution is necessary I ask, how are you providing for this obvious change in the representative basis? The provision of the Constitution providing for representation based on three fifths of the "other persons" no longer exists. How shall equal and just representation be provided for? Some amendment is rendered absolutely necessary, unless the American Constitution is to give to the nation the expression of utterly contradictory sentiments, saying involuntary servitude no longer exists, in one portion of it; in another bearing on its front, in marked contrast, that three fifths only of the "other persons" are to still constitute the basis of representation.

Mr. SAULSBURY. If my friend will allow me to interrupt him, I will ask him whether he is in favor of giving to the southern negroes a right to vote, and whether he means to exclude the southern States from the right of representation because they do not allow the negroes to vote.

Mr. MORRILL. If the Senator will pardon me until I get under way a little, I will try to answer all questions. I say, then, Mr. President, from the fundamental changes which have taken place in the Constitution some amendment has been rendered necessary to preserve its unity and to prevent unequal and unjust representation in the national councils. Thirty Representatives, based on the provision of the Constitution for the representation of "three fifths of all other persons," demand admission into the national Congress, and Senators stand here to oppose, nay, denounce, as unwise, inexpedient, and revolutionary, any amendment whatever. Why, sir, the admission of these thirty Representatives which are based upon this principle of the Constitution, "three fifths of all other persons," means the recognition of the institution of slavery. That is dead, gone, is wholly of the past; and yet its representatives demand admission to these Halls, and we are told that no amendment of the Constitution is necessary. The American Congress is called upon to do that thing, or it is called upon to reform this provision of the Constitution, and adjust to the events of the times.

Now, Mr. President, the committee on reconstruction, looking at this question I think wisely, undertake to adapt the nation to the events of the war. They take notice of a revolution in public affairs, marked and decisive, and which has changed the political and social system in half the nation, and which has wrought a change also in the popular basis of representation; and now propose to provide for the apportionment of representation according to the principles of the Constitution, to place the question upon some basis which shall be in harmony with the principles of the Government. And what is that basis? Substantially it is this: that representation hereafter shall be based upon citizenship. That is the rule; that is the implication of this amendment. Heretofore representation was based upon free persons and upon three fifths of "all other persons." "Three fifths of all other persons" being stricken out of the Constitution, the committee go upon the assumption that all are now free persons, and being free persons they are citizens, and being citizens they are entitled to representation, and if any State undertakes to deny them representation, to deny them suffrage, that State shall not represent them to that extent. In its endeavor, it is just. It is on the side of popular rights. It has an implication in it, perhaps, which is unjust; but as an endeavor, it is in the right direction. It is saying to these States, "We recognize the principle of citizenship as the basis of representation; you must recognize it or you must not represent those to whom you deny the right."

With this statement I justify the vote which I shall give for this amendment. I think the amendment on its face stands self-justified in the situation in which we are placed. I shall proceed to examine some of the objections which are brought against the adoption of this amendment. It is said that any amendment of the Constitution in these times is unnecessary, inexpedient, and unwise. There are a class of Senators here and a class of persons throughout the country who denounce all amendments of the Constitution at the present time as unwise and injudicious. We are told these are not times suited to an amendment of the fundamental law. I have already adverted to some of the facts which I think justify the conclusion that an amendment of the Constitution is our necessity; that to adjust the nation to the great events of the war it has become necessary to amend its Constitution and its general code of laws. But to those who make this objection let it suffice to say that the Constitution contemplates its own amendment, provides for it, and it has been of frequent occurrence.

But, Mr. President, I do not forget the history of the past few years. I do not forget that within the last five years a class of statesmen and politicians, who now resist all propositions for an amendment of the Constitution, here and elsewhere urged and demanded amendments of the Constitution of the nation. What were the circumstances then? Several States threatened to dissolve this Union. Several States had taken an attitude hostile to the Government of the country. They demanded the extension, the protection, and the perpetuation of slavery; and upon that question the country was divided. Then amendments to the Constitution were proposed without number here, elsewhere, and everywhere. Amendments to the Constitution seemed to be the order of the day. To what end, and for what purpose? To increase the power in the hands of the few who wielded the political power in those States, and who were demanding it. What is the question to-day? It is the same question precisely in another form. They brought on civil war, rebellion, and insurrection. They have been defeated. The institution of slavery has passed away in form, but it still lives in spirit. It stalks the earth in power. It comes to your Halls and demands admission. It abates not one jot of its power and force. It not only demands admission with the strength that it had when the war began, but it demands that its strength shall be increased by two fifths of its former slave population; that its political power in Congress shall be augmented by two fifths. The slaves, three fifths of whom are represented, are to be stricken out of the Constitution and are to be given to the great body of the American people and counted as numbers, for that is the rule, it is contended. On such basis of representation, then, by the rebellion the South has not only lost nothing, but in the scale of political power those who were capable of being the enemies of the nation, and may be again, have added to their strength two fifths. That is the proposition you have to meet, sir. Is it not plain that the national security demands that this proposition should be adopted?

But yesterday we had an additional reason, a reason which I did not anticipate, given why this amendment should not be adopted, and that was that it was wholly unnecessary, because, it was said, by the events which were transpiring in the country in regard to the recent slave population there need be no apprehension of excess of representation based on the whole "numbers" instead of three fifths, from the important fact that they were passing away. If I gather the force of that argument, it is this: we are to base no legislation and no action upon the idea that this race, recently slave, now free, is part and parcel of the American people, the object of our care, solicitude, and protection; they are passing away, dying; let them be represented as slaves now, and let them never enter into the basis hereafter of the representative system. Sir, that is the old argument, an argument worthy of another period than this. Our people have been an inexorable people in some respects in regard to the races that have been within their power. In the march of our civilization across the continent, the iron heel of that civilization has rested upon the Indian, and he is passing away. We seem to contemplate the probable extinction of the Indians from our limits with composure. He is a nomad; he is a savage; he is a barbarian; he is not within our morals or our code of law; he is not within the pale of the Constitution, but flits upon the verge of it outside our protection, the subject of our caprices, and sometimes, I think, of our avarice. And, now, if any consequence is to be attached to the remark of the honorable Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. DOOLITTLE] yesterday, this "inferior race" is not to be the subject of our solicitude; they, too, are passing away; it is not worth while to change your Constitution in regard to them; let them be represented as two fifths slaves on the old basis until they shall have perished, and then your Constitution will need no amendment. The laws of a fearful antagonism of superior and inferior races are expected to accomplish what, if American statesmanship does not incite, it contemplates with apparent resignation.

Mr. President, I hail with something like a sense of gratitude the proposition of the committee on reconstruction, because it recognizes at least the great fundamental principle of American constitutional law and liberty, that representation in the national councils ought to be based on citizenship, and so far as the national councils are concerned it shall rest nowhere else. That is the significance of this proposition. Contemplating it in that view I content myself to vote for it, although I think it inadequate to the immediate exigency of the times. I would much prefer to say to these States, "If you desire to be represented at all in these Halls you shall do equal and exact justice to all the citizens of the United States, without regard to color." That is the mandate that should go forth from these Halls. That is the equal and exact justice which this nation should hold out to these men, but recently the enemies of the nation in arms, before they should be permitted to set their feet in these Chambers to represent themselves. But, sir, it would shock the sense of the nation, and I am sure it would shock the sense of justice of mankind, if the American Congress were to allow these people to come here restored to authority and represent the old system of slavery, now dead and buried, and in addition to that allow them a full representation according to the numbers of a race to whom they deny all privileges and rights.

But it is said that an amendment of the Constitution, such as is proposed, is inexpedient at this time. Eleven States, we are told, are demanding seats upon this floor, and are impatient of delay. The honorable Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] the other day became plaintive over the condition of these people and States. He told us their situation was one of suffering and desolation; that they needed representation here; and that they were anxious to be represented upon this floor. That, I submit, sir, is not the highest consideration for the action of the Senate. There are subjects lying back of the desires of these States necessary to be considered. I shall not undertake to recapitulate in detail what has been said by those who, on that side, have addressed themselves to this subject in behalf of these States; but we have been told that it is for the interest of the nation to receive these States into the Union, and that they should be represented on the floors of the two Houses of Congress; that that is the national necessity, higher than any other consideration, higher than that of representation or adjustment of representation, higher than that of protection to the freedmen, higher than that of national justice. We are told that the great political necessity of the times is the admission of these States now, unqualifiedly, without hesitation, and without the judgment or action of Congress. In language quite significant, passionate sometimes, you have been told that these States must be admitted now or hereafter as they are. In the language of the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. GUTHRIE], "you will have to admit these States, or do worse."

To all such passionate invective I have just one reply, and that is, the actual and legal condition of these States is that of "insurrectionary States." That is their legal designation; that is their legal status. The Congress of the United States, the high legislative power of the nation, the supreme war power of the country, the Executive included, gave them the designation of insurrectionary States. They have been moreover regarded by the world for the last four or five years as belligerent States. When Congress adjourned here last year that was their condition. It returned to find them here knocking at the doors of Congress, as it was said, with their representation, for admission into the councils of the nation.

Now, sir, if that state of things has been changed, how and upon what authority has it been changed? When the war power of the Government had overcome the rebel forces, at the surrender of the rebel forces, overcome by the power of the nation, what was the condition of these States? General Sherman, acting as he supposed within the scope of his military functions, undertook to recognize these States as existing. Those who remember his military memorandum will remember that according to the provisions of that memorandum these States were to be recognized as in existence; all the officers of the States were to be restored to their offices upon taking the oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and their privileges and their franchises were to be recognized and guaranteed to the people of these States; but what was the result? The President of the United States repudiated it at once. The President held, and held properly, and so did his Cabinet, and so did the country, that these States did not exist as States in the Union; they did not exist civilly; their governments had been subverted. By rebellion and civil war they had abdicated civil authority; their State governments had been overthrown, and therefore General Sherman's memorandum, which would have recognized them, and which would perhaps have brought them upon this floor as States, was repudiated utterly and entirely. The President of the United States very properly and very patriotically held that the proposition that these States were States of the Union, having civil or political existence now that they had laid down their arms, was not a proposition to be entertained anywhere; that their State governments had been overthrown; they were out of their relations with the Union; they were disorganized.

The President went further. When the civil authorities in the rebel State of Virginia undertook to exercise authority, he warned them that such assumption would be treated as usurpation, and they would be held to the strictest accountability by the military authorities of the United States for any attempt to exercise any civil function in the State of Virginia. General Sherman was thus given to understand, and very properly, that he did not understand the great political questions which underlaid the war. It was well enough for him to receive the surrender of the rebel army, but he could not, as a military commander, make terms for the restoration of States and the Union, and by which the authority of those States could be recognized. The President treated their State governments as having been overthrown; that there was no civil officer in all the South who could perform civil functions of any kind whatever. The States and the people were held to be in a state of absolute civil and political disability.

That being the condition of the whole southern country, will anybody show me how it came to pass that these States were resurrected, that these States were "organized," that these States were reconstructed in the absence of Congress and of legislation upon the subject? What were the President's functions? These States, on his view of their condition, had lost their State governments; there were no civil officers, and there could be no political or civil functions. What was his authority? How was he acting? Of course in the double capacity of President of the United States, sworn to maintain the laws and protect the Constitution, and as Commander-in-Chief of the Army and the Navy. As President of the United States, of course he could only enforce the law; but there was no law on the subject. Congress had passed an act providing for the contingency which had arisen now, but it had failed to become a law; and as to the reconstruction of States there was no law; the nation was without law. Congress had never provided for such a case, and therefore there was no law to execute. The only capacity, therefore, in which the President could act was in that of Commander-in-Chief of the Army. Will it be pretended that as Commander-in-Chief of the armies of the United States the President had any authority to reconstruct States, or, to use his own language, to "organize" States? Not at all. The organization of States was civil and legislative in its character purely. Now, looking to results, what was accomplished in those States? Substantially, I submit, what was repudiated in Major General Sherman's plan. Today, substantially as a matter of fact, these States are restored, if at all, to the same status to which they were proposed to be restored by the memorandum of Major General Sherman.

What was done? Major General Sherman proposed to recognize these States on the condition that the officers should take the oath to support the Constitution of the United States. The condition, it will be observed, was an oath to support the Constitution. Governor Perry was authorized to "organize" the State of South Carolina, for example, on the condition of an oath to support the Constitution, including other things. Both were by military authority, and rest on the basis of an oath. General Sherman's plan contemplated the recognition of the officers of the State upon taking the oath to support the Constitution, and Governor Perry actually restored the officers of the State of South Carolina to their offices upon taking the prescribed oath.

It is needless to say that whatever the President did in regard to these States was necessarily a military act.

My honorable friend from Wisconsin [Mr. DOOLITTLE] undertook to explain this policy, and to tell the Senate as near as he could what were the functions of Governor Perry. He said they were not exactly those of a provisional governor; but he was called a "provisional governor" by the President. He said he was not exactly a military officer, for he was not commissioned thereunto, and could not be without the consent of the Senate; but he was in the nature of a negotiator to negotiate terms of peace. Our case required no negotiation, and admitted of no negotiation. This was a civil war, and the Government of the United States were proceeding against the States waging war upon them, upon the ground that they were "insurrectionary States," and must be overcome, and the insurgents dispersed, subjugated, subdued, coerced, and not upon the ground that they were to be negotiated with.

The truth is, the honorable Senator from Wisconsin undertakes to apologize for an act which he cannot justify, and which he finds no warrant either in the law or the Constitution to authorize. If he was not a "provisional governor," then he could not exercise a civil function. If he was a military governor, then he must have his commission; and as he had neither, he had no office, and could have no function; and that was the condition of Governor Perry. He was an agent, but a military agent, without authority of law anywhere; and the fruit of his labor of course must be irregular. The best that can be said of these States which we are demanded to admit here without consideration and without discretion is, that they are military States. At the close of armed rebellion they had no organization. If they have any now, it is a military organization, an organization which Congress cannot recognize, which Congress cannot respect; an organization which needs the ratification of the legislative authority to make valid. I do not criticize these proceedings to complain of them. It was the province of the President to organize military departments or governments in all that section of the nation that had at length surrendered to its military authority. He might adopt the mode and employ the agents which he deemed best suited to the end. As Commander-in-Chief, he could hold such governments subject to his military power, as he did still continue to do, until the supreme legislative power of the nation should make provision for the case. But could he, as President of the United States, chief Executive, invest these States with the political and civil rights of "sovereign States" in the Union, and at the same time hold them subject wholly to his power as Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy? If they are American States in the Union, only lacking representation in Congress, with Governors, Legislatures, and courts, their civil authority restored, on what ground is it that these Governors, Legislatures, and courts are held subordinate to the power of the commanders of military departments; and on what ground is it that the constitutions and laws of those States are set aside and annulled by military orders of the commanding generals? It is that the war is not over; not so been adjudged. The military authority of the President is supreme; the volunteers enlisted for the war not yet permitted to return to their homes; the laws are not yet supreme; and the insurrectionary States have not yet been restored to those relations with the nation essential to peace and repose by the supreme legislative authority.

Now, Mr. President, it is contended that this proposed amendment to the Constitution violates the great American rule of representation embraced in the Constitution, which rule is defined to be "representation according to numbers." I allude now to the argument of the honorable Senator from Maryland, [Mr. JOHNSON.] If I understand his proposition and his reasoning, there are no longer "other persons" mentioned in the Constitution, three fifths of whom constituted a part of the basis of representation. His next postulate is, that these slaves have become freemen, and being freemen, are citizens. I will read an extract from the honorable Senator's speech, in which his view on that subject is much better stated than I could state it:

"Now, as far as relates to the quota of taxation, or as far as relates to the quota of representation, the state of things is materially changed. There are no men, so to speak, who are but three fifths men. We all stand upon the same platform. As we came from nature's God, we stand together upon an equality as far as relates to human rights, and it was entirely unnecessary, therefore, to change the mode of apportioning representation or of apportioning taxation except for some other purpose which did not enter into the estimation of the wise and good men by whom the Constitution was adopted in recommending this particular provision."

This argument proceeds, first, upon the assumption that the "other persons" no longer constitute the basis of representation, and that those "other persons," by the change in the Constitution freeing the slaves, have become free men, and being free men are citizens, and being citizens are entitled to representation. I assume that to be the method of the argument. It is difficult for me to see that there could be any other. The difficulty in the proposition is that "the assumed fact is not conceded to be the fact." Who says that these slaves ceasing to be slaves become free men? I know the honorable Senator from Maryland says so, and it does him great credit; but what is the fact in the States that are interested in this question? Do they say it? No, sir. They hold that when they ceased to be slaves they merely became "freedmen," simply not slaves. But were they interested with political rights and privileges? Not at all. Were they free men? Not a bit of it. Were they citizens? The last thing in the world. They are freedmen simply; and their argument is that according to all law and usage, ancient and modern, the simple act of freeing a slave, if you go no further, does not invest him thereby with all the rights, civil and political, and with all the immunities of the community in which he happens to be. What, then, is the condition of these "freedmen" in these States? They hold them to-day as altogether outside of the objects of society. They say they never were American citizens. They are Africa in America; that is all; they are not citizens; they are not free men; they have no right whatever which that community is bound to respect; they are more than ever beyond the pale and protection of the Constitution; they have not even a master to serve with an interest in his service to care for his physical condition.

Sir, it does not follow by any means that these men who were slaves are free men, but according to the whole code of the South—morals, laws, and constitutions of the South—the very structure of its society, civil, social, and political, they are outside of the pale of society, outside of the pale of the Constitution. They are not members of the body-politic in any sense whatever. They are nomadic in their relations. They are as if but wandering tribes. They are, in the sense of the Constitution, "Indians not taxed," within the limits for whom we are not responsible, to whom we owe no duty and no protection whatever, and they have abundant authority upon this subject, the highest authority in the country. The Supreme Court of the country has determined, according to the history and according to the politics of the country, that they were never designed to be embraced within the pale of the Constitution, they never belonged to the governing class, were not of the American people, and now they maintain that that people are not entitled to the rights, privileges, and immunities of citizens of the United States. I meet the honorable Senator upon his proposition, and I maintain that it fails utterly and wholly, because, as the matter stands, the freedman is in the power and under the control of these States. They deny his citizenship, claim to determine his status, civil and political, and so far are upheld in it by the nation, and the Senator does not propose to interfere.

The honorable Senator talks humanely, as he always does, but he talks to no effect when he talks upon this proposition that these people, ceasing to be slaves, become American citizens, and then turns them over to the communities in which they are, and upon which they are dependent, and by whom to be governed and adjudged, and especially when he holds that interference on the part of Congress would be a violation of State rights and revolutionary.

Mr. HOWE. If his speech were put into a law it would be all right.

Mr. MORRILL. Yes, if I could put the honorable Senator's speech into a law I would settle this thing at once; but the difficulty is, that out of this Chamber it has not the force of law. It is powerful for persuasion here, but with these States whose representatives he asks us to receive, and whose authority over this subject we are told is conclusive, it is worth nothing.

But, Mr. President, to repeat, if this is a question for the national Government, then my honorable friend (if he will allow me to call him so) from Maryland would be right. If he could back his speech by the authority of the nation and say, "That is the law, and the States shall obey it," then our remedy is complete. Then, sir, ceasing to be slaves, these men become American citizens; they become freemen, and the nation taking upon itself the great obligation to protect its citizens in all their rights would enact that these States should have no representation whatever until they accorded these rights, and we would not leave it optional with them; we would say by authority of law, "If you wish your rights and privileges respected, you must respect the rights and the privileges of the whole body of the citizens of the Republic."

The honorable Senator settles the right of the States to determine the status of these freedmen, substantially, when he holds that it is the right of the States to say whether they shall have the suffrage or not. Suffrage is the highest element, the highest privilege, nay, the highest right of the American citizen. Without it, all other rights are of little value. Without it, the power to protect his rights is wanting. I maintain that when the honorable Senator argues that the right of suffrage is a matter wholly with the States, and the United States Government has nothing to do with it and cannot deal with it, he denies to the freedmen within the power of the States the great essential right of American citizenship, without which he has no protection, without which, as a race, he must always be subordinate, always be within the power of the men who vote for him. The logic of the argument of the honorable Senator, that these men become citizens by force of emancipation, is negated by the argument that it is a question for the States, and we stand here to-day doing on that argument only what we can do, to say to these people, "If you ignore his rights you shall not vote for him."

Mr. President, suppose they are freemen and citizens; suppose now they belong to the great body of the American people and are part and parcel of it, and that we are one people, the American people are a unit, and there is no distinction of persons before American law; that being the rule, then I take it, the argument of the honorable Senator from Maryland, so far as a question of injustice to these States is concerned, falls to the ground; for if these men are citizens, as he maintains, and they have the rights and the privileges of citizenship, it is the roughest injustice that they should be denied the suffrage; and any law which the Congress of the United States could pass, or any alteration of the American Constitution which the American people could enact, which should deny these people in the South the right to represent the race to whom they themselves refuse representation and yet govern and oppress by taxation, would be in harmony, I take it, by the general sentiment of mankind; certainly such provision would be in harmony with the principles of justice. By what authority, allow me to ask, is it that these States having within their jurisdiction four million human beings, to whom they deny every right known to man, whom they claim to hold to forced labor by black codes and vagrant laws, in their arrogance and assumption turn to the Government of the United States and demand to be allowed to vote for these men thus held in a state of total disability, civil and political?

But, Mr. President, the honorable Senator will allow me to say that I think he is quite at fault in his definition of the rule of American representation. I do not understand, either by the history of that rule or by that which can be drawn from a fair interpretation of the Constitution, that the rule is at all as the honorable Senator understands it. He reads the rule to be representation according to numbers. I maintain that the great American rule is, and has been from the beginning, representation according to freemen, representation according to citizenship. I read the constitutional provision:

"Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union, according to their respective numbers, which shall be determined"—

How?

"by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three fifths of all other persons."

Those "other persons" were the slaves, and no other. The basis of representation was upon the free persons, not simply on numbers, because the exception which follows excludes the idea that it rested on numbers. The great fundamental law was representation on free persons. The exception was of slaves who were not freemen, but numbers. All the freemen and three fifths of the numbers shall be counted, is the fair interpretation of that clause; and that is exactly in harmony with the history of the right of suffrage and of the right of citizenship as interpreted in all the constitutions and in the legislation of all the States during the revolutionary and constitutional eras in this country with a single exception. To show that I am right, that the great American rule of representation in this country was not numbers, but citizenship, I beg to read to the Senate from the constitutions of the States formed during the revolutionary era of the country. In that of Pennsylvania it was provided:

"That all elections ought to be free; and that all freemen having a sufficient evident common interest with and attachment to the community, have a right to elect officers, or to be elected into office."

There is the principle; not numbers, but "all freemen" will now read the provision in the constitution of Delaware, which is most marked and most explicit:

"That the right in the people to participate in the legislature is the foundation of liberty and of all free government, and for this end all elections ought to be free and frequent; and every freeman having sufficient evidence of a permanent interest with and attachment to the community hath a right of suffrage."

In the same constitution it was further provided:

"That every freeman, for every injury done him in his goods, lands, or person, by any other person, ought to have remedy by the course of the law of the land, and ought to have justice and right for the injury done to him, freely without fail, fully without any denial, and speedily without delay, according to the law of the land."

I commend that provision most cheerfully to the committee on reconstruction as the golden rule which, if adopted to-day, as Delaware adopted it in 1776, would be the solution, on the principles of justice and liberty and American law, of the great problems which perplex us.

The constitution of Maryland provided:

"That the House of Delegates shall be chosen in the following manner: all freemen above twenty-one years of age, having a freehold of fifty acres of land in the county in which they offer to vote, and residing therein, and all freemen having property in this State above the value of thirty pounds current money, and having resided in the county in which they offer to vote one whole year next preceding the election, shall have a right of suffrage in the election of delegates for such county."

Here the right is not on numbers, but on freemen. The constitution of Massachusetts declared that—

"All elections ought to be free, and all the inhabitants of this Commonwealth, having such qualifications as they shall establish by their frame of government, have an equal right to elect officers, and to be elected for public employments."

The provision in the constitution of New York was in these words:

"That every person who is a freeman in the city of Albany, or who was made a freeman of the city of New York, on or before the 14th day of October, in the year of our Lord 1776, and shall be actually and usually resident in the said cities respectively, shall be entitled to vote for representatives in Assembly within his said place of residence."

In the constitution of Connecticut it was provided that—

"The qualifications requisite to entitle a person to vote in election of the officers of government are, maturity in years, quiet and peaceable behavior, a civil conversation, and forty shillings freehold, or forty pounds personal estate; if the selectmen of the town certify a person qualified in those respects, he is admitted a freeman, on his taking an oath of fidelity to the State."

The constitution of North Carolina declared—

"That all freemen of the age of twenty-one years who have been inhabitants of any county within the State twelve months immediately preceding the day of any election, and possessed of a freehold within the same county of fifty acres of land for six months next before, and at the day of election, shall be entitled to vote for a member of the Senate."

It will be found that in all the States with the exception of South Carolina the rule of American representation as settled by the States during the revolutionary era, that great period which stirred men's hearts in favor of liberty, was on freemen and not on numbers, as the Senator from Maryland supposes. The rule of American representation, as taught authoritatively by the States, the only authority that was then known to the nation or is indeed now conceded by the Senator was invariably, with a single exception, on freemen, on the citizens; and it should be remarked that in no single instance, with the exception which I have noted, was there any exception on account of race or color. I therefore respectfully submit to my honorable friend from Maryland that he is entirely mistaken in supposing that the rule of representation, either in the Constitution of the United States or as a great American principle of representation outside of the Constitution, and as taught by the States, was based on numbers.

The honorable Senator from Maryland put the inquiry whether it is to be supposed that the people of Maryland were laboring under the very extraordinary delusion from 1776, when their constitution was adopted, down to within a recent period, in supposing that they had a constitution of State government "republican in form," because it recognized the institution of slavery. Of course I join no issue with the honorable Senator on that proposition. I freely concede that according to the national Constitution of 1789, it is plainly inferable that States might be regarded as "republican in form" although they recognized the institution of slavery. I do not deny that. That is the history of the country. To deny that would be to deny the implication which arises from the Constitution. That was undoubtedly so.

But, sir, we are talking to-day, in the providence of God, not of what the Constitution of 1789 recognized as republican, but the Constitution having been amended so that slavery no longer exists, the question to-day is, what is republican in fact? If the honorable Senator is right in supposing that the slaves of Maryland when they were released from slavery by this new provision of the Constitution became freemen and citizens entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens of other States and of his own State, I ask him whether his State can be republican in form or in fact if now it denies to one fourth of its population the rights of citizens? That is the question that arises on the facts in this case. We are not arguing the case supposed by the honorable Senator from Maryland. That is a case made up on the constitution of Maryland of 1776. She has a free constitution to-day, and by the force of that constitution all her population are freemen and citizens, according to the interpretation which the honorable Senator himself gives it; and now being freemen and citizens, and that being the charter of the national Government, liberty and equal and exact justice to all men the rule, I ask the honorable Senator whether if his State should adopt a provision in her constitution which disqualified one fourth of her citizens arbitrarily on account of color, and denied them all civil and political rights, privileges, and immunities, that State would be republican in form or in fact? That is a case that arises on the facts we are considering. I undertake to maintain here, and will maintain it anywhere, that on the basis of a free constitution, one of the grand results of this terrible struggle through which the nation has passed, no State in this Union can be a republican State which does not accord equal civil privileges and rights and immunities to all its citizens; it cannot be republican either in law or in fact according to the fundamental principles of American liberty. This question of slavery in the national Constitution was exceptional; this question of slavery in the State constitutions was exceptional also. It was not in harmony with the great principle of American liberty. The principle which underlies our institutions, and which formed the rule was equal rights and equal protection to all men. I admit that we agreed in the Constitution of 1789 to recognize the exception; but the exception no longer exists, and the rule is absolute and ought to be omnipotent; there is nothing now in the way of its universality, and should now be held to be equal and exact justice to all men. The authority of this Government in this respect ought to be imperial everywhere, and it should protect its citizens against State authority and State interpretations in their rights, privileges, and immunities as citizens of the United States; and whenever it fails to do that, it will fail to command the respect of mankind.

I say, therefore, in reply to the inquiry of the honorable Senator, whether it is to be supposed that his State has labored under a delusion from 1776 down to the present time in supposing that its Government was republican in form up to the present hour, that up to the time of emancipation it was so, undoubtedly. But now the times have changed. Sufficient until that day was the evil thereof. We as a people are required now to conform our Constitution and our laws, as well as our morals and our ethics and our economies, to the great American rule, equal and exact justice to all men.

The opponents of this measure demand the immediate admission of these States without conditions for the national security and without protection for the freedmen. The rebel debts are still unrepudiated by those States and menace the public credit, while the national debt is unassumed by them. Secession is not annulled but repealed, and in condition for fresh opportunities to repeat its attack upon the national sovereignty. The freedmen have no protection in those States outside of that scanty and temporary protection, inadequate and precarious, which is afforded through the Freedmen's Bureau. Their rights of manhood are denied. Everybody knows that since these States have themselves become "reconstructed" they have enacted black codes and vagrant laws to take possession and control of these "freedmen." The great struggle to-day is for the possession of the negro now as in the past. That is the great struggle in the South. Slave-masters have lost their personal control over them. They demand now that they shall be remanded into their custody, they having the political power of the State. I read the sentiments, Mr. President, of a leading politician in the South in which the purpose is expressed in a sentence or two. Judge Humphreys, of Alabama, in endeavoring to induce that State to return to the Union, says:

"Gentlemen, our safest place is in the Union. Grant it the idea of chattel slavery is dead, if you please; our Democratic allies will give us back the race in the condition of forced laborers, and it does not matter in which state we have them, if we have them under our control."

Mr. President, the contest for chattel slavery is over, but the struggle for the possession of the negro as a forced laborer goes on, and we seem quite insensible to it. Under the pretense of a public necessity it is demanded that Congress admit these States into their relations with the Federal Union, requiring no security for the protection of this defenseless race, remanding them to the custody of their old masters, knowing that their object and their purpose is to hold them as an unprivileged and unprotected class. That such sentiments find expression on this floor is a matter, I think, of surprise.

The honorable Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Cowan], in the ardor—I hope it was—of his eloquent speech the other day, gave utterance to a similar sentiment, showing that the same insensibility still holds its power in this Senate. He talks upon this great question in connection with the restoration of these States of the inferiority of this race. He says the question of suffrage never was a question of color or race, but it was a question of inferior manhood, "an inferior article," to use the expressive phrase of the honorable Senator; and so it comes to this: on a proposition the object of which is to secure some rights to a race that we know have none accorded and are in the arbitrary power of those States, Senators rise in their places here and signify their determination to admit these States upon the floor of the Senate, give them political power and concede to them political rights to lord it over this race, seem to justify the contemplated injustice and inhumanity on the ground of "inferior manhood," the negro is an "inferior article!" They are not worthy the concern of an American statesman; they are waifs on society; they are nomadic; they are simply Africans; they have no place in the American Constitution; they are outside of society, outside of the objects of American law. This is "a white man's Government." Remand them to their old masters who we know purpose to oppress and deny them every civil right, and then with fresh memory of recent flagrant war reach out the hand of friendship to men whose hands are still red with the blood of our children, and welcome them upon this floor to places of authority and power with such purposes and for such ends!

Ho. OF REPS.

Rights of Citizens—Mr. Delano.

Mr. President, I am sorry to say this is not even the worst of it. The freedman has no protection at home, no hope of it here, and, alas! no hope of it anywhere. The saddest utterance that any American statesman has ever given expression to has fallen from him who at the present time occupies the highest place in the gift of the people of this country. I do not go out of my way to allude to it. I should not be doing my duty to this subject if I did not notice it. On this question of the defenselessness of this race, and whether the American people should extend the hand of protection to this race, let me read from a message sent to this Senate under circumstances which give it peculiar force:

"The idea upon which the slaves were assisted to their freedom was that on becoming free they would be a self-sustaining population."

In the first place, I think it may be thought a little singular that it should be announced that these people in any very high and lofty sense were "assisted to their freedom" at all. We never as a nation undertook to give them freedom on terms at all creditable to us. We denied interposition in their behalf, even, until it became obvious that Providence did not intend we should have our own liberty until we gave them a chance to help us by obtaining their own liberty; that was the ground we occupied. I deny that we volunteered to help the slave to his freedom on his account. The history of the times do not justify such assumption. We did not so much as propose to embrace his freedom in the objects of the war; nay, a great party in this country arrayed itself against every effort to aid him, and deprecated such efforts as contrary to the objects of the war; and when our late President at length came to the conclusion that we ought to declare the freedom of the slaves, how did he announce it to the world? As helping them to their freedom? As a measure of justice and humanity to the oppressed? No; but as helping ourselves to victory. He had felt the public pulse; he had watched the wondrous workings of Providence in the great conflict in which the nation was involved; he had seen the nation hang in the doubtful balances of war; he saw and came to realize that God in His providence did not intend that this nation should secure its own independence until it yielded the rights of the black. The negro was mustered into the military service to bear arms in defense of the Government; then the race was taken from the power of the rebellion and placed on the side of the nation. If it was understood, when he was "assisted to his freedom," that he was to take care of himself, was it not, at least, to be inferred that he was to have opportunity given him to do it; that he was not to be by the nation he served remanded to his old master and all opportunity cut off? That we have a right to ask for him. That we ought to demand. If we do less than that and fall so far short in our duty, we have no right to expect the smiles of Heaven or the approbation of the American people. Protection to the black man in a general way, opportunity, upon the principle, not that we helped him as a primary motive, but that he was essential to the nation; and that such was the order of Providence—such are the universal laws which govern the moral universe—that if we had, that it was only by delivering him that we could break the power of our enemies and secure our own liberty. I question the historical accuracy of what is assumed. The implication is that we helped him to his liberty, and now we have done all that is required of us. The nation cannot thus lightly put aside its obligations to a defenseless race called to its aid in its day of peril, it cannot so cancel its moral obligation to see to it that, having led them out of the land of bondage, they are not left to perish in the wilderness or be returned to a servitude even more heartless and cruel.

We know he is in the power of his old master, and our responsibility is not that we have not helped him, but we have helped his oppressor. We have put the old rebel master in authority, restored him to places of power, invested him with the power of the State, and propose to remand his former slave to his custody, to hem the law of the State. He reigns supreme to-day in all these States, and demands admission into these Halls, and it is demanded now that Congress open the door of these Halls and admit the old master, clothed with authority and power. We all know that the freedman has no protection, and now from the high places of power it is declared as indicative of "the policy" the Government will pursue to its late allies and faithful friends, that when we freed him it was understood that he should take care of himself. Mr. President, as sad as this picture is, it is by no means the worst of it. There is a sentiment in this message which shocks me, and which I fear will shock the sensibilities of mankind. Knowing the condition of the freedmen, his situation, that from the beginning he has been held by these States as without the pale of constitutional or legal protection; knowing the sentiments of that region of the country in which he is held in subjection, the painful symptom of the following is plain:

"In truth, however, each State, induced by its own wants and interests, will do what is necessary and proper to retain within its borders all the labor that is needed for the development of its resources. The laws that regulate supply and demand will maintain their course, and the wages of labor will be regulated thereby. There is no danger that the exceedingly great demand for labor will not operate in favor of the laborer."

Now, Mr. President, consider that that language is uttered as a reason for refusing to give the necessary executive consent to a law designed for the protection of the freedman, designed to protect him from his old master, to open up opportunities to him, to reach out the hand of the nation and stand between him and absolute want. To this homeless, houseless, defenseless wanderer who has no abiding place, the Congress of the United States proposed to reach out the hand of the nation and protect him and provide for his temporary wants, and with a knowledge of all the facts, the reply from the chief Executive is, "Leave him to the laws of demand and supply." The explanation for which is, there is no law or justice to which he can appeal. It is said that the courts of the States are open to him; let him appeal to the courts of the States; but does any one need be told that the State courts are closed forever against him; that there he has been dumb for long ages of oppression? Let him have recourse to the courts of the United States; that is to refer him to a court which has already determined that the common sentiment of this country was that the black man had no rights which that court were bound to respect. In a condition of destitution and suffering and want, the black man cries to the nation for recognition of his manhood, for protection; the nation answers back, there is for you no justice, no protection, no courts, no rights, civil or political; in the language of the chief Executive, you are left to "the great law of supply and demand."

Rights of Citizens.

SPEECH OF HON. C. DELANO,
OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 8, 1866.

The House having under consideration the bill (S. No. 61) entitled "An act to protect all persons in the United States in their civil rights and furnish the means of their vindication"—

Mr. DELANO said:

Mr. SPEAKER: In the few minutes allotted to me, I propose to put some questions to the gentleman from Iowa, chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, in reference to certain provisions of the bill under consideration. Of course I shall have no time to enter upon the discussion of the very grave, difficult, and important question which, in my judgment, is involved in this bill.

In my opinion the States lately in rebellion ought cheerfully and voluntarily to adopt and enforce by local legislation all the important features of this bill. If they omit or refuse to do so, then Congress should enforce upon them these measures, provided we have the power to do so conferred by the Constitution. But if this power has not been granted, then the fundamental law should be amended so as to enable Congress to protect and secure the rights of all her citizens in any and in every State where unjust, unequal, and discriminating legislation calls for the increase of the powers of the General Government.

In reference to the question of citizenship, which has been ably discussed by the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, I have no doubt. It needs no law, in my estimation, to make citizens of these emancipated people. They are citizens by law now; and our enactment can only declare the rights and privileges in this respect which already belong to them.

But, sir, notwithstanding this, notwithstanding I regard them as entitled to citizenship, I have serious difficulties in my own mind in reference to the power of Congress, under the Constitution as it is, to pass the bill which is before us. I shall vote for it, if possible. If I can be brought to believe that there is a reasonable probability of its constitutionality, so that I can justify my conscience in turning over the question of the power of Congress to pass this bill to the courts, I shall sustain it; but without some further light upon the question than I now have, I do feel that there are such difficulties in the way as call for a careful examination of the provisions of this bill, in a constitutional point of view, by the gentlemen who control this House.

Passing at once, therefore, to the consideration of the question, I direct attention to the first clause of the bill.

Before I do so, however, I will remark that in my opinion the bill would be very much improved and relieved from many of its serious difficulties and objectionable features if it were amended in accordance with the proposition suggested by my colleague, [Mr. BINGHAM.] I think that, with this amendment, I could myself now, without any further light on the subject, vote for it. But we must discuss it as it is, and I desire therefore to call the attention of the chairman of the Judiciary Committee to certain thoughts connected with the subject.

The first section of this bill provides that all citizens "shall have the same right to make and enforce contracts, to sue, be parties and give evidence, to inherit, purchase, lease, sell, hold, and convey real and personal property, and to full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings for the security of person and property as is enjoyed by white citizens." I desire to ask the chairman of the committee whether in his opinion this confers upon the emancipated race the right of being jurors.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I will very frankly

39TH CONG.. 1ST SESS.

Rights of Citizens—Mr. Delano.

HO. OF REPS.

answer the gentleman. I do not believe it confers that right upon the emancipated people, nor upon any portion of the people of the United States, who are not under the laws of the several States qualified to act as jurors.

Mr. DELANO. I have no doubt of the sincerity of the gentleman, and when I say to him that I have great confidence in his legal opinions, he may know my sincerity, and know also that I do not offer it as a compliment.

But, with all this, I must confess that it does seem to me that this bill necessarily confers the right of being jurors, if its provisions are carried out.

Let us look again at the provisions of the bill. "To full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings for the security of person and property, as is enjoyed by the white citizens." Now, I ask how "full and equal benefit" of all these laws "as is enjoyed by white citizens," can be conferred when you say that this class or race shall not sit in the jury-box?

But I cannot pursue this thought, for I have no time to analyze or illustrate it. It strikes me as apparent, however, that this bill may be fairly interpreted so as to confer upon this race the right of being jurors.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DELANO. Undoubtedly.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The words to which the gentleman has directed attention were not in the original bill, but were placed there by an amendment offered by myself. And the reason for offering it was this: it was thought by some persons that unless these qualifying words were incorporated in the bill, those rights might be extended to all citizens, whether male or female, majors or minors. So that the words are intended to operate as a limitation and not as an extension; and I think the very reason which was urged by those who desired the amendment to be incorporated in the bill, is an answer to the objection which the gentleman makes.

Mr. DELANO. I have no doubt the reason is as stated for introducing the words.

I turn now to another clause in the first section of the bill for the purpose of discussing the gentleman's explanation:

There shall be no discrimination in civil rights or immunities among the citizens of the United States in any State or Territory.

Now, I suppose that what follows after this is a limitation of this general declaration; and I do not see how the words that I have commented upon are a limitation, because they follow after giving the "right to make and enforce contracts, to sue, be parties and give evidence, to inherit, purchase, lease, sell, hold and convey." Then is added this clause, "and to full and equal benefit of all laws and privileges for the security of person and property, as is enjoyed by white citizens." It seems to me, therefore, that in the connection in which the words on which I am speaking are found in the bill, they are an enlargement or extension of specific rights enumerated in the bill. The entire clause enumerating rights, appears to have been a limitation of the first great declaration in the bill, that "there shall be no discrimination in civil rights or immunities, among the citizens of the United States in any State or Territory."

The gentleman, of course, will have more time to explain it hereafter, but thus it strikes me, and in my brief moments I can only point out the difficulties that occur to me.

Now, sir, if I am correct in this thought, I presume that the gentleman himself will shrink from the idea of conferring upon this race now, at this particular moment, the right of being jurors, or from so wording this bill as to leave it a serious question and render it debatable hereafter in the courts or elsewhere.

But I proceed to another phase of this bill. These people are given the right to be parties to suits, to give evidence, to inherit, and so forth. Now, I desire to ask the honorable chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary under what clause of the Constitution he claims Congress to have power to declare who shall be competent to give evidence in the State courts? Here is an express right to be witnesses in the State courts, secured by penalties, to this race. I take the first grant for the sake of argument; they are to have the right to be witnesses; and the second section, if it is not amended as my honorable colleague [Mr. BINGHAM] proposes, will make it a crime in a State court, in obedience to a State law, to refuse to give that right, and subjects the judges of State courts to punishment in the way pointed out in the bill, if they, under the laws of the States, refuse to let black men be witnesses. Now, sir, where is the authority in the fundamental law of this land for this Congress to declare who shall be witnesses in a State court? Is it in the old Constitution? And if so, in what clause? Or is it in the amendment to the Constitution abolishing slavery? I desire to hear from the gentleman upon that point.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I supposed the gentleman did not want to be interrupted.

Mr. DELANO. I am making inquiries for information. I want more light.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I place the power of Congress to secure to these citizens the right to testify in the courts upon the same basis exactly that I place the power of Congress to provide protection for the fundamental rights of the citizen commonly called civil rights, so that if the presence of a citizen in the witness-box of a court is necessary to protect his personal liberty, his personal security, his right to property, he shall not be deprived of that protection by a State law declaring that his mouth shall be sealed and that he shall not be a witness in that court. That is one of the protective remedies which must run with these great civil rights belonging to every citizen. And I will say to the gentleman that when I come to close the discussion on this bill I shall enlarge somewhat on this point if the temper of the House at the time shall disclose a disposition to hear further discussion.

Mr. DELANO. I do not feel myself answered. The gentleman has offered me some very general remarks. I will not say "glittering generalities," because I do not wish to be offensive, but I want him to name the clause of the Constitution in which he finds the power.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. If the gentleman had read my remarks at the opening of this debate he would have seen very distinctly the provision of the Constitution upon which I base this bill so far as it relates to persons who are liable to be reduced to a condition of slavery, and that is the amendment to the Constitution abolishing slavery and conferring an express delegation of power upon Congress.

But I placed it upon a broader ground, and it was this: that these people, being entitled to certain rights as citizens of the United States, were entitled to protection in those rights, and that the power thus to protect them is necessarily implied from the entire body of the Constitution, which was made for the protection of these rights, and upon the duty of the Government to enforce and protect all those rights. I based the power of Congress to select the means in accordance with the doctrines laid down in the case of McCulloch, vs. The State of Maryland.

Mr. DELANO. The duties of this Government rest upon the powers of the Government. The duties of this Congress rest upon its constitutional powers, and those powers are to be derived from the Constitution if found at all.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question that may enable us both to get some light in relation to this subject?

Mr. DELANO. Certainly.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desire to ask this question: does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DELANO] believe that persons as citizens of the United States are entitled to any rights? If they are entitled to any rights, are the great fundamental civil rights of life, liberty, and property involved among them?

And if they are entitled, as citizens of the United States, to those rights, are they entitled to protection of those rights from the hands of the Government? And should a State enact laws and attempt to enforce them which will deprive the citizens of the United States of those rights, may we not intervene to protect them in spite of those laws of the State?

Mr. DELANO. I believe that the citizens of the States are entitled to many rights. I believe that those rights are to be guaranteed and sustained and enforced by the laws of the States under the constitutions of the States, and by the Congress of the United States when there is power given by the Constitution of the United States to enforce those rights.

But I do not believe that the rights of the States are utterly overwhelmed and dethroned. I know that for years we have been swinging the pendulum of public opinion toward the doctrine of State rights until it threatened the subversion of the Federal Government. And I stand here in my place to-day to say that one of the most serious apprehensions I have, in the extreme of public opinion fluctuating from one point to another, is that we may fall into an error about as great and dangerous as that which has caused us these long years of bloody war.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. If the gentleman will pardon me again, I will say that I do not think I have received an answer to my question.

Mr. DELANO. Wait till I get through with my reply. I did not think the gentleman answered my question, but I allowed him to go on until he had said all he desired to say.

I suppose there are certain rights of citizenship that are exclusively within the control of the States, under the constitutions of the States. And by way of refreshing our memories in reference to the opinions of the fathers, I will call the attention of gentlemen to what Mr. Hamilton once said upon this subject. He once discussed this subject, and alluded to it in a way worthy of our attention to-day. He was answering an objection made before the public that the clause of the Constitution giving Congress the power to make all laws rendered necessary by the specific grants of power might be abused. He went on to show that that clause did not enlarge the powers of Congress, that it did not confer upon Congress anything that had not been specifically given. He says:

"If there be anything exceptionable it must be sought for in the specific powers upon which the general declaration is predicated."

Thereby saying, what I say here to-day, that the powers of Congress are specific powers, and that beyond those specific powers Congress cannot go without violating the Constitution. Following up that idea, he illustrates it, as follows:

"The propriety of a law, in a constitutional light must always be determined by the nature of the power upon which it is founded. Suppose by some forced construction of its power, which indeed cannot easily be imagined, the Federal Government should attempt to vary the law of descent in a State, would it not be evident that in making such an attempt it had exceeded its jurisdiction?"—Federalist, No. 32.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. PATTERSON.) The time, twenty minutes, which the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAYMOND] yielded to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DELANO] has now expired.

Mr. DAVIS. I hope the time of the gentleman will be extended.

Mr. BINGHAM. I do not desire to interrupt my colleague, [Mr. DELANO.] But I desire to be heard in advocacy of the amendment to this bill which I have offered.

Mr. RAYMOND. I am quite willing to yield the remainder of my hour to the two gentlemen from Ohio, [Mr. DELANO and Mr. BINGHAM.] and they can arrange its division between themselves.

Mr. DAVIS. I move that the time of my

HO. OF REPS.

Rights of Citizens—Mr. Delano.

39TH CONG....1ST SESS.

colleague [Mr. RAYMOND] be extended for half an hour, and he can then yield portions of it to the other gentlemen.

Objection was made.

Mr. BINGHAM. I will yield to my colleague, [Mr. DELANO,] and trust to the indulgence of the House for an opportunity to be heard upon this subject.

Mr. DELANO. I was proceeding to remark, when my time expired, that Mr. Hamilton took the case of an effort on the part of Congress to interfere with the law of descent in a State.

And that brings me to the consideration of another clause in this bill. "All citizens shall have an equal right to inherit." Suppose a State Legislature declares that in the case of a person dying intestate the heirs shall inherit, excluding those who are of African or mixed blood. That would be illustrated in the case of a man who married first a white woman, by whom he had white children, and then married a black woman, by whom he had children of mixed blood. The State legislation is such as to exclude the children of mixed blood from the inheritance.

Now, sir, should this bill be passed that law of the State might be overthrown by the power of Congress. In my opinion, if we adopt the principle of this bill we declare in effect that Congress has authority to go into the States and manage and legislate with regard to all the personal rights of the citizen—rights of life, liberty, and property. You render this Government no longer a Government of limited powers; you concentrate and consolidate here an extent of authority which will swallow up all or nearly all of the rights of the States with respect to the property, the liberties, and the lives of its citizens.

This thought is illustrated by Mr. Madison; and for the purpose of directing the attention of the chairman of the Judiciary Committee [Mr. WILSON] to it, I will read the language of Mr. Madison from No. 45 of the Federalist:

"The powers reserved to the Federal States will extend to all the objects which, in the ordinary course of affairs, concern the lives, liberties, and properties of the people, and the internal order, improvement, and prosperity of the State."

Any one who has studied the Constitution of the United States knows that it was designed to establish a Government with limited powers, powers restricted to the necessary objects of its existence and the proper discharge of the great duties devolving upon it. It was never designed to take away from the States the right of controlling their own citizens in respect to property, liberty, and life. If we now go on in a system of legislation based upon the assumption that Congress possesses the right of supreme control in this respect, I submit whether we are not assisting to build up a consolidated Government in view of the powers of which we may well tremble.

Pursuing this train of thought, I might go on and show that the authority assumed as the warrant for this bill would enable Congress to exercise almost any power over a State. Sir, we have had in the State of Ohio until a very recent period a law excluding the black man from being a witness in a court of justice. I do not know but that laws of a similar character still exist in some of the States. It is but a little while since Indiana repealed a law of that sort.

Mr. NIBLACK. The gentleman will allow me to say that that law is only partially repealed. We had a constitution prohibiting all negroes from coming into the State since November 1, 1851. An act of the last session of the Legislature allows all negroes who were in the State before this constitutional provision went into operation to testify in all cases; but negroes who have come into the State since, in violation of our constitution, are still prohibited from testifying against white people. They can only testify in our courts in cases where negroes or mulattoes are the parties.

Mr. DELANO. Then, as a matter of course, if this bill be passed, negroes who have come into the State of Indiana in violation of her constitution will be entitled to testify. This bill would override the legislation of that State.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio a question, suggested by the remark of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. NIBLACK.] If the negro is a citizen of the United States, has the State of Indiana a right to pass a law, fundamental or statutory, declaring that such a citizen of the United States shall not come within the State of Indiana?

Mr. DELANO. That is another question which I will answer when it comes up appropriately for discussion. What I am asking is, has the State of Indiana a right to pass a law declaring that such a citizen shall not be a witness in court? Everybody knows that from the beginning of our Government to the present time this question as to who shall be a competent witness in the courts of the State has been left to be determined by the legislation of the State. Not long since the law of Ohio excluded from the witness-stand a man who was an infidel. A law of that kind still exists in some of the States. But the theory upon which this bill rests would uproot all the power of State legislation to regulate this question.

Nay, more, sir; we once had in the State of Ohio a law excluding the black population from any participation in the public schools or in the funds raised for the support of those schools. That law did not, of course, place the black population upon an equal footing with the white, and would, therefore, under the terms of this bill be void, and those attempting to execute it would be subjected to punishment by fine or imprisonment.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio whether he believes—

Mr. DELANO. I have so little time remaining that, with the utmost desire to be courteous, I must decline to be interrupted further.

Now, sir, I proceed to inquire whether the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery confers on Congress the power to enact a measure of this character. That amendment provides—

"1. That neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States or any place subject to their jurisdiction."

"2. Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation."

Now, what is this provision of the Constitution? It is the abolition of slavery and involuntary servitude. It is authority by Congress to pass proper legislation for the enforcement of that principle. Now, sir, can it be claimed by fair reasoning that the right to testify is necessarily incident to freedom? If this can be claimed, then there is authority to pass this law.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The gentleman will pardon me for an interruption. Suppose that the only person witnessing a state of facts necessary to be given in court for the protection of life, liberty, and property should be a black man, has the State the right to say that that man, the only person living who has a knowledge of the facts to protect a citizen, should have no right to testify?

Mr. DELANO. I acknowledge myself surprised that the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives of the United States of America should rise and ask me, when I am discussing a principle of power, whether an extreme case, such as he has put, would be an authority for violating the fundamental law of the land!

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. No, sir; I ask whether the Constitution of the United States is so framed that the rights of protection cannot be established in the laws made by Congress?

Mr. DELANO. Does the gentleman believe the Constitution of the United States is so framed as to say this power may be exercised? The simple question now is, whether the right to testify as a witness is a necessary incident to freedom.

Mr. NIBLACK. If the gentleman will permit me, I will respond to the gentleman from Iowa. I ask whether under most of the State laws the wife is not prohibited from testifying against the husband, or vice versa? Now, would not his objection as well apply to that?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. It is not so in many of the State laws; but then I answer the gentleman in the language of the bill referred to by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DELANO] a few moments ago, these rights are to be the same as are enjoyed by white citizens.

Mr. NIBLACK. The question is very proper.

Mr. DELANO. I must beg the gentleman not to interrupt me again.

Suppose a State Legislature should apply some qualification to the competency of a white man as a witness, say of religious belief, and it turns out on the trial that the only witness who can prove the facts is the man under this disqualification, what becomes of the gentleman's argument founded on the extreme case put by him?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. MYERS. I move the gentleman's time be extended.

Mr. RAYMOND. I believe I had the floor, and that it was extended thirty minutes beyond the hour, so that the hour having expired, I still have thirty minutes left.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. KERR] has been recognized.

Mr. KERR. I will yield to the gentleman from Ohio if it does not come out of my time.

Mr. DELANO. I only want ten minutes.

Mr. MYERS. I move the gentleman's time be extended ten minutes, and that it does not come out of the time of the gentleman from Indiana.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. DELANO. Mr. Speaker, I was about to remark there are certain powers that may be exercised under this amendment of the Constitution vastly important to the emancipated race. I have anticipated unfriendly legislation in the South; but I have felt a consolation in the power of Congress under this clause of the Constitution to prevent certain unfriendly legislation which has presented itself to my imagination; for instance, to establish in the South a system of peonage, or any system of laws that would interfere with the liberty of this race. It would then be in the power of Congress under this clause of the Constitution to modify and prevent such legislation. We proclaimed freedom to this race, and reserved to ourselves the power to enforce it, but we did not reserve to ourselves the power to enter the States and regulate the domestic relations of life, liberty, and property.

We did reserve to ourselves the power of preventing unfriendly legislation that would interfere with liberty. No lawyer who will reason like a lawyer, I think, can take that act and tell me that he believes that the right to testify or to inherit is a necessary condition of freedom, because we know from the whole history of our State legislation that such discriminations have been made. Aliens have been prevented from inheriting, and discriminations in inheritance, as well as in the right to testify, have been made by State legislation, and no one thought it an interference with the liberty of the citizen.

I must say, therefore, that I do not see how we can sustain the principles of this bill. I said in the outset that I wanted to see the provisions of this bill adopted or enforced upon the South, and it was with this thought before me that I introduced, at an early day of the session, an amendment to the Constitution requiring each State to provide for the security of life, liberty, and property, and the rightful pursuit of happiness, and giving to Congress power to enforce these rights where the States withheld them. That, in my estimation, is a better theory of proceeding on this subject than the one introduced by my colleague, which proposes to vest that power in Congress at once; because I want Congress to exercise no more power over the local legislation of the States than is absolutely necessary, and I would not allow it to go in the first instance to secure these rights, but allow it to go only when the States refuse to apply and give such security under the fundamental law of the nation.

I am still of opinion that if this subject is developed and investigated as it should be, that if we do anything upon this subject at all, we had better do it by taking up the amendment to the Constitution offered by my colleague, [Mr. BINGHAM,] now postponed till April, modifying it in the form I have suggested, and making it the fundamental law, and then proceeding to secure the rights of these persons in a way in which we shall not be trampling down or endangering the fundamental law of the land.

I am not to be understood as denying the power of this Government, especially that great war power which, when evoked, has no limit except as it is limited by necessity and the laws of civilized warfare. But, sir, in time of peace I would not and I cannot stand here and attempt the exercise of powers by this General Government which, if carried out with all the logical consequences that follow their assumption, will, in my opinion, endanger the liberties of the country.

I will not detain the House any longer. I have not been able to illustrate as I would, had I had time, this question. But I have endeavored to present it in such a form as will awaken investigation and bring the minds of members to the consideration of this important question. For it is just as important that we should not swing back into the assertion of powers in this Government that do not belong to it, as that we should not go to the other extreme of asserting the existence of powers in a State that do not belong to it. Let us take a calm, philosophical, and statesmanlike view of the condition of things in which we are placed; proceeding under no impulse such as has necessarily grown up under the terrible training we have had; proceeding with caution and deliberation, and taking care to preserve the constitutional rights both of the States and of the General Government.

We have a Government of which we may be proud, a Government that is to live, a Government that rests upon granted powers of a limited character; and if we sustain it and do not make it a tyranny, do not convert it into a usurpation, it will be a Government loved by the people, cherished by the people, wherein civil liberty will be established, I trust, forever, and the power of man for self-government be illustrated.

ON THE LIFE AND CHARACTER

HENRY WINTER DAVIS,

BY

HON. JOHN A. J. CRESWELL,

February 22, 1866.

The death of Hon. Henry Winter Davis, for many years a distinguished Representative of one of the Baltimore congressional districts, created a deep sensation among those who had been associated with him in national legislation, and they deemed it fitting to pay to his memory unusual honors. They adopted resolutions expressive of their grief, and invited

Hon. John A. J. Creswell, a Senator of the United States from the State of Maryland, to deliver an oration on his life and character, in the Hall of the House of Representatives, on the 22d of February, a day the recurrence of which ever gives increased warmth to patriotic emotions.

The Hall of the House was filled by a distinguished audience to listen to the oration. Before eleven o'clock the galleries were crowded in every part. The flags above the Speaker's desk were draped in black, and other insignia of mourning were exhibited. An excellent portrait of the late Hon. Henry Winter Davis was visible through the folds of the national banner above the Speaker's chair. As on the occasion of the oration on President Lincoln by Hon. George Bancroft, the Marine band occupied the ante-room of the reporters' gallery and discoursed appropriate music.

At twelve o'clock the Senators entered, and the Judges of the Supreme Court, preceded by Chief Justice Chase. The President of the United States had been invited but was not present. The only members of the Cabinet present were Secretary Stanton and Secretary McCulloch. After prayer by the Chaplain, the Declaration of Independence was read by Hon. Edward McPherson, Clerk of the House. After the reading of the Declaration, followed by the playing of a dirge by the band.

Hon. SCHUYLER COLFAX, Speaker of the House of Representatives, rose and said:

Ladies and Gentlemen: The duty has been devolved upon me of introducing to you the friend and fellow-member, here, of Henry Winter Davis, and I shall detain you but a moment from his address, to which you will listen with saddened interest.

The world always appreciates and honors courage. The courage of Christianity, which sustained martyrs in the amphitheater, at the stake, and on the rack. The courage of patriotism, which inspired millions in our own land to realize the historic fable of Curtius, and to fill up with their own bodies, if need be, the yawning chasm which imperiled the Republic. The courage of humanity, which is witnessed in the pest-house and the hospital, at the death-bed of the homeless and the prison-cell of the convict. But there is a courage of statesmen, besides, and nobly was it illustrated by the statesman whose national services we commemorate to-day. Inflexibly hostile to oppression, whether of slaves on American soil or of republicans struggling in Mexico against monarchical invasion, faithful always to principle and liberty, championing always the cause of the downtrodden, fearless as he was eloquent in his avowals, he was mourned throughout a continent, and from the Patapasco to the Gulf the blessings of those who had been ready to perish followed him to his tomb. It is fitting, therefore, though dying a private citizen, that the nation should render him such marked and unusual honors in this Hall, the scene of so many of his intellectual triumphs; and I have great pleasure in introducing to you as the orator of the day Hon. J. A. J. Creswell, his colleague in the Thirty-Eighth Congress, and now Senator from the State of Maryland.

Hon. J. A. J. CRESWELL then delivered the following

ORATION:

My Countrymen: On the 22d day of February, 1732, God gave to the world the highest type of humanity in the person of George Washington. Combining within himself the better qualities of the soldier, sage, statesman, and patriot, alike brave, wise, discreet, and incorruptible, the common consent of mankind has awarded him the incomparable title of Father of his Country. Among all nations and in every clime the richest treasures of language have been exhausted in the effort to transmit to posterity a faithful record of his deeds. For him unfading laurels are secure, so long as letters shall survive and history shall continue to be the guide and teacher of civilized men. The whole human race has become the self-appointed guardian of his fame, and the name of Washington will be ever held, over all the earth, to be synonymous with the highest perfection attainable in public or private life, and coeternal with that immortal love to which reason and revelation have together toiled to elevate human aspirations—the love of liberty, restrained and guarded by law.

But in the presence of the Omnipotent how insignificant is the proudest and the noblest of men! Even Washington, who alone of his kind could fill that comprehensive epitome of General Henry Lee, so often on our lips, "First in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen," was allowed no exemption from the common lot of mortals. In the sixty-eighth year of his age he, too, paid the debt of nature.

The dread announcement of his demise sped over the land like a pestilence, burdening the very air with mourning, and carrying inexpressible sorrow to every household and every heart. The course of legislation was stopped in mid career to give expression to the grief of Congress, and by resolution, approved January 6, 1800, the 22d of February of that year was devoted to national humiliation and lamentation. This is, then, as well a day of sorrow as a day of rejoicing.

More recent calamities also remind us that death is universal king. Just ten days ago our great historian pronounced in this Hall an impartial judgment upon the earthly career of him who, as savior of his country, will be counted as the compeer of Washington. Scarce have the orator's lingering tones been mellowed into silence; scarce has the glowing page, whereon his words were traced, lost the impress of his passing hand, yet we are again called into the presence of the Inexorable to crown one more illustrious victim with sacrificial flowers. Having taken up his lifeless body, as beautiful as the dead Absalom, and laid it in the tomb with becoming solemnity, we have assembled in the sight of the world to do deserved honor to the name and memory of Henry Winter Davis, a native of Annapolis, in the State of Maryland, but always proudly claiming to be no less than a citizen of the United States of America.

We have not convened in obedience to any formal custom, requiring us to assume an empty show of bereavement, in order that we may appear respectfully to the departed. We who knew Henry Winter Davis are not content to clothe ourselves in the outward garb of grief, and call the semblance of mourning a fitting tribute to the gifted orator and statesman, so suddenly snatched from our midst in the full glory of his mental and bodily strength. We would do more than "bear about the mockery of woe." Prompted by a genuine affection, we desire to ignore all idle and merely conventional ceremonies, and permit our stricken hearts to speak their spontaneous sorrow.

Here, then, where he sat for eight years as a Representative of the people; where friends have trooped about him, and admiring crowds have paid homage to his genius; where grave legislators have yielded themselves willing captives to his eloquence, and his wise counsel has molded, in no small degree, the law of a great nation, let us, in dealing with what he has left us, verify the saying of Bacon, "Death openeth the good fame and extinguisheth envy." Remembering that he was a man of like passions and equally fallible with ourselves, let us review his life in a spirit of generous candor, applaud what is good and try to profit by it; and if we find aught of ill, let us, so far as justice and truth will permit, cover it with the veil of charity and bury it out of sight forever. So may our survivors do for us.

The subject of this address was born on the 16th of August, 1817.

His father, Rev. Henry Lyou Davis, of the Protestant Episcopal church, was president of St. John's College at Annapolis, Maryland, and rector of St. Ann's parish. He was of imposing person, and great dignity and force of character. He was, moreover, a man of genius, and of varied and profound learning, eminently versed in mathematics and natural sciences, abounding in classical lore, endowed with a vast memory, and gifted with a concise, clear, and graceful style; rich and fluent in conversation, but without the least pretension to oratory and wholly incapable of extempore speaking. He was removed from the presidency of St. John's by a board of Democratic trustees because of his Federal politics; and, years afterward, he gave his son his only lesson in politics at the end of a letter, addressed to him when at Kenyon College, in this laconic sentence: "My son, beware of the follies of Jacksonism."

His mother was Jane Brown Winter, a woman of elegant accomplishments and of great sweetness of disposition and purity of life. It might be truthfully said of her, that she was an exemplar for all who knew her. She had only two children, Henry Winter, and Jane who married Rev. Edward Syle.

The education of Henry Winter began very early, at home, under the care of his aunt, Elizabeth Brown Winter, who entertained the most rigid and exacting opinions in regard to the training of children, but who was withal a noble woman. He once playfully said, "I could read before I was four years old, though much against my will." When his father was removed from St. John's, he went to Wilmington, Delaware, but some time elapsed before he became settled there. Meanwhile, Henry Winter remained with his aunt in Alexandria, Virginia. He afterward went to Wilmington, and was there instructed under his father's supervision. In 1827 his father returned to Maryland and settled in Anne Arundel county.

After reaching Anne Arundel, Henry Winter became so much devoted to out-door life that he gave small promise of scholarly proficiency. He affected the sportsman, and became a devoted disciple of Nimrod; accompanied always by one of his father's slaves he roamed the country with a huge old fowling-piece on his shoulder, burning powder in abundance, but doing little damage otherwise. While here he saw much of slaves and slavery, and what he saw impressed him profoundly, and laid the foundation for those opinions which he so heroically and constantly defended in all his after-life. Referring to this period, he said long afterward, "My familiar association with the slaves while a boy gave me great insight into their feelings and views. They spoke with freedom before a boy what they would have repressed before a man. They were far from indifferent to their condition; they felt wronged and sighed for freedom. They were attached to my father and loved me, yet they habitually spoke of the day when God would deliver them."

He subsequently went to Alexandria, and was sent to school at Howard, near the Theological Seminary, and from Howard he went to Kenyon College, in Ohio, in the fall of 1833.

Kenyon was then in the first year of the presidency of Bishop McIlvaine. It was the center of vast forests, broken only by occasional clearings, excepting along the lines of the National road, and the Ohio river and its navigable tributaries. In this wilderness of nature, but garden of letters, he remained, at first in the grammar school, and then in the college, until the 6th of September, 1837; when at twenty years of age he took his degree and diploma, decorated with one of the honorary orations of his class, on the great day of commencement. His subject was "Scholastic Philosophy."

At the end of the Freshman year, a change in the college terms gave him a vacation of three months. Instead of spending it in idleness, as he might have done, and as most boys would have done, he availed himself of this interval to pursue and complete the studies of the Sophomore year, to which he had already given some attention in his spare moments. At the opening of the next session he passed the examination for the Junior class. Fortunately I have his own testimony and opinion as to this exploit, and I give them in his own language:

"It was a pretty sharp trial of resolution and dogged diligence, but it saved me a year of college, and indurated my powers of study and mental culture into a habit, and perhaps enabled me to stay long enough to graduate. I do not recommend the example to those who are independently situated, for learning must fall like the rain in such gentle showers as to sink in if it is to be fruitful; when poured on the richest soil in torrents, it not only runs off without strengthening vegetation, but washes away the soil itself."

His college life was laborious and successful. The regular studies were prosecuted with diligence, and from them he derived great profit, not merely in knowledge, but in what is of vastly more account, the habit and power of mental labor. These studies were wrought into his mind and made part of the intellectual substance by the vigorous collisions of the societies in which he delighted. For these mimic conflicts he prepared assiduously, not in writing, but always with a carefully deduced logical analysis and arrangement of the thoughts to be developed in the order of argument, with a brief note of any quotation, or image, or illustration, on the margin at the appropriate place. From that brief he spoke. And this was his only method of preparation for all the great conflicts in which he took part in after life. He never wrote out his speeches beforehand.

Speaking of his feelings at the end of his college life, he sadly said:

"My father's death had embittered the last days of the year 1836, and left me without a counselor. I knew something of books, nothing of men, and I went forth like Adam among the wild beasts of the unknown wilderness of the world. My father had dedicated me to the ministry, but the day had gone when such dedications determined the lives of young men. Theology as a grave topic of historic and metaphysical investigation I delighted to pursue, but for the ministry I had no calling. I would have been idle if I could, for I had no ambition, but I had no fortune and I could not beg or starve."

All, who were acquainted with his temperament, can well imagine, what a gloomy prospect the future presented to him, when its contemplation wrung from his stoical taciturnity that touching confession.

The truth is, that from the time he entered college he was continually cramped for want of money. The negroes ate everything that was produced on the farm in Anne Arundel, a gastronomic feat, which they could easily accomplish, without ever having cause to complain of a surfeit. His aunt, herself in limited circumstances, by a careful husbandry of her means, managed to keep him at college. Kenyon was then a manual-labor institution, and the boys were required to sweep their own rooms, make their own beds and fires, bring their own water, black their own boots, if they ever were blacked, and take an occasional turn at grubbing in the fields or working on the roads. There was no royal road to learning known at Kenyon in those days. Through all this Henry Winter Davis passed, bearing his part manfully; and knowing how heavily he taxed the slender purse of his aunt, he denied himself with such rigor that he succeeded, incredible as it may appear, in bringing his total expenses, including boarding and tuition, within the sum of eighty dollars per annum.

His father left an estate consisting only of some slaves, which were equally apportioned between himself and sister. Frequent applications were made to purchase his slaves, but he never could be induced to sell them, although the proceeds would have enabled him to pursue his studies with ease and comfort. He rather sought and obtained a tutorship, and for two years he devoted to law and letters only the time he could rescue from its drudgery. In a letter, written in April, 1839, replying to the request of a relative who offered to purchase his slave Sallie, subject to the provisions of his father's will, which manumitted her if she would go to Liberia, he said: "But if she is under my control," (he did not know that she had been set to his share,) "I will not consent to the sale, though he wishes to purchase her subject to the will." And so Sallie was not sold, and Henry Winter Davis, the tutor, toiled on and waited. He never would hold any of his slaves under his authority, never would accept a cent of their wages, and tendered each and all of them a deed of absolute manumission whenever the law would allow. Tell me, was that man sincere in his opposition to slavery? How many of those who have since charged him with being selfish and reckless in his advocacy of emancipation would have shown equal devotion to principle? Not one; not one. Ah! the man who works and suffers for his opinions' sake places his own flesh and blood in pledge for his integrity.

Notwithstanding his irksome and exacting duties, he kept his eye steadily on the University of Virginia, and read, without assistance, a large part of its course. He delighted especially in the pungent pages of Tacitus and the glowing and brilliant, dignified and elevated epic of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire. These were favorites which never lost their charm for him. When recently on a visit at my house, he stated in conversation that he often exercised himself in translating from the former, and in transferring the thoughts of the latter into his own language, and he contended that the task had dispelled the popular error that Gibbon's style is swollen and declamatory; for he alleged that every effort at condensation had proved a failure, and that at the end of his labors the page he had attempted to compress had always expanded to the eye, when relieved of the weighty and stringent fetters in which the gigantic genius of Gibbon had bound it.

About this time, the only period when doubts beset him, he was tempted by a very advantageous offer to settle in Mississippi. He determined to accept, but some kind spirit interposed to prevent the dispatch of the final letter, and he remained in Alexandria. At last his aunt, second mother as she was, sold some land and dedicated the proceeds to his legal studies. He arrived at the University of Virginia in October, 1839.

From that moment he entered actively and unremittently on his course of intellectual training. While a boy he had become familiar, under the guidance of his father, with the classics of Addison, Johnson, Swift, Cowper, and Pope, and he now plunged into the domain of history. He had begun at Kenyon to make flanking forays into the fields of historic investigation which lay so invitingly on each side of the regular march of his college course. As he acquired more information and confidence these forays became more extensive and profitable. It was then the transition period from the shallow though graceful pages of Gillies, Rollin, Russell, and Tytler, and the rabbinical agglomerations of Shuckford and Prideaux to the modern school of free, profound, and laborious investigation, which has reared immortal monuments to its memory in the works of Hallam, Macaulay, Grote, Bancroft, Prescott, Motley, Niebuhr, Bunsen, Schlosser, Thiers, and their fellows. But of the last-named none except Niebuhr's History of Rome, and Hallam's Middle Ages, were accessible to him in the backwoods of Ohio. Cousin's Course of the History of Modern Philosophy was just glittering in the horizon, and Gibbon shone alone as the morning-star of the day of historic research, which he had heralded so long. The French Revolution he had seen only as presented in Burke's brilliant vituperation and Scott's Tory diatribe. A republican picture of the great republican revolution, the fountain of all that is now tolerable in Europe, had not then been presented on any authentic and comprehensive page.

Not only these, but all historical works of value, which the English, French, and German languages can furnish, with an immense amount of other intellectual pabulum, were eagerly gathered, consumed with voracious appetite, and thoroughly digested. Supplied at last with the required means he braced himself for a systematic curriculum of law, and pursued it with marked constancy and success. While at the university he also took up the German and French languages and mastered them, and he perfected his scholarship in Latin and Greek. Until his death he read all these languages with great facility and accuracy, and he always kept his Greek Testament lying on his table for easy reference.

After a thorough course at the university Mr. Davis entered upon the practice of the law in Alexandria, Virginia. He began his profession without much to cheer him; but he was not the man to abandon a pursuit for lack of courage. His ability and industry attracted attention, and before long he had acquired a respectable practice, which thenceforth protected him from all annoyances of a pecuniary nature. He toiled with unwearied assiduity, never appearing in the trial of a cause without the most elaborate and exhaustive preparation, and soon became known to his professional brethren as a valuable ally and a formidable foe. His natural aptitude for public affairs made itself manifest in due time, and some articles which he prepared on municipal and State politics gave him great reputation. He also published a series of newspaper essays, wherein he dared to question the divinity of slavery; and these, though at the time thought to be not beyond the limits of free discussion, were cited against him long after as evidence that he was a heretic in pro-slavery Virginia and Maryland.

On the 30th of October, 1845, he married Miss Constance T. Gardiner, daughter of William C. Gardiner, Esq., a most accomplished and charming young lady, as beautiful and as fragile as a flower. She lived to gladden his heart for but a few years, and then—

"Like a lily drooping,
She bowed her head and died."

In 1850 he came to Baltimore, and immediately a high position, professional, social, and political, was awarded him. His forensic efforts at once commanded attention and enforced respect. The young men of most ability and promise gathered about him, and made him the center of their chosen circle. He became a prominent member of the Whig party, and was everywhere known as the brilliant orator and successful controvertist of the Scott campaign of 1852. The Whig party, worn out by its many gallant but unsuccessful battles, was ultimately gathered to its fathers, and Mr. Davis led off in the American movement. He was elected successively to the Thirty-Fourth, Thirty-Fifth, and Thirty-Sixth Congresses by the American party from the fourth district of Maryland. He supported with great ability and zeal Mr. Fillmore for the Presidency in 1856, and in 1860 accepted John Bell as the candidate of his party, though he clearly divined and plainly announced that the great battle was really between Abraham Lincoln, as the representative of the national sentiment on the one hand, and secession and disunion in all their shades and phases on the other. To his seat in the Thirty-Eighth Congress he was elected by the Unconditional Union party.

Since the adjournment of the Thirty-Eighth Congress he had been profoundly concerned in the momentous public questions now pressing for adjustment, and he did not fail on several fitting occasions to give his views at length to the public. Nevertheless, he frequently alluded to his earnest desire to retreat for awhile from the perplexing annoyances of public life. He had determined upon a long visit to Europe in the coming spring, and had almost concluded the purchase of a delightful country seat, where he hoped to recruit his weary brain for years to come from the exhaustless riches of nature. When the Thirty-Ninth Congress met, and he read of his old companions in the work of legislation again gathering in their Halls and committee-rooms, I think, for at least a day or two, he felt a longing to be among them. During the second week of the session he again entered this Hall, but only as a spectator. The greeting he received, so general, spontaneous, and cordial, from gentlemen on both sides of the House, touched his heart most sensibly. The crowd that gathered about him was so great that the party was obliged to retire to one of the larger ante-rooms for fear of interrupting the public business. A delightful interview among old friends was the reward. He was charmed with his reception, and mentioned it to me with intense satisfaction. Little did you, gentlemen, then think that between you and a beloved friend the curtain that shrouds eternity was so soon to be interposed. His sickness was of about a week's duration. Until the morning of the day preceding his death, his friends never doubted his recovery. Later in the day very unfavorable symptoms appeared, and all then realized his danger. In the evening his wife spoke to him of a visit, for one day, which he had projected to his old friend, Mrs. S. F. Du Pont, when he replied in the last words he ever uttered, "It shows the folly of making plans even for a day." He continued to fail rapidly in strength until two o'clock on the afternoon of Saturday, the 30th of December, when Henry Winter Davis, in the forty-ninth year of his age, appeared before his God. His death confirmed the opinion of Sir Thomas Browne, who declared, "Marshaling all the horrors of death and contemplating the extremities thereof, I find not anything therein able to daunt the courage of a man, much less a well-resolved Christian." He passed away so quietly that no one knew the moment of his departure. His was—

"A death, like sleep;
A gentle wafting to immortal life."

Mr. Davis left a widow, Mrs. Nancy Davis, a daughter of John B. Morris, Esq., of Baltimore, and two little girls, who were the idols of his heart. He was married a second time on the 26th of January, 1857. His nearest surviving collateral relation is Hon. David Davis, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, who is his only cousin—german. To all these afflicted hearts may God be most gracious.

Thus has the country lost one of the most able, eloquent, and fearless of its defenders. Called from this life at an age when most men are just beginning to command the respect and confidence of their fellows, he has left, nevertheless, a fame as wide as our vast country. He died nineteen years younger than Washington and eight years younger than Lincoln. At forty-eight years of age Washington had not seen the glories of Yorktown even in a vision, nor had Lincoln dreamed of the presidential chair; and if they had died at that age they would have been comparatively unknown in history. Doubtless God would have raised up other leaders, if they had been wanting, to conduct the great American column, which He has chosen to be the body-guard of human rights and hopes, onward among the nations and the centuries; but in that event the 12th and 22d days of February would not be, as they now are, held sacred in our calendar.

Mr. Davis had gathered into his house the literary treasures of four languages, and had reveled in spirit with the wise men of the ages. He had conned his books as jealously as a miner peering for gold, and had not left a painful of earth unwashed. He had collected the purest ore of truth and the richest gems of thought, until he was able to crown himself with knowledge. Blessed with a felicitous power of analysis and a prodigious memory, he ransacked history, ancient and modern, sacred and profane; science, pure, empirical, and metaphysical; the arts, mechanical and liberal; the professions, law, divinity, and medicine; poetry and the miscellanies of literature; and in all these great departments of human lore he moved as easily as most men do in their particular province. His habit was not only to read but to reread the best of his books frequently, and he was continually supplying himself with better editions of his favorites. In current, playful conversation with friends he quoted right and left, in brief and at length, from the classics, ancient and modern, and from the drama, tragic and comic. In his speeches, on the contrary, he quoted but little; and only when he seemed to run upon a thought already expressed by some one else with singular force and appositeness. He was the best scholar I ever met for his years and active life, and was surpassed by very few, excepting mere book-worms. He has for many years been engaged in collecting extracts from newspapers, containing the leading facts and public documents of the day; but he never common-placed from books. His thesaurus was his head.

I have but little personal knowledge of Mr. Davis as a lawyer. It was never my good fortune to be associated with him in the trial of a cause; nor have I ever been present when he was so engaged. But at the time of his death he filled a high position at the bar, and was chosen to lead against the most distinguished of his brethren. On public and constitutional questions, as distinguished from those involving only private rights, he was a host, and in the argument of the cases which grew out of the adoption of the new constitution of Maryland he won golden laurels, and drew extraordinary encomiums even from his opponents in that angry litigation. He was thoroughly read in the decisions of the Federal courts, and especially in those declaring and defining constitutional principles.

Possessed of a mind of remarkable power, scope, and activity; with an immense fund of precious information, ready to respond to any call he might make upon it, however sudden; wielding a system of logic formed in the severest school, and tried by long practice; gifted with a rare command of language and an eloquence well nigh superhuman; and withal graced with manners the most accomplished and refined, and a person unusually handsome, graceful, and attractive, Mr. Davis entered public life with almost unparalleled personal advantages. Having boldly presented himself before the most rigorous tribunal in the world, he proved himself worthy of its favor and attention. He soon rose to the front rank of debaters, and whenever he addressed the House all sides gave him a delighted audience.

I shall not attempt a review of the topics discussed in the Thirty-Fourth and Thirty-Fifth Congresses. The day was fast coming when contests for the Speakership and battles over appropriation bills, ay, even the fierce struggle over Kansas, would sink into insignificance, and Mr. Davis, with that political prescience for which he was always remarkable, seemed to discern the first sign of the coming storm. The winds had been long sown, and now the whirlwind was to be reaped. The Thirty-Sixth Congress, which had opened so inauspiciously, and which his vote had saved from becoming a perpetuated bedlam, met for its second session on the 3d of December, 1860, with the clouds of civil war fast settling down upon the nation. In the hope that war might yet be averted, on the fourth day of the session, the celebrated committee of thirty-three was raised, with the lamented Corwin, of Ohio, as chairman, and Mr. Davis as the member from Maryland. When the committee reported, Mr. Davis sustained the majority report in an able speech, in which, after urging every argument in favor of the report, he boldly proclaimed his own views, and the duties of his State and country. In his speech of 7th February, 1861, he said:

"I do not wish to say one word which will exasperate the already too much inflamed state of the public mind; but I will say that the Constitution of the United States, and the laws made in pursuance thereof, must be enforced; and they who stand across the path of that enforcement must either destroy the power of the United States, or it will destroy them."

For such utterances only a small part of the people of his State was on that day prepared. Seduced by the wish, they still believed that the Union could be preserved by fair and mutual concessions. They were on their knees praying for peace, ignorant that bloody war had already girded on his sword. His language was then deemed too harsh and unconciliatory, and hundreds, I among the number, denounced him in unmeasured terms. Before the expiration of three months events had demonstrated his wisdom and our folly, and other paragraphs from that same speech became the fighting creed of the Union men of Maryland. He further said, on that occasion:

"But, sir, there is one State I can speak for, and that is the State of Maryland. Confident in the strength of this great Government to protect every interest, grateful for almost a century of unalloyed blessings, she has fomented no agitation; she has done no act to disturb the public peace; she has rested in the consciousness that if there be wrong the Congress of the United States will remedy it; and that none exists which revolution would not aggravate."

"Mr. Speaker, I am here this day to speak, and I say that I do speak, for the people of Maryland, who are loyal to the United States; and that when my judgment is contested, I appeal to the people for its accuracy, and I am ready to maintain it before them."

"In Maryland we are dull, and cannot comprehend the right of secession. We do not recognize the right to make a revolution by a vote. We do not recognize the right of Maryland to repeal the Constitution of the United States, and if any convention there, called by whatever authority, under whatever auspices, undertake to inaugurate revolution in Maryland, their authority will be resisted and defied in arms on the soil of Maryland, in the name and by the authority of the Constitution of the United States."

In January, 1861, the ensign of the Republic, while covering a mission of mercy, was fired on by traitors. In February Jefferson Davis said, at Stevenson, Alabama, "We will carry war where it is easy to advance, where food for the sword and torch await our armies in the densely populated cities." In March the Thirty-Sixth Congress, after vainly passing conciliatory resolutions by the score, among other things recommending the repeal of all personal liberty bills, declaring that there was no authority outside of the States where slavery was recognized to interfere with slaves or slavery therein, and proposing by two thirds votes of both Houses an amendment of the Constitution prohibiting any future amendment giving Congress power over slavery in the States, adjourned amid general terror and distress.

Abraham Lincoln, having passed through the midst of his enemies, appeared at Washington in due time and delivered his inaugural, closing with these memorable words:

"In your hands, my dissatisfied fellow-countrymen, and not in mine, is the momentous issue of civil war. The Government will not assail you."

"You can have no conflict without being yourselves the aggressors. You can have no oath registered in heaven to destroy the Government, while I shall have the most solemn one to 'preserve, protect, and defend' it."

"I am loth to close. We are not enemies, but friends. We must not be enemies. Though passion may have strained, it must not break our bonds of affection."

"The mystic chords of memory, stretching from every battle-field and patriot grave to every living heart and hearth-stone all over this broad land, will yet swell the chorus of the Union, when again touched, as surely they will be, by the better angels of our nature."

Words which, if human hearts do not harden into stone, through the long ages yet to come, "Will plead like angels, trumpet-tongued, against The deep damnation of his taking off."

The appeal was spurned; and in the face of its almost godlike gentleness they, who already gloried in their anticipated saturnalia of blood, inhumanly and falsely stigmatized it as a declaration of war. The long-patient North, slow to anger, in its agony still cried, "My brother; oh, my brother!" It remained for that final, ineradicable infamy of Sumter to arouse the nation to arms! At last, to murder at one blow the hopes we had nursed so tenderly, they impiously dragged in the dust the glorious symbol of our national life and majesty, heaping dishonor upon it, and like the sneering devil at the crucifixion, crying out, "Come and deliver thyself;" and then no man, with the heart of a man, who loved his country and feared his God, dared longer delay to prepare for that great struggle which was destined to rock the earth.

Poor Maryland! cursed with slavery, doubly cursed with traitors! Mr. Davis had said that Maryland was loyal to the United States, and had pledged himself to maintain that position before the people. The time soon came for him to redeem his pledge. On the morning of the 15th of April the President issued his proclamation calling a special session of Congress, which made an extra election necessary in Maryland. Before the sun of that day had gone down, this card was promulgated:

To the Voters of the Fourth Congressional District of Maryland: I hereby announce myself as a candidate for the House of Representatives of the Thirty-Seventh Congress of the United States of America, upon the basis of the unconditional maintenance of the Union.

Should my fellow-citizens of like views manifest their preference for a different candidate on that basis, it is not my purpose to embarrass them.

April 15, 1861. H. WINTER DAVIS.

But dark days were coming for Baltimore. A mob, systematically organized in complicity with the rebels at Richmond and Harper's Ferry, seized and kept in subjection an unsuspecting and unarmed population from the 19th to the 24th of April. For six days murder and treason held joint sway; and at the conclusion of their tragedy of horrid barbarities, they gave the farce of holding an election for members of the House of Delegates.

To show the spirit that moved Mr. Davis under this ordeal I cite from his letter, written on the 28th, to Hon. William H. Seward, the following:

"I have been trying to collect the persons appointed scattered by the storm, and to compel them to take their offices or to decline."

"I have sought men of undoubted courage and capacity for the places vacated."

"We must show the secessionists that we are not frightened, but are resolved to maintain the Government in the exercise of all its functions in Maryland."

"We have organized a guard, who will accompany the officers and hold the public buildings against all the secessionists in Maryland."

"A great reaction has set in. If we now act promptly the day is ours, and the State is safe."

These matters being adjusted, he immediately took the field for Congress on his platform against Mr. Henry May, conservative Union, and in the face of an opposition which few men have dared to encounter, he carried on, unremittently from that time until the election on the 13th of June, the most brilliant campaign against open traitors, doubters, and dodgers that unrivaled eloquence, courage, and activity could achieve. Everywhere, day and night, in sunshine and storm, in the market-houses, at the street-corners, and in the public halls his voice rang out clear, loud, and defiant for the "unconditional maintenance" of the Union. He was defeated, but he sanctified the name of unconditional Union in the vocabulary of every true Marylander. He gathered but 6,000 votes out of 14,000, yet the result was a triumph which gave him the real fruits of victory; and he exclaimed to a friend, with laudable pride, "With six thousand of the workingmen of Baltimore on my side, won in such a contest, I defy them to take the State out of the Union." Though not elected, he never ceased his efforts. With us it was a struggle for homes, hearths, and lives. He said at Brooklyn:

"You see the conflagration from a distance; it blisters me at my side. You can survive the integrity of the nation; we in Maryland would live on the side of a gulf, perpetually tending to plunge into its depths. It is for us life and liberty; it is for you greatness, strength, and prosperity."

"Nothing appalled him; nothing deterred him. He said at Baltimore, in 1861:

"The War Department has been taught by the misfortune at Bull Run, which has broken no power nor any spirit, which bowed no State nor made any heart falter, which was felt as a humiliation, that has brought forth wisdom."

He also said, speaking of the rebels, and foretelling his own fate, if they succeeded in Maryland:

"They have inaugurated an era of confiscations, proscriptions, and exiles. Read their acts of greedy confiscation, their law of proscriptions by the thousands. Behold the flying exiles from the unfriendly soil of Virginia, Tennessee, and Missouri!"

And so he worked on, never abating one jot of his uncompromising devotion to the Union, like a second Peter the Hermit, preaching a cause, as he believed, truly represented by insignia as sacred as the Cross, and for which no sacrifice, not even death, was too great.

But his crowning glory was his leadership of the emancipation movement. The rebels, notwithstanding "My Maryland's" bloody welcome at South Mountain and Antietam, claimed that she must belong to their confederacy, because of the homogeneity of her institutions. They contended that the fetters of slavery formed a chain that stretched across the Potomac, and held in bondage not only 87,000 slaves, but 600,000 white people also. Their constant theme was "the deliverance" of Maryland. We resolved to break that last tie, and to take position unalterably on the side of the Union and freedom, and thus to deal the final blow to the cause and support of rebellion. We organized our little band, almost ridiculous from its want of numbers, early in 1863. A Sibley tent would have held our whole army. Our enemies laughed us to scorn, and the politicians would not accept our help on any terms; but denied us as earnestly as Peter denied his Lord. Mr. Davis was our acknowledged leader, and it was in the heat and fury of the contest which followed that our hearts were welded into permanent friendship. He was the platform-maker, and he announced it in a few lines:

"A hearty support of the entire policy of the national Administration, including immediate emancipation by constitutional means."

It was very short, but it covered all the ground. The campaign opened by the publication of an address, written by Mr. Davis to the people of Maryland, which, I venture to say, is unsurpassed by any state paper published in this age of able state papers for the warmth and vigor of its diction, and the lucidity and conclusiveness of its argumentation. It is a pamphlet of twenty pages, glowing throughout with the unmistakable marks of his genius and patriotism, and closing with these words of stirring cheer:

"We do not doubt the result, and expect, freed from the trammels which now bind her, to see Maryland, at no distant day, rapidly advancing in a course of unexampled prosperity with her sister free States of the undivided and indivisible Republic."

Mr. Davis was ubiquitous. He was the life and soul of the whole contest. He arranged the order of battle, dictated the correspondence, wrote the important articles for the newspapers, and addressed all the concerted meetings. In short, neither his voice nor his pen rested in all the time of our travail. He would have no compromise; but rejected all overtures of the enemy short of unconditional surrender. On the Eastern Shore he spoke with irresistible power at Elkton, Easton, Salisbury, and Snow Hill, at each of the three last-named towns with a crowd of wondering "American citizens of African descent" listening to him from afar, and looking upon him as if they believed him to be the seraph Abdiel. His last appointment, in extreme southern Maryland, he filled on Friday, after which, bidding me a cordial god-speed, he descended from the stand, sprang into an open wagon awaiting him, traveled eighty miles through a raw night air, reached Cambridge by daylight, and then crossed the Chesapeake, sixty miles, in time to close the campaign with one of his ringing speeches in Monument square, Baltimore, on Saturday night. In this, our first contest, we were completely victorious.

But we had yet a weary way before us. The Legislature had then to pass a law calling a convention. That law had to be approved by a majority of the people. Members of the convention had then to be elected in all parts of the State, and the Constitution which they adopted had to be carried by a majority of the popular vote. He allowed himself no reprieve from labor until all this had been accomplished. And when the rest of us, worn out by this incessant toil, gladly sought rest, he went before the Court of Appeals to maintain everything that had been done against all comers, and did so triumphantly.

Let free Maryland never forget the debt of eternal gratitude she owes to Henry Winter Davis.

If oratory means the power of presenting thoughts by public and sustained speech to an audience in the manner best adapted to win a favorable decision of the question at issue, then Mr. Davis assuredly occupied the highest position as an orator. He always held his hearers in rapt attention until he closed, and then they lingered about to discuss with one another what they had heard. I have seen a promiscuous assembly, made up of friends and opponents, remain exposed to a beating rain for two hours rather than forego hearing him. Those who had heard him most frequently were always ready to make the greatest effort to hear him again. Even his bitterest enemies have been known to stand shivering on the street corners for a whole evening, charmed by his marvelous tongue. His stump efforts never fell below his high standard. He never condescended to a mere attempt to amuse. He always spoke to instruct, to convince, and to persuade through the higher and better avenues to favor. I never heard him deliver a speech that was not worthy of being printed and preserved. As a stump orator he was unapproachable, in my estimation, and I say that with a clear recollection of having heard, when a boy, that wonder of Yankee birth and southern development, S. S. Prentiss.

Mr. Davis's ripe scholarship promptly tendered to his thought the happiest illustrations and the most appropriate forms of expression. His brain had become a teeming cornucopia, whence flowed in exhaustless profusion the most beautiful flowers and the most substantial fruits; and yet he never indulged in excessive ornamentation. His taste was almost austere chaste. His style was perspicuous, energetic, concise, and withal highly elegant. He never loaded his sentences with meretricious finery, or high-sounding, supernumerary words. When he did use the jewelry of rhetoric, he would quietly set a metaphor in his page or throw a comparison into his speech which would serve to light up with startling distinctness the colossal proportions of his argument. Of humor he had none; but his wit and sarcasm at times would glitter like the brandished cimeter of Saladin, and, descending, would cut as keenly. The pathetic he never attempted; but when angered by a malicious assault his invective was consuming, and his epithets would wound like pellets of lead. Although gallant to the graces of expression, he always compelled his rhetoric to act as hand-maid to his dialectics.

Style may sometimes be an exotic; but when it is, it is sure to partake more and more as years increase, of the peculiarities of the soil wherein it is nurtured. But the style of Mr. Davis was indigenous and strongly marked by his individuality. Although he doubtless admired and perhaps imitated the condensation and dignity of Gibbon, yet it is certain that he carefully avoided the monotonous stateliness, and the elaborate and ostentatious art of that most erudite historian. I look in vain for his model in the skeptical Gibbon, the cynical Bolingbroke, or the gorgeous Burke. These were all to him intellectual giants; but giants of false belief and practice. Not even from Tacitus, upon whom he looked with the greatest favor, could he have acquired his burning and impressive diction. Henry Winter Davis was a man of faith, and believed in Christ and his fellow-man. His heart and mind were both nourished into their full dimensions under the fostering influences of our free institutions; so that, being reared a freeman, he thought and spake as became a freeman. No other land could have produced such dauntless courage and such heroic devotion to honest conviction in a public man; and even our land has produced but few men of his stamp and ability. His implicit faith in God's eternal justice, and his grand moral courage imparted to him his proselyting zeal, and gave him that amazing, kindling power which enabled him to light the fires of enthusiasm wherever he touched the public mind.

To show his power in extemporaneous debate, as well as his determined patriotism, I will introduce a passage from his speech of April 11, 1864, delivered in the House of Representatives. You will remember that the end of the rebellion had not then appeared. Grant, with his invincible legions, had not started to execute that greatest military movement of modern times, by which, after months of bloody persistence, hurling themselves continually against what seemed the frowning front of destiny, they finally drove the enemy from his strongholds, made Fortune herself captive, and, binding her to their standards, held her there, until the surrender of every rebel in arms closed the war amid the exultant plaudits of men and angels. Our hopes had not then grown into victory, and we looked forward anxiously to the terrible march from the Rappahannock to Richmond. Thinking that perhaps our army stood appalled before the great duty required of it, and that the people might be diverted from their purpose to crush the rebellion, when they saw that it could only be accomplished at the cost of an ocean of human blood, a call was made on the floor of the American Congress for a recognition of the southern confederacy. Speaking for the nation, Mr. Davis said:

"But, Mr. Speaker, if it be said that a time may come when the question of recognizing the southern confederacy will have to be answered, I admit it."
* * * * * "When the people, exhausted by taxation, weary of sacrifices, drained of blood, betrayed by their rulers, deluded by demagogues into believing that peace is the way to union, and submission the path to victory, shall throw down their arms before the advancing foe; when vast chasms across every State shall make it apparent to every eye, when too late to remedy it, that division from the South is anarchy at the North, and that peace without union is the end of the Republic; then the independence of the South will be an accomplished fact, and gentlemen may, without treason to the dead Republic, rise in this migratory House, wherever it may then be in America, and declare themselves for recognizing their masters at the South rather than exterminating them. Until that day, in the name of the American nation; in the name of every house in the land where there is one dead for the holy cause; in the name of those who stand before us in the ranks of battle; in the name of the liberty our ancestors have confided to us, I devote to eternal execration the name of him who shall propose to destroy this blessed land rather than its enemies."

But until that time arrive it is the judgment of the American people there shall be no compromise; that ruin to ourselves or ruin to the southern rebels are the only alternatives. It is only by resolutions of this kind that nations can rise above great dangers and overcome them in crises like this. It was only by turning France into a camp, resolved that Europe might exterminate but should not subjugate her, that France is the leading empire of Europe today. It is by such a resolve that the American people, coercing a reluctant Government to draw the sword and stake the national existence on the integrity of the Republic, are now anything but the fragments of a nation before the world, the scorn and hiss of every petty tyrant. It is because the people of the United States, rising to the height of the occasion, dedicated this generation to the sword, and pouring out the blood of their children as of no account, and vowing before high Heaven that there should be no end to this conflict but ruin absolute or absolute triumph, that we now are what we are; that the banner of the Republic, still pointing onward, floats proudly in the face of the enemy; that vast regions are reduced to obedience to the laws, and that a great host in armed array now presses with steady step into the dark regions of the rebellion. It is only by the earnest and abiding resolution of the people that, whatever shall be our fate, it shall be grand as the American nation, worthy of that Republic which first trod the path of empire and made no peace but under the banners of victory, that the American people will survive in history. And that will save us. We shall succeed, and not fail. I have an abiding confidence in the firmness, the patience, the endurance of the American people; and, having vowed to stand in history on the great resolve to accept of nothing but victory or ruin, victory is ours. And if with such heroic resolve we fall, we fall with honor, and transmit the name of liberty, committed to our keeping untarnished, to go down to future generations. The historian of our decline and fall, contemplating the ruins of the last great republic, and drawing from its fate lessons of wisdom on the waywardness of men, shall drop a tear as he records with sorrow the vain heroism of that people who dedicated and sacrificed themselves to the cause of freedom, and by their example will keep alive her worship in the hearts of men till happier generations shall learn to walk in her paths. Yes, sir, if we must fall, let our last hours be stained by no weakness. If we must fall, let us stand amid the crash of the falling Republic and be buried in its ruins, so that history may take note that men lived in the middle of the nineteenth century worthy of a better fate, but chastised by God for the sins of their forefathers. Let the ruins of the Republic remain to testify to the latest generations our greatness and our heroism. And let Liberty, crownless and childless, sit upon these ruins, crying aloud in a sad wail to the nations of the world, 'I nursed and brought up children and they have rebelled against me.'

Mr. Davis's most striking characteristics were his devotion to principle and his indomitable courage. There never was a moment when he could be truthfully charged with trimming or insincerity. His views were always clearly avowed and fearlessly maintained. He hated slavery and he did not attempt to conceal it. He remembered the lessons of his youth, and his heart rebelled against the injustice of the system. His antipathy was deeply grounded in his convictions, and he could not be dissuaded, nor frightened, nor driven from expressing it.

He was not a great captain, nor a mighty ruler; he was only one of the people, but, nevertheless, a hero. Born under the flag of a nation which claimed for its cardinal principle of government, that all men are created free, yet held in abject slavery four millions of human beings; which erected altars to the living God, yet denied to creatures, formed in the image of God and charged with the custody of immortal souls, the common rights of humanity; he declared that the hateful inconsistency should cease to defile the prayers of Christians and stultify the advocates of freedom. No dreamer was he, no mere theorist, but a worker, and a strong one, who did well the work committed to him. He entered upon his self-imposed task when surrounded by slaves and slave-owners. He stood face to face with the iniquitous superstition, and to their teeth defied its worshippers. To make proselytes he had to conquer prejudices, correct traditions, elevate duty above interest, and induce men, who had been the propagandists of slavery, to become its destroyers. Think you his work was easy? Count the long years of his unequal strife; gather from the winds, which scattered them, the curses of his foes; suffer under all the annoyances and insults which malice and falsehood can invent, and you will then understand how much of heart and hope, of courage and self-relying zeal were required to make him what he was, and to qualify him to do what he did. And what did he? When the rough hand of war had stripped off the pretexts which enveloped the rebellion, and it became evident that slavery had struck at the life of the Republic, unmindful of consequences to himself, he, among the first, arraigned the real traitor and demanded the penalty of death. The denunciations that fell upon him like a cloud wrapped him in a mantle of honor, and more truthfully than the great Roman orator he could have exclaimed, "Ego hoc animo semper fui, ut invidiam virtute partam, gloriam non invidiam putarem."

This man, so stern and inflexible in the execution of a purpose, so rigorous in his demands of other men in behalf of a principle, so indifferent to preferment, and all base objects of pursuit, had a monitor to whom he always gave an open ear and a prompt assent. It was no demon like that which attended Socrates, no witch like that invoked by Saul, no fiend like that to which Faust resigned himself. A vision of light and life and beauty flitted ever palpably before him, and wooed him to the perpetual service of the good and true. The memory of a pious and beloved mother permeated his whole moral being, and kept warm within him the tenderest affection. Hear how he wrote of her:

"My mother was a lady of graceful and simple manners, fair complexion, blue eyes, and auburn hair, with a rich and exquisite voice, that still thrills my memory with the echo of its vanished music. She was highly educated for her day, when Annapolis was the focus of intellect and fashion for Maryland, and its fruits shone through her conversation, and colored and completed her natural eloquence, which my father used to say would have made her an orator, if it had not been thrown away on a woman. She was the incarnation of all that is Christian in life and hope, in charity and thought, ready for every good work, herself the example of all she taught."

It was the force of her precept and example that formed the man, and supplied him with his shield and buckler. His private life was spotless. His habits were regular and abstemious, and his practice in close conformity with the Episcopal church, of which he was a member. He invariably attended divine service on Sunday, and confined himself for the remainder of the day to a course of religious reading. If from his father he drew a courage and a fierce determination before which his enemies fled in confusion; from his mother he inherited those milder qualities that won for him friends, as true and devoted as man ever possessed. Some have said he was hard and dictatorial. They had seen him only when a high resolve had fired his breast, and when the gleam of battle had lighted his countenance. His friends saw deeper, and knew that beneath the exterior he assumed in his struggles with the world there beat a heart as pure and unsullied, as confiding and as gentle as ever sanctified the domestic circle, or made loved ones happy. His heart reminded me of a spring among the hills of the Susquehanna to which I often resorted in my youth; around a part of it we boys had built a stone wall to protect it from outrage, while on the side next home we left open a path, easily traveled by familiar feet, and leading straight to the sweet and perennial waters within.

He lived to hear the salvos that announced, after more than two centuries of bondage, the redemption of his native State. He lived to vote for that grand act of enfranchisement that wiped from the escutcheon of the nation the leprous stain of slavery; and to know that the Constitution of the United States no longer recognized and protected property in man. He lived to witness the triumph of his country in its desperate struggle with treason, and to behold all its enemies, either wanderers like Cain over the earth, or supplicants for mercy at her feet. He lived to catch the first glimpse of the coming glory of that new era of progress that matchless valor had won through the blood and carnage of a thousand battle-fields. He lived, through all the storm of war, to see, at last, America rejuvenated, rescued from the grasp of despotism, and rise victorious with her garments purified and her brow radiant with the unsullied light of liberty. He lived to greet the return of "meek-eyed peace," and then he gently laid his head upon her bosom and breathed out there his noble spirit.

The sword may rust in its scabbard, and so let it; but free men with free thought and free speech will wage unceasing war until truth shall be enthroned and sit empress of the world. Would to God that he had been spared to complete a life of three-score and ten years for the sake of his country and posterity. When I think of the good he would have accomplished had he survived for twenty years, I can say, in the language of Fisher Ames, "My heart, penetrated with the remembrance of the man, grows liquid as I speak, and I could pour it out like water."

At the portals of his tomb we may bid farewell to the faithful Christian in the full assurance that a blessed life awaits him beyond the grave. Serenely and trustfully he has passed from our sight and gone down into the dark waters.

"So sinks the day-star in the ocean bed,
And yet anon repairs his drooping head,
And tricks his beams and with new-spangled ore,
Flames in the forehead of the morning sky."

From this Hall, where as a scholar, statesman, and orator, he shone so brightly, he has disappeared forever. Never again will he, answering to the roll-call from this desk, respond for his country and the rights of man. No more shall we hear his fervid eloquence in the day of imminent peril, invoking us, who hold the mighty power of peace and war, to dedicate ourselves, if need be, to the sword, but to accept no end of the conflict save that of absolute triumph for our country. He has gone to answer the great roll-call above, where the "brazen throat of war" is voiceless in the presence of the Prince of Peace. Let us habitually turn to his recorded words, and gather wisdom as from the testament of a departed sage; and since we were witnesses of his tireless devotion to the cause of human freedom, let us direct that on the monument which loving hearts and willing hands will soon erect over his remains, there shall be deeply engraved the figure of a bursting shackle, as the emblem of the faith in which he lived and died.

For the Christian, scholar, statesman, and orator, all good men are mourners; but what shall I say of that grief which none can share, the grief of sincere friendship?

Oh! my friend! comforted by the belief that you, while living, deemed me worthy to be your companion, and loaded me with the proofs of your esteem, I shall fondly treasure, during my remaining years, the recollection of your smile and counsel. Lost to me is the strong arm whereon I have so often leaned; but in that path, which in time past we trod most joyfully together, I shall continue, as God shall give me to see my duty, with unflinching, though perhaps with unskillful steps, right onward to the end.

Admiring his brilliant intellect and varied acquirements, his invincible courage and unswerving fortitude, glorying in his good works and fair renown, but more than all loving the man, I shall endeavor to assuage the bitterness of grief by applying to him those words of proud, though tearful, satisfaction, from which the faithful Tacitus drew consolation for the loss of that noble Roman whom he delighted to honor:

"Quidquid ex Agricola amavimus, quidquid mirati sumus, manet mansurumque est, in animis hominum, in æternitate temporum, fama rerum."

The Public Debt and Specie Payments.

SPEECH OF HON. J. A. GARFIELD,

OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 16, 1866.

The House having under consideration the bill to amend an act entitled "An act to provide ways and means to support the Government," approved March 3, 1865—

Mr. GARFIELD said:

Mr. SPEAKER: After the long and spirited contest on this bill, I shall do little beyond making as plain a statement as I can of the conditions of the great financial problem now before the country for solution. The bill relates to two leading points in that problem, namely:

1. To our indebtedness that shall accrue from time to time in the course of the next three years.

2. To our currency and its relation to the standard of value.

I shall notice these in the order I have named them.

Several gentlemen have said, during the progress of this debate, that what might have been a very proper financial measure in time of war might be a very dangerous and unnecessary one in time of peace; that the vast powers proposed to be given to the Secretary of the Treasury in this bill are powers only justifiable in time of great public danger, as during the late war.

Now, I beg to remind gentlemen that the financial problems before this country are becoming greater since the war than they were during its progress. In the midst of the war, when the blood of the nation was up; when patriotism was aroused, and the people were determined to put down the rebellion and preserve the Republic at all hazards; when the last man and the last dollar were offered a willing sacrifice, it was comparatively easy to pass financial bills and raise millions of money. But now, when we are to gather up all the pledges and promises of four terrible years, and redeem them out of the solid resources of the people in time of peace, the problem is far more difficult. To solve it successfully requires greater exertion, and perhaps even greater financial ability than would be requisite were the war still raging.

What is the amount of indebtedness to be met, and when must it be met? To this question I invite the careful and earnest attention of the House. I shall give the official statement of the amount of our total indebtedness and also of that portion soon to become due. The amount of our public debt on the first day of this month was $2,711,850,000. Less than half of this amount is funded. Within the next three years $1,600,000,000 of this debt will fall due, and will be presented at the counter of the Treasury Department for payment. That payment must be promptly made or our paper goes to protest and our credit is broken. I hold in my hand an official table showing the amount of our indebtedness that matures during each half year for the next two years, which, after a word of explanation, I will read.

There was on the last day of February, 1866, a portion of our debt in the form of a temporary loan to the amount of $119,835,194 50, payable at the option of the lender after ten days' notice. It would hardly be fair to reckon that whole amount as payable within the first six months, yet as it may be called for at any time, and is the least valuable form of loan, it must be added to the statement of indebtedness soon to be met. With this explanation, and supposing the payment of this loan to be demanded within the next six months, I call attention to the facts exhibited in the table.

Between this day and the 30th day of June next, we must pay, in addition to the regular expenditure of the Government, $138,674,874 82. During the six months ending December 31, 1866, we must pay $47,665,000. During the six months ending June 30, 1867, we must pay $8,471,000. During the six months ending December 31, 1867, we must pay $350,000,000. During the six months ending June 30, 1868, we must pay $369,415,250. During the six months ending December 31, 1868, we must pay $287,564,482. So that between this and the assembling of the next Congress there must be paid over the counter of the Treasury, besides the ordinary expenses of the Government, $1,201,890,607 62.

I am sure that every member of this House acknowledges that this is a sacred obligation, every dollar of which must be promptly met the day it is due. I take it for granted that no man here will consent that a single dollar of it shall go to protest, or that any act of this House shall bear the least taint or color of repudiation. We must, therefore, meet these obligations. How can it be done?

Mr. SPALDING. Will my colleague allow me a question?

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. SPALDING. Does not this amount of indebtedness thus maturing include the seven-thirty bonds for which the Government may issue five-twenty bonds?

Mr. GARFIELD. My colleague is correct. Most of the seven-thirty bonds are included in this amount, but they must be redeemed in money or five-twenty bonds, at the holder's option. The Secretary has no power to compel such an exchange.

As I have already stated, there will be presented for payment in some form before the assembling of the Fortieth Congress $1,201,000,000, in addition to the ordinary expenditures of the Government. How are these demands to be met? With what power is the Secretary of the Treasury clothed to enable him to meet this enormous obligation?

There are two clauses in the existing laws which give him some power.

The first and chief is to be found in the last clause of the first section, of the act of the 3d of March, 1865, which has been so ably discussed by my colleague on the committee, [Mr. ALLISON.] He has shown us—and no man, I believe, will venture to deny the correctness of the position—that the clause gives the Secretary of the Treasury power merely to exchange one kind of paper for another, but only with the consent of the holder. If the holder says, "I will not take your long bonds, I demand my money," his money he must have. If, when the seven-thirty bond is due, the state of the market makes money more valuable than a six per cent. bond for twenty years, the holder will of course demand money. He will of course take the option most profitable to himself and least advantageous to the Government.

The other clause that gives the Secretary power is in the act of June 30, 1864. The second section of that act allows the Secretary of the Treasury to take up the various kinds of paper representing indebtedness and issue therefor compound-interest notes or seven-thirty bonds. These two descriptions of paper are of all others the most expensive for the Government to issue.

I say, then, concerning this power, it is one that the Secretary ought not to use. It would be a calamity should he be compelled to use it. It would be a calamity, in the first place, were he compelled to issue in exchange for maturing indebtedness these compound-interest notes, for they are the most costly paper the Government can issue to its creditors—notes that are payable in three years with interest compounded every six months. It is enough to break the financial strength of any nation.

Again, by the provisions of this act the Secretary may issue seven-thirty bonds in exchange for matured indebtedness. They are short bonds. They now fill the market more than any others, and will be maturing after about twelve months. If we pay these out it will be only for the purpose of taking up others of the same kind. Even this can be done only at the option of the holder.

I say, therefore, that the Secretary is substantially limited in his power to these two clauses of the law; one that he ought not to use and cannot use without great disadvantage to the public credit, and the other that he can use only for the purpose of an even exchange, and that, too, by the consent of the holders. Therefore he has but little valuable power or discretion in funding the national debt. If Congress gives him no more power the Treasury will be at the mercy of the public creditors, who may combine to control the stock market and compel the Secretary to sacrifice the public credit to the gamblers of Wall street.

I hold it demonstrable that if you leave the Secretary of the Treasury where he is you abandon him to the mercy of the holders of the public securities, who, if they please, can utterly break him down and send the paper of the Government to protest.

Under these circumstances it was the duty of the Committee of Ways and Means to inquire what further power was necessary to enable the Secretary to meet these obligations as they mature, and put the debt into the form of long bonds at a lower rate of interest than we now pay. The committee believe that the bill now before the House gives the Secretary no more power than is needful for the accomplishment of the work before him. With that power the Secretary believes he can do the work. Without it he cannot.

If the plan now proposed be not adopted it is incumbent upon this House to offer one that will accomplish the work. It is not enough that gentlemen are able to point out defects in this bill and raise objections to it; but it is incumbent upon them to show us a plan which will accomplish the desired result and not be liable to equally grave objections.

Now, sir, what has been proposed as a substitute for this bill? The distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] has offered a substitute. I hope no one misunderstands his purpose. He is not only opposed to the pending bill, but he is unwilling to give the Secretary any additional power. He is not only unwilling to give the Secretary additional power, but he desires to take away much of the power already granted. His substitute consists of the committee's bill with every vital provision cut out, and the following disabling section added:

SEC. 2. That all laws or parts of laws which authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to fund or withdraw from circulation any United States legal-tender notes not bearing interest be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

If his substitute shall become a law, I desire it to be remembered that the House must take the responsibility of the disastrous results which must inevitably follow.

I have undertaken to state the first great duty which rests upon the Secretary of the Treasury, namely, to meet the maturing indebtedness of the Government. I will now state the second.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE. Before the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] proceeds to the next branch of the subject, I would like to ask him a single question.

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE. I would like to have the gentleman state what is the necessity of retiring the greenback currency of the country and meeting these obligations of the Government, of which he has been speaking. Admitting his entire theory in regard to the bonds, and the seven-thirty and legal-tender notes, what is the necessity of diminishing the greenback circulation of the country at this time?

Mr. GARFIELD. That is a part of my second point, and I will cheerfully discuss it. Before leaving the first point, however, let me say that the committee have not been willing to leave the Secretary merely the barren power of exchanging one form of paper for another, bond for bond, dollar for dollar, and that only at the option of the holder. It is proposed in this bill that he be permitted to put a loan on the market, to sell bonds for money, and with that money redeem the old bonds as they mature. Even if we had no desire to limit the volume of paper currency it would be necessary to give him this power for the purpose of funding the debt.

But I hasten to the consideration of the currency. I call attention to the fact that Congress has established a policy, which is now nearly four years old, in reference to the circulating medium of the country. Five years ago there were in the United States over sixteen hundred banks, based on any and every kind of security, and issuing currency in whatever amounts were authorized by the laws of the various States.

The notes of one bank were based on real estate; of another, on State stock; of another, on United States stock. Each had its peculiar basis, its peculiar kind of currency, and regulated the amount of its circulation according to its own rules and opinions. Sixteen hundred independent corporations were tinkering at the currency. The result was that a paper dollar in Ohio, though worth one hundred cents in gold at home, would pass for only ninety or ninety-five cents in Massachusetts or California. A Massachusetts dollar would fare equally hard in California. A paper dollar was worth its face in gold in only the immediate locality of its issue.

During the progress of the war against the rebellion, there was adopted a system of national banks based on a uniform security—the bonds of the United States—so that a paper dollar issued in Ohio is worth no less when it reaches Massachusetts. It was not, however, thought prudent by the Thirty-Seventh and Thirty-Eighth Congresses to make the United States Government a banker for the people, with arbitrary power to regulate the currency as it pleased. It was thought to be dangerous to repeat the history of the United States Bank of thirty years ago; and therefore it was resolved that the national bank system based on the bonds of the United States and regulated by the necessities of trade should be the established policy of the Government. The greenback currency was issued only as a war measure, to last during the necessities of the war, then to be withdrawn, and give place to the national bank system.

The war is now ended; and unless we mean to abolish the national bank system and make the Government itself a permanent banker, we must retire from the banking business and give place to the system already adopted. Unless gentlemen here are now ready to abandon entirely the national bank system, they must consent that ultimately the greenback circulation shall be withdrawn, and that the notes of the national banks shall furnish a paper currency which, together with gold, shall constitute the circulating medium of the country. The committee have proceeded on the belief that the national bank system is to be the permanent system of this country, and that the greenback circulation was only incidental to the necessities of war, and that with the removal of these necessities it was to be withdrawn.

Shall we return to specie payments: and if so, when and how? The President, in his late annual message, has expressed clearly and determinedly the purpose of the executive department of the Government to return at the earliest practicable moment to the solid basis of gold and silver. The Secretary of the Treasury in his report sets forth, with very great clearness and ability, the importance of an early return to specie payments. And this House, on the 18th of December last, with but six dissenting votes, not only declared itself in favor of returning as speedily as practicable to a specie basis, but also declared that the currency must be contracted as a means of resumption.

Now, how shall this be accomplished? By what lever can the financial machinery be so moved as to effect the object so much desired by every department of the Government? I answer that the only lever in our hands strong enough to reach every difficulty and overcome every obstacle is the greenback and fractional currency. In the first place they add $450,000,000 to the volume of the currency. In the second place, they underlie the national bank system and constitute the reserves required by law.

It has been said during this debate that the circulation is not redundant; that we have now no more paper money than the business of the country requires; that the rate of interest is high, the money market stringent, and prices greatly advanced. I hold it demonstrable that our redundant currency is the chief cause of the high prices and the stringent money market.

I know that figures are not always the best index of the financial situation. If they were, I might show that less than three hundred million dollars furnished the circulation of this country before the war, and that now we have more than a thousand million. I need only refer to the horn-books of financial science to show that the only sure test of the redundancy of paper money is its convertibility into coin at the will of the holder, and that its redundancy will inevitably increase prices. On the latter proposition I will read a sentence from the highest living authority in political economy, (John Stuart Mill, Political Economy, volume two, page 18:)

HO. OF REPS.

39TH CONG....1ST SESS.

"That an increase of the quantity of money raises prices and a diminution lowers them is the most elementary proposition in the theory of currency, and without it we should have no key to any of the others."

Mr. PRICE. I want to ask the gentleman from Ohio whether there is any more currency in circulation now than six months ago. In short, I want to know whether there is not more currency in circulation every day of the week and every week of the month for the last six months. And has it not been increasing? I want to know whether it is not equally true that gold has been coming down steadily, certainly, gradually, surely; and not only that, but that the commodities of trade and commerce have come down in the same ratio. Yet the currency has been increasing, strange as it may seem. And the gentleman need not go back to the horn-books to find out these facts. They stare us in the face every day. It cannot be denied that while the currency has been increasing gold has been going down.

Mr. GARFIELD. A paragraph from the Merchants' Magazine for January last will perfectly answer the gentleman's question. It is to this effect: the President's message raised Government securities at home and abroad and depressed gold. The report of the Secretary of the Treasury accomplished still more. The very announcement of the policy of resumption has checked gold and stock gambling and brought down prices. That historical fact is a complete answer to the gentleman's question.

Mr. PRICE. Does the gentleman deny the statement I make in reference to the increase of the volume of our currency and the decrease in the premium on gold?

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not deny it. I have admitted that gold is falling. I admit that our currency has been slightly increased. But, sir, it must be remembered that $600,000,000 of rebel currency collapsed and disappeared on the day the so-called southern confederacy collapsed, and thus left a vacuum into which our currency has since been flowing.

Mr. PRICE. Do you deny in the face of the facts in the case that our currency has been increasing while gold has been decreasing?

Mr. GARFIELD. I have answered the gentleman.

Mr. PRICE. I am sorry I cannot see the answer.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have stated the facts in answer to the gentleman. I am not responsible for his inability to understand them.

I call attention, because the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] has referred to it, to the remarkable example in British history on this subject. I have never seen a more perfect illustration of the truth that history repeats itself than this debate as compared with the debate in the British Parliament during their great struggle for a return to specie payments, after the war against Napoleon. From 1797 to 1819 the British people had only a paper circulation, and, as is always the case, the poorer currency drove out the better. As respectable people leave that portion of a city in which disreputable people settle, so gold retires before an irredeemable paper currency. If our customs and the interest on our public debt had not been made payable in coin, gold would have disappeared from the country. In England, when they had no gold in circulation, when prices had risen, when rents had risen, after stocks had fallen, Englishmen did as we have been doing here.

In 1810, a committee of the most able financiers and statesmen were ordered to report the cause of high prices and the premium upon gold, and after a laborious investigation, during which the most distinguished men were called in as witnesses, that most able paper, the Bullion Report, was submitted to Parliament. In that report the principle was enunciated that the only true test of the redundancy of currency was its comparison in value with gold; that whenever a paper dollar is not exchangeable for a gold dollar, it is proof that there are too many paper dollars; and there can be no surer test. In the report of that committee it was laid down as a fundamental proposition that nothing but the supreme test of gold applied to paper will certainly determine the question of the redundancy. That report was debated for many weeks, and every leading banker, broker, importer, and manufacturer of England opposed the bullion committee and their proposed return to cash payments. The measure was defeated. Gold and prices immediately rose. From 1811 till 1819 there was a steady rise in prices and stocks, and in the year 1819 another committee of the House of Commons was appointed to examine and report on the financial situation of the kingdom. Three of the members of the bullion committee of 1810 were also on the committee of 1819. After a most searching investigation, they reported in favor of resumption, and indorsed the doctrine of the Bullion Report.

Then it was that Sir Robert Peel distinguished himself as the great statesman and financier of England by declaring in the House of Commons his conversion to the doctrines of the Bullion Report which he had so strenuously opposed eight years before. I have before me the records of the great debate in which that illustrious man lamented that the distinguished author of the Bullion Report of 1811 was not then alive to aid him in that struggle and witness the triumph of those principles so clearly set forth in 1811. Eight years of terrible experience had demonstrated the truth of the Bullion Report. "Sir," said he, "we shall never have financial security in this country until we adopt the principles of that report;" and after a parliamentary struggle, the report of which fills nearly five hundred pages of Hansard's Debates, the report was adopted, and its principles have ever since been the acknowledged creed of Great Britain and of all other countries whose people have carefully studied the subject. I refer to this, sir, as a matter of history, and I further assert that there is no respectable authority on the subject of finance on the other side of the water or here that denies the doctrine that the only true test of redundancy of currency is its convertibility into gold. You may bring your figures to prove that we have no more currency than our trade requires, but I tell you that so long as your paper dollar cannot be converted into gold there is too much currency, and the moment it can be converted into gold for its face it has reached a stable and safe basis.

Now, if any gentleman here has the temerity to deny this doctrine I shall be pleased to hear his reasons for it. To make his denial good he must prove that the immutable laws of value have been overthrown. He cannot plead that the necessities of trade alone control the value of currency. Double the amount of currency, and the money market will be apparently more stringent; triple the amount, and money will be more stringent still. Why do you need four times as much money now to move the products of the country as was needed five years ago? Simply because the inflation of the currency has quadrupled prices, and deranged values.

But the worst feature in the case is the stimulus which this inflation gives to dishonesty everywhere, and the consequent discouragement of productive industry. I will not now question the policy of the act of 1862, by which paper money was made a legal tender.

It was perhaps a necessity of the war that could not have been avoided. But no one will deny that it unsettled the basis of all values in this country. It was a declaration by law that a promise to pay a dollar might be discharged by paying a sum less than a dollar. There was a time within the last two years when an obligation to pay $100 could be legally canceled by the payment of thirty-eight dollars. The manifold evils resulting from such a state of values cannot be computed. To fulfill in January the contract of July may ruin the creditor, because the meaning of the most important word in the contract has been changed by the changing market. The dollar of July may have represented forty cents, while the dollar of January may represent double that sum.

Will prudent men embark in solid business and risk all they possess to such uncertain chances? There is left open the alluring temptation to speculate on the rise and fall of gold stocks and commodities, a pursuit in which all that is gained by one is lost by another, and no addition is made to the public wealth. And this is the history of thousands of our business men. They have trusted their capital to the desperate chances of Wall street. They have embarked on the sea of paper money, and they ask us to keep the flood rising that they may float. Every day adds stimulus to this insane gambling, and depresses legitimate business and honest labor. The tide must be checked, and the fury of the flood restrained. We must bring values back to the solid standard of gold. Let that be done and the fabric of business is founded, not on the sand, but on the firm rock of public faith. The fury of the storm tore us from our moorings, and left us to the mercy of the waves. Let us pilot the good ship again into port, so that we may once more feel the solid earth beneath our feet.

How perfectly prices have kept pace with the currency let the history of the last five years show. Name any one year in which the currency has been more inflated than in the preceding, with no prospect of contraction, and you will find prices proportionately advanced. I hold in my hand the price-list of the last four years, as published in the Merchants' Magazine. Take, for example, the average price of flour. In January, 1861, it was $5 35 per barrel; in 1862 it was $5 50; in 1863, $6 05; in 1864 it was $7; in 1865, $10 per barrel. These prices kept in exact proportion to the volume of the currency. Now, in January, 1866, after the President, the Secretary of the Treasury, and Congress had made a decided movement toward specie payment, and indicated our purpose to restore the old standard of value as soon as practicable, the price of flour dropped to $8 75 per barrel, as the average for the month. Take any one of the sixty-three articles on this market-list, and it will exhibit the same truth, that an expanded currency will produce high prices. British and French history, as well as our own, give the same testimony on this subject. I do not, of course, suppose that resumption will bring us down to old prices. Heavy taxes and the increase of gold will hold prices higher than they were before the war.

Resumption is not so difficult a work as many suppose. It did not take so long in England as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] stated it did in his speech this afternoon. In July, 1819, Parliament decreed that after February 1, 1820, the bank should begin to redeem in small quantities, and should increase the amount at stated periods until May, 1823, when full specie payment should be made. The bank contracted its circulation, reduced the price of gold, and fully resumed payments May 1, 1821, only fifteen months after the law went into operation. I should be sorry to see a sudden contraction of our currency and a rapid decline in gold. It would be too great a shock to business. If the Secretary is armed with the requisite power he can make the movement so steadily and gradually as not to disturb, to any dangerous degree, the course of business and trade.

Loan Bill—Mr. Lynch.

The chief objection to the pending bill is that it confers too much power—more than ought to be intrusted to any man. Now, sir, tremendous power was given to General Grant, when the lives of hundreds of thousands of men were placed absolutely at his disposal. Sherman was intrusted with vast power when he started with his great army on his march to the sea. But it was necessary to trust some one with that power. Congress could not command armies and plan campaigns. So, also, in the present emergency some one must be trusted with power. Congress cannot negotiate a loan, cannot regulate the details of the currency, or fund the debt. It must delegate the power. I will not eulogize the present Secretary of the Treasury; he needs no eulogy from me. It is the Secretary of the Treasury, not Hugh McCulloch who needs this power. I vote to give it to the incumbent of that high office, whoever he may be, and hold him responsible for the use he may make of it.

I repeat it, sir, if gentlemen do not approve this bill they should offer some plan that will accomplish the desired result.

I call attention for a moment to the proposition of my friend from Maine, [Mr. PIKE.] If a stranger had told me before I came into this Hall this morning that the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PIKE] would introduce a proposition to authorize States to tax the bonds of the United States, I, as his friend, would have denied it. Does the gentleman hold that a State can constitutionally tax the bonds of the United States? Has he read the decisions of the courts?

There is not a lawyer in this House who will affirm that the States can levy such a tax. That question has been decided again and again by the Supreme Court of the United States, and the decision has always been one way. It was decided by Chief Justice Marshall, in 1819, in the case of McCulloch vs. The State of Maryland, (4 Wheaton, 316.) It was decided again by that same distinguished jurist in the case of Weston vs. The City of Charleston, (2 Peters, 449.) It was decided in the case of Osborn vs. The United States Bank, (9 Wheaton, 739,) in 1824, when Henry Clay, as counsel, argued other features of the cause before that court, but declined to offer any argument on the question of the power of the State to tax the bank, and alleged as a reason that the point was so well settled that argument was unnecessary. It was decided again in 1862, in the case of the Bank of Commerce vs. New York, (2 Black, 620.)

If the bonds of the United States can be taxed by State action, then the arsenals, the forts, the post offices, the mails of the United States, can be taxed in the same manner.

Mr. DAWES. Does the gentleman mean to maintain that this power of taxing United States bonds hereafter to be issued cannot be exercised by the States, provided Congress shall authorize it? I do not suppose that the gentleman from Maine, or any other gentleman, would contend that a State can exercise such power without the authority of Congress.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] whether he believes that Congress can delegate that power to the States?

Mr. DAWES. I put the interrogatory to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GARFIELD. Well, I trust that the gentleman from Massachusetts, who is a very distinguished lawyer, will do me the favor to say whether he believes it can be done.

Mr. DAWES. If the gentleman wants my opinion, I will say that I have no doubt that Congress has the power and can confer it upon the States. Whether it is wise for Congress to do so, is a question of policy. I may add, however, that I am very clear that Congress cannot authorize this taxation in respect to any bonds already issued, because that would be in violation of the terms of the contract.

Mr. GARFIELD. Now, Mr. Speaker, we have heard the gentleman from Massachusetts express the opinion that Congress can delegate this power to the States. Hear the opinion of another distinguished citizen of Massachusetts. I ask the Clerk to read a passage from a speech of Daniel Webster's, on the very question under discussion. It was delivered in the Senate of the United States, May 28, 1832.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"The question being on the amendment offered by Mr. Moore, of Alabama, proposing, first, that the bank shall not establish or continue any office of discount or deposit, or branch bank, in any State, without the consent and approbation of the State; second, that all such offices and branches shall be subject to taxation according to the amount of their loans and issues, in like manner as other banks or other property shall be liable to taxation:

"Mr. WEBSTER spoke as follows: Now, sir, I doubt exceedingly our power to adopt this amendment, and I pray the deliberate consideration of the Senate in regard to this point.

In the first place, let me ask, what is the constitutional ground on which Congress created this corporation, and on which we now propose to continue it? There is no express authority to create a bank or any other corporation given to us by the Constitution. The power is derived by implication. It has been exercised, and can be exercised only on the ground of a just necessity. It is to be maintained, if at all, on the allegation that the establishment of a national bank is a just and necessary means for carrying on the Government and executing the powers conferred on Congress by the Constitution. On this ground Congress has established this bank, and on this it is now proposed to be continued. It has already been judicially decided that Congress having established a bank for these purposes, the Constitution prohibits the States from taxing it. Observe, sir, it is the Constitution, not the law, which lays this prohibition on the States. The charter of the bank does not declare that the State shall not tax it. It says not one word on that subject. The restraint is imposed not by Congress, but by a higher authority, the Constitution.

Now, sir, I ask how we can relieve the States from this constitutional prohibition. It is true that this prohibition is not imposed in express terms, but it results from the general provisions of the Constitution, and has been judicially decided to exist in full force. This is a protection, then, which the Constitution of the United States, by its own force, holds over this institution, which Congress has deemed necessary to be created in order to carry on the Government. So soon as Congress, exercising its own judgment, has chosen to create it, can we throw off from this Government this constitutional protection? I think it clear we cannot. We cannot repeal the Constitution. We cannot say that every power, every branch, every institution, and every law of this Government shall not have all the force, all the sanction, and all the protection which the Constitution gives it."

Mr. GARFIELD. Such was the opinion of the great "Defender of the Constitution." He believed that the power of a State to tax the securities of the United States is prohibited by a higher authority than a statute of Congress; that it is prohibited by the Constitution itself.

Mr. DAWES. Has the gentleman had that passage read as an answer to my interrogatory?

Mr. GARFIELD. I cite it in answer to the gentleman's construction of the Constitution.

Mr. DAWES. That quotation from Mr. Webster has, within my experience, been used for various purposes on many different occasions; but this is the first time I have heard this application of it.

Mr. GARFIELD. The application I have made of it is to show that Mr. Webster did not believe that Congress could constitutionally delegate to the States the authority to tax the securities of the United States.

Mr. DAWES. He does not say so; that question does not arise.

Mr. GARFIELD. He does expressly say that the power to protect United States securities is vested in Congress by the Constitution, and Congress cannot place it elsewhere. This very question has been argued before the Supreme Court within the last three weeks. One of the most distinguished lawyers of New York, Mr. William M. Evarts, delivered a very able argument to prove that Congress cannot delegate to a State the power to tax the bonds of the United States. I trust this House will not adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. PIKE.]

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STE-

VENS] tells us he is in favor of returning to specie payments when it could be done without disturbing or deranging the business of the country. If he waits for that it can never be done. It cannot be done without first contracting the currency and producing a temporary stringency in the money market. If we have not the nerve to do that, if we have not patriotism to suffer that temporary inconvenience we must go on in the swift road to financial disaster and ultimate national bankruptcy.

The gentleman says we must reach specie payments by protection. He says if we protect our manufactures we shall keep gold from going abroad. This is not his first attempt to regulate the value and movement of gold by legislation. After a few days' trial his law of 1864 for that purpose was repealed. I do not oppose protection. I am in favor of protecting the sanctity of contracts by bringing all values back to the basis of a uniform standard. Then our iron-mills will not stand idle as they now do, because of the risk occasioned by the violent fluctuation of prices.

Mr. Speaker, this is our only remedy. I have faith in the Secretary of the Treasury that he will, by and by, with as little disturbance to business as possible, bring us to specie payments. We have traveled more than one quarter of the way since Congress met. Gold was then 148, now it is 180. Mercury in the barometer is not more sensitive to atmospheric influences than is the gold market to the legislation of Congress. Witness the following paragraph from the financial column of a recent New York daily:

"Wall street is more animated to-day in consequence of the report, which is extensively believed, that all loan bills will be made conducive to inflation, and that the temper of Congress is hostile to all measures looking toward contraction of the greenback currency. This is interpreted to be favorable to higher prices, and is already producing its effects in stimulating speculation."

Defeat this bill and there will be a jubilee in Wall street. This House must take the responsibility.

Loan Bill.

SPEECH OF HON. JOHN LYNCH, OF MAINE,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

March 16, 1866.

The House having under consideration the bill to amend an act entitled "An act to provide ways and means to support the Government," approved March 3, 1865—

Mr. LYNCH said:

Mr. SPEAKER: The bill under consideration extends the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury so far as to allow him to retire the United States legal-tender notes, which now constitute so large a part of the currency of the country, and which are the only "lawful money" in circulation, and to substitute therefor the bonds of the Government bearing interest in coin. The bill also provides that the bonds which may be disposed of elsewhere than in the United States may be made payable in the currency or coin of the country where they are made payable. These are briefly the powers which this bill proposes to confer upon the Secretary. Before considering their nature or the question of their necessity, let us see what powers that officer already has under existing laws. The act of June 30, 1864, authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury—

"To redeem and cause to be canceled and destroyed any Treasury notes or United States notes heretofore issued under authority of previous acts of Congress, and to substitute in lieu thereof an equal amount of Treasury notes or of other United States notes."

Under this act the Secretary has the power to convert every dollar of the legal-tender circulation into seven-thirty Treasury notes or into compound-interest notes. Further, the act of March 3, 1865, provides that "any Treasury notes or other obligations bearing interest issued under any act of Congress may, at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury and with the consent of the holder, be converted into any description of bonds authorized by this act." This authority covers nearly half the entire indebtedness of the Government. The Secretary, under it, has the power to fund the entire issue of seven-thirty Treasury notes, amounting to $830,000,000; the three-year compound-interest notes, amounting to $180,000,000; the certificates of indebtedness, amounting to $60,000,000; the one and two-year five per cent. notes, amounting to $8,500,000, and the temporary loan, bearing four, five and six per cent. interest, amounting to $115,000,000, making a total of $1,193,000,000, which existing laws authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to fund at his own discretion. It should be understood, however, and it is due to the able officer at the head of the Treasury Department to have it well and fairly understood, that the authority conferred by the act of March 3, 1865, is, after all, limited to an extent which seriously interferes with the process of funding thereby authorized. The necessity of funding a large portion of the floating debt of the Government is, I think, universally admitted, and the Secretary of the Treasury, therefore, should be clothed with explicit power to make this change in the character of the debt in the safest, least expensive, and most practicable manner. In doing this, however, I would not have the distinction lost sight of which so clearly exists, and which is so universally recognized between the bonds, Treasury notes, and other interest-bearing obligations of the Government on the one hand, and the United States legal-tender notes on the other. These latter are the lawful currency of the country; they are not mere promises to pay money, but money itself—"lawful money," capable of paying debts, and answering all the uses of money in making exchanges within the country.

The interest-bearing portion of the public debt is payable at certain dates, and must be provided for at maturity. The Secretary of the Treasury is the guardian of the public credit. On him devolves the duty of providing for the payment of these maturing obligations. He has the responsibility, and should have power commensurate therewith.

The limitation with reference to funding, which I have alluded to as existing in the act of March 3, 1865, consists in the fact that the Secretary can only fund Government obligations in one way. In other words, he has no power to anticipate means by the sale of bonds and to apply the same to the funding of the floating debt. He can fund only so fast as an exchange of one class of indebtedness for another can be effected. He can hold out no inducement for a speedy conversion of such obligations, and he is thereby hampered and embarrassed in his operations. I hope, therefore, that the law which now gives this power under limitations may be so amended as to confer it upon the Secretary of the Treasury without restriction. Whether it is or is not best to continue, so far as it can be done, that portion of the debt bearing interest in currency in its present form, thereby preventing it from leaving the country and hastening the day when the Government may be able to redeem its circulating notes in specie by reducing the amount of coin it will be obliged to pay out for interest, are questions to be settled by the head of the Treasury; and I am ready to vote for the bill reported by the committee, amended only so as to prevent the funding of non-interest-bearing into interest-bearing obligations.

But I am, as I have already intimated, opposed to conferring any power upon the Secretary of the Treasury to contract the volume of the national greenback legal-tender currency. The exercise of such a power is not necessary to facilitate the funding of the interest-bearing debt; indeed, it is acknowledged that it would retard if not defeat that most desirable object. It is said that the Secretary "could not if, he would and would not if he could" contract the currency, but that it is necessary to hold this power suspended in terrorem over the business of the country in order to prevent speculation. In answer I have only to say that if the people of the country are not competent to manage their business affairs they will not be benefited by any governmental guardianship which may be placed over them.

It should be borne in mind that $182,000,000 of the United States currency afloat, about one third of the total amount in circulation, is in the compound-interest notes, which all agree should first be retired. The Secretary has not only the authority but the power, if he deems it prudent to exercise it, to call these in at any time. They never pass for the face value and interest, and the Government can at any time exchange its bonds for them. And yet the most determined advocate for contraction does not pretend that it would be prudent to withdraw them all from circulation in less than about two years. I have heard no one who favors contraction intimate that it would be prudent to contract more than $100,000,000 per year.

Why should we confer on we know not what Secretary of the Treasury a power and authority which would extend beyond two years from this time? Congress meets twice within that period, and if it is found that the experiment is a safe one, and that it is prudent to continue the contraction of the currency beyond the amount of the compound-interest notes, the authority can be given. We can confer additional authority by subsequent legislation if it is found necessary, but are we quite sure that we can withdraw it when once conferred? May we not find it as hard to repeal a bad law as it is to enact a good one? How many men on this side of the House would consent to confer this vast power, which subjects the entire business interests of the country to the will or caprice of one man, providing it was known that the able and upright officer now at the head of the Treasury Department would not hold his position for sixty days, but would give place to some unknown successor? Can any man say that such a contingency may not happen? It is said that it is necessary to contract this currency because it is inflated, and that we can only return to specie payments by contracting. I believe it is capable of being demonstrated that the currency is not inflated, not in excess of the requirements of the country, and therefore does not need contraction, and that the amount of currency afloat has very little influence either upon the price of gold or the price of merchandise; in other words, that in order to reduce prices, either of gold or merchandise, and to return to specie payments it is not necessary to contract the currency.

In support of this proposition I will present a few plain statistics based upon the financial history of the past four years and upon the actual wealth and population of the country. The necessities of the Government which caused the issue of a large amount of paper money undoubtedly did to a considerable extent during the war advance the price of gold. But the increasing issue of paper money by the Government depended entirely upon the success of our armies in the field, and as their final success seemed speedy or remote, so the necessity for the issue of more promises to pay diminished or increased, and the value set upon such obligations depended entirely upon the degree of confidence which the people felt in the stability of the Government. Now, however, confidence being entirely restored, the only question which can affect the currency is whether the quantity in circulation is equal to or in excess of the business wants of the country. If it be shown that it is not in excess, then certainly no reason exists for its contraction; if it can be shown that it is the safest and best paper currency ever put in circulation, that is another argument against its contraction; and if it be shown that the population and wealth of the nation is increasing so rapidly that in less than fifteen years the amount of currency per capita will be only one half what it now is, then that is another reason why we should hesitate before we agree upon a policy for annihilating a currency which every day's experience establishes more and more firmly in the confidence of the people.

Let us examine first the relation which the amount of gold has held to the amount of currency in circulation. The amount afloat on the 1st of July, 1864, when the price of gold was at its highest point—260 to 280—was, inclusive of State bank circulation and exclusive of compound-interest notes, according to the books of the Treasury Department, $577,579,860. On the 1st day of November, 1865, one year and four months later, with the price of gold down to 145, the currency had increased to $704,218,038, or a net increase of $127,000,000; while at the present time, with gold in the vicinity of 130, the currency, exclusive of compound-interest notes, is equal to $725,000,000. Thus it is plain that if the price of gold depended upon the inflation or contraction of the currency, then it ought, taking the price on the 1st of July, 1864, as a basis, to be now over three hundred per cent.; and if gold has declined from one hundred and eighty to thirty per cent. premium under an actual and considerable increase of the currency, what should prevent it from going to par within the present year, thereby enabling the Government itself to resume specie payments, and as a consequence carrying with it in due time a similar resumption by the banks of the country?

In addition to the many advantages and great superiority possessed by the legal-tender currency as a circulating medium, there is another advantage accruing to the Government from its use, and to this point I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] who thinks the Government should withdraw its circulation and leave the entire currency of the country in the hands of the banks. So long as the Government issues a currency of this character it can control the matter of specie payments, and the danger which attends it when left entirely in the control of the banks is removed. If the banks control the entire circulation we can never rely upon the permanency of specie payments; they will inevitably consult their own interests, and they will suspend whenever dangers threaten them, no matter what laws may be passed regulating the subject, for the laws of the country must conform to the laws of trade. Give the banks the entire circulation and they might laugh at an attempt to close them up on account of a suspension; they are "masters of the situation;" the country cannot get on without a currency.

But the permanency of specie payments may be greatly increased if the Government stands ready, anchored in the confidence of the people, to pay its paper dollar for dollar in gold, and this simple knowledge on the part of the people that the greenback passing through their hands day after day is the positive equivalent of a dollar in gold in the Treasury will make that circulation one of the greatest blessings which could be conferred upon the people. This sentiment is even now rapidly growing. Let us once reach a specie standard for the greenbacks of the country and the people will never consent to have withdrawn from circulation a currency so well adapted to all their wants and so well grounded in the first principles of security and confidence.

The practicability of an early resumption of specie payments and the road thereto involves many serious considerations. It has been and is strongly urged that there is no way of reaching such a result except through the policy of contraction; that to make money scarce and dear you will approximate a specie standard more certainly than in any other way. I question the correctness of this theory.

39TH CONG. . 1ST SESS.

Loan Bill—Mr. Lynch.

HO. OF REPS.

As has already been shown, gold has declined from two hundred and eighty to one hundred and thirty per cent. under an absolute increase of the currency. Will some one give me a sound reasoning why the decline should stop at this particular point? Will not the same reasons which have forced it from its highest altitude to its present point operate to drive it still lower? If we should double our imports to-morrow would not the price of gold advance, even though at the same time we withdraw one hundred millions of greenbacks from circulation? If, on the contrary, we should reduce our imports and double our exports, would not the price of gold decline without contracting our currency a single dollar? Is there any more certain way of paying our debt abroad or of keeping our gold at home than by increasing our exports? And is there any more certain way of increasing our exports than by stimulating productions? And is there any more certain way of stimulating production than by employing this very circulation, the capital of the country, in developing its vast resources of every character; in cheapening the price of food by increasing the production of food; in inducing immigration by opening new and vast fields for development, and in adding to the production of the country so rapidly that a few years will give us a monopoly of the leading agricultural staples, bringing the whole world to our doors to buy what we have to sell, and keeping the balance of trade as constantly in our favor in the future as it has so uniformly been in favor of England in the past? Instead of disturbing the entire business interests of the country by an attempt to compress the currency into channels in which it was employed prior to its increase, would it not be more natural, much easier, and far safer to enlarge those channels to suit its present volume? The business interests of the country are fast accommodating themselves to its new financial condition; already are matters so settled that contraction can scarcely be talked of without advancing the rate of interest one or two per cent., and I ask gentlemen which is the true policy for the development of this country, to make money dear or to cheapen it? Which most stimulates the employment of labor and the development of capital, and thus adds most to the wealth of the country, money plenty or money scarce?

Mr. Speaker, in regard to our finances, we have received and believed in the old and long-established precedents of the nations of Europe. Because it took Great Britain many years to return to specie payments after an exhausting war, the theory has been accepted almost without question that we cannot do otherwise. Sir, the experiences of the country for the last five years have exploded many false theories and falsified many sanguine predictions. It was positively asserted by our foreign foes that the South could not be conquered; that it never yet had been that a free people of the numbers, resources, and territory of the southern people were defeated and compelled to submit to the will of a conqueror; that we could not raise armies sufficient for the work; that we had no money of our own and could borrow none in Europe; that the armies, even if raised, would, upon a return to civil life, so disorganize society that Government would be upheaved and civil order destroyed.

Well, sir, we have seen the result of all these predictions; we have astonished the civilized world by setting at naught the most profound theories of these modern sages; we have overturned the accepted notions and ideas of past centuries, and in their stead we have hewn out our own destiny in our own way, until we stand on ground where we may safely bid defiance to the assaults of the combined physical and moral powers of Europe.

In view of all these facts, so grandly and imperishably carved in our history, why should we follow the ideas of Europe in regard to our financial any more than we did in regard to our military administration? Because the London Times raises the cry and our own croakers echo it, that "we must have a financial crisis" in passing from a paper to a specie circulation, is it necessary for us to precipitate one upon the country in order to verify the predictions of these prophets of evil?

England said, you cannot carry on a war without a European loan, and that you cannot get. We spurned her prediction and appealed to our own people; the response was so mighty that even England and all other enlightened nations of Europe made haste to join the throng that poured their money into our coffers eager to buy our bonds and take our loans upon our own terms. Shall we now say that we cannot return to specie payments because England under circumstances of an entirely different character did not do so for many years after a return of peace? Such a reason it seems to me is not worthy the name of an argument. The laws of trade and the restoration of confidence are bringing us steadily and surely to a resumption of specie payments; any attempt to force a resumption by legislation will defeat the object; that confidence upon which a permanent resumption of specie payments must rest will neither be engendered nor strengthened by legislative tinkering. The last Congress tried an experiment in this direction by passing a law to force down the price of gold; the result was a rapid advance and the immediate repeal of the law.

It is almost universally admitted that the return to specie payments must be gradual. Suppose, then, that the Government of the United States takes the initiative; not by a contraction of the currency, but by announcing, at as early a day as is practicable, that its legal-tender currency will be redeemed in gold on presentation at the Treasury, and then, to aid the banks in following its lead, let the national banks be allowed to redeem in the legal-tender notes thus put on par with gold by the Government. With the basis of redemption thus broadened it could not be long before the business and the money of the country rested as firmly upon a specie basis as ever.

I do not assert either the necessity or practicability of doing this immediately. The harvests of the present year are necessary to assure us that the production of the country has been resumed with greater vigor than ever; with the volume of our exports daily increasing, they must be greatly augmented a year hence; with the flow of specie from the Pacific steadily gaining; with the national debt securely at rest in its present position, undergoing no increase, and with a material reduction of taxation already rendered possible by the condition of the country's finances, I can see no good reason why, under the present able management of the Treasury, the Government may not before all the Treasury notes now outstanding mature—if not within a year from this time—stand ready to redeem its own circulation in gold.

It may be said, in objection to this, that neither the Government nor the banks can resume specie payments because of the insufficiency of gold in the country. I answer that specie payments do not and never have, except to a comparatively limited degree, rested upon the amount of specie in the country; in other words, specie payments have been only a pleasant illusion which was immediately dispelled whenever a crisis occurred which disturbed public confidence; people then hastened to demand specie for their bank notes, and just then when it was wanted, and because it was wanted, it could not be had; the banks suspended, fear took the place of confidence, and the gold dollar was sold at a premium. The great underlying principle of specie payments is public confidence; upon that rests the question far more than upon an ability to pay specie on demand. And where does a greater degree of confidence exist than among our own people that the Government has the power, the means, and the determination to protect the public credit, and to redeem and pay off its liabilities? Does any one suppose that if the greenbacks were daily redeemed by the Government in gold that there would be a run upon the Treasury? To say nothing of the impossibility of withdrawing any considerable amount from the circulation for such a purpose, the very fact that the paper dollar of the Government was worth a dollar in gold at the Treasury would, by the laws of trade, keep them moving as the circulating medium, undiverted from their proper channels. In support of this theory of specie payments, and the foundation upon which it has really rested in times past, I will compare the amount of currency afloat and the amount of specie in the country at five different periods since 1830.

We had in

	Specie.	Circulation.
1830.....	$22,114,917	$61,323,898
1840.....	33,105,155	105,968,572
1843.....	33,505,306	55,563,608
1850.....	48,677,138	155,012,911
1860.....	83,504,537	207,102,477

Thus it will be seen that at no time during this period, except in 1843, did the banks have specie enough to redeem but little over one third of their circulation. It should also be borne in mind that the banks having the least specie had the largest circulation, while the banks which held the largest amount of specie had little circulation, it would undoubtedly be within the truth to say that $150,000,000 of the circulation of 1860 rested upon a specie basis of less than $30,000,000. This proves conclusively that the paper circulation of the country never rested upon an actual "specie basis," but on the confidence of the community; and whenever this was shaken, the whole paper fabric fell. The currency of the country never rested on so solid a foundation, and was never so strong in the confidence of the country, as to-day.

It is assumed that because we have more than three times the amount of paper in circulation than we had in 1860, ($207,000,000,) therefore all over that amount is in excess of the business wants of the country, and tends to unsettle values and inflate prices. I think the fallacy of this theory is in assuming that we had in 1860 all the currency in circulation that could be profitably used in the business of the country. We had, undoubtedly, all that the banking capital of the country at that time warranted, and much more, as has been shown, than could be redeemed in the promised specie. But the fact that we are now using four times the amount in the legitimate business of the country, and with less speculation in merchandise than at times when our circulation was one quarter the amount, is conclusive that we did not then have all we required and could profitably use. The fact is, the business of the country is only limited by the amount of capital available to transact it. The banks, with their $300,000,000 of circulation, have supplied the old business, while the disbursements of the Government have gone into hundreds of new channels, have reached new classes, and have placed the means of doing business within the reach of more men than possessed them before.

It is assumed that the redundant currency is the cause of the high prices of merchandise, and that a reduction of the currency will bring down prices and also enable us to return to specie payments. But the fact is that gold has fallen from 280 to 130 while the currency has been increased, and merchandise which, according to this theory, should have both advanced with the increase of the currency and fallen with the decline in gold, has upset both theories by following gold down for a time, and almost immediately returning to the point at which it stood when gold was at its highest, then falling again until it approximates old values. Is it strange that merchandise, the product of labor, should command high prices in view of the enormous decrease in the productive industry of the country for the last four years. In nearly one half of the country, the entire South, the population was during the war almost wholly changed from producers to consumers and destroyers; and in the North more than two and half million men, or more than twelve per cent of its population were absolutely withdrawn from the work of production and added to the army of consumers; and in addition there has been to an extent very great, though incalculable, a diminution of the productive industry of those who have not been taken from their plows, their looms, and their anvils, caused by the suspense, anxiety, and excitement of the civil war.

In these four years the surplus production of the country has been exhausted, and the current production has not supplied the current demand. It is neither a redundant currency nor excessive speculation that has kept prices at so high a standard. Look at the present condition of trade in the great markets of the country, merchandise and the premium on gold both rapidly declining, not only without contraction, but with a positive increase of the currency. What is the true cause of this decline which all unite in saying is not the result of a sudden fluctuation, but promises to be permanent? Is it not simply the fact that the supply is increasing and the demand is falling off? The great army of consumers is being added to the class of producers, and prices of merchandise and food must always be primarily and chiefly subject to the great law of supply and demand. It can scarcely be doubted that prices would have been still lower and that domestic manufacture would have supplied much of the merchandise imported from abroad had not the fear of a "tight money market" withheld and diverted millions from the channels of productive industry to swell the bank deposits in the great financial centers of the country, to be loaned on call, and kept within reach against the day when contraction should give it more power and value. Men would not convert their money into cloth and iron and ships and railroads when all these products of labor were to be cheapened, while the money had only to be kept on hand to realize an advance in price.

Another fact which goes to show that high prices have not been caused mainly by the increase of the currency is that lands have advanced no more in the last five years than in the five years preceding, showing that the advance of prices have chiefly affected the products of labor.

In connection with this matter of contraction I wish to press another point, and it is this: that whenever you reduce the currency or tighten the money market you first strike at the price of labor. Labor is the first element in productive industry that is affected by it. If money becomes scarce and dear the demand for the products of industry falls off. The manufacturer not only reduces the wages of his operatives, but he reduces the amount of his productions by putting his employes upon half time. In this way the production is checked until the surplus is exhausted and the demand is again equal to the supply. Instead of being diffused over the country, seeking new channels of employment, and adding to the vigor of the development of the resources of the country, our capital will remain locked up in the vaults of the commercial centers, sensitive to the slightest influence, and in constant fear; and the uncertainty as to the policy which may from time to time be adopted by the head of the Treasury. Is it not far safer and much more legitimate to absorb the excess of production by the development of new resources; to absorb also the excess of currency, if there be any, in new channels of employment; to give the currency the freest scope of circulation by creating and increasing the demand for labor? Wealth creates wealth, and it is the strongest evidence of financial statesmanship and business talent if that wealth is so applied as to add to the prosperity of the country. Our currency then finds its proper use in developing our vast resources; in building new railroads, canals, and factories; in replacing our lost shipping, and in opening up the vast mineral wealth of the nation; and in rebuilding and furnishing the sinews of trade to the whole southern country.

Let us now see how the present circulation of the country will be affected by its natural increase in population.

The total amount of currency in circulation October 31, 1865, was, according to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, (exclusive of compound-interest notes,) $704,218,038, or about $19 32 per capita for the people of the United States. This amount would be reduced by our increasing population in the following ratio: in

	Per capita.
1870.....	$16 63
1880.....	12 40
1890.....	9 10
1900.....	7 02

The ratio of circulation to the property of the country, estimating the increase at the same ratio as from 1850 to 1860, would be as follows: in

	Per cent.
1865, about.....	33 1/4
1870, ".....	2
1880, ".....	1
1890, ".....	1/2
1900, ".....	1/8

The national bank circulation of the country October 1, 1865, was $171,821,903, distributed among the several sections of the country, as follows:

Sections.	Population.	Bank capital.	Amount per capita.
New England.....	3,135,283	$64,998,034	$20 73
New York, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey.....	7,453,985	61,595,246	8 27
Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Michigan, Minnesota, Ohio, and Wisconsin.....	7,881,026	37,023,883	4 69
Delaware, Kentucky, Maryland, Missouri, and District of Columbia.....	3,212,041	5,962,850	1 85
Louisiana, Tennessee, Virginia, and West Virginia.....	3,414,121	1,665,040	48

Thus it is seen that the circulation of the country is very unequally distributed. It is chiefly centered in New England and on the seaboard, while the western and southern States are almost bare. Assuming the same ratio of distribution for the whole circulation of the country, the amount per capita for the United States averaging but $19 32, yet New England would have the very great disproportion of $84 per capita. And what is strikingly significant on this point is, that her business is in a most healthy condition; her capital is legitimately employed, and not for speculative purposes. France has a circulating medium of about $30 and Great Britain of $25 per capita, and yet we are told that $19 32 will ruin the people of a country which has the broadest field under the sun for the employment of capital. We want the use of the currency now in circulation, than which there never was better or safer, to create new wealth; we want every hundred thousand dollars of greenbacks to be the implement and agent for extracting a million of the precious minerals from our mountains; we want this currency, the representative of the capital of the nation, to construct and equip three great lines of railroad to the Pacific; we want it to enable the fertile States and Terriories of the West to develop their power in the productive industry of the country; we want it to construct new lines of communication whereby we may cheapen transportation from the distant States and give our producers greater benefits in foreign markets; in a word, we want it because the present and future interests and the rapid development of the country demand and need it.

I will refer to but one more point on this branch of the subject. It is assumed by many that we must have a financial revulsion because such has always been the case after an unusual abundance of currency. People who assume this lose sight of the fact that an abundant supply of paper money usually indicates a large indebtedness of the people, and that the crash comes when they are obliged to return their borrowed capital. The present abundance of paper money results from the indebtedness of the Government to the people; the people being comparatively out of debt, there will be no crash. Comparisons of our present condition with the financial revulsions of 1837 and 1857 fail entirely, because there is no similarity of circumstances; the currency at those periods was more vitiated than inflated; there was no security for it; the people were largely in debt. In addition to the currency afloat, which was then the representative of the indebtedness of the people, there was also afloat an enormous amount of notes—debt—which the people owed to one another and to the banks. The crash came when people found that no one had any money to pay with; the currency was not based upon the ability of a united people represented by its Government to pay, but upon the ability of individuals to redeem the promises they had made to each other. Now, the Government, representing the entire people, pledges the faith of that whole people to pay this national indebtedness.

Every dollar of paper money now in circulation, except the insignificant amount represented by State bank circulation, is secured by a mortgage on the whole property of the country. It is a secured circulation, and really rests upon a specie basis, although not immediately convertible into specie, except at a discount. If the specie is wanted it can be had and no man suffers, for no holder ever received it as the equivalent of specie, but at a larger discount than he now makes in converting it into the required coin. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SCOFFIELD,] who was troubled because he could not obtain specie for his greenbacks at the Treasury, would have found no difficulty in doing so without applying to the Treasury, if he were content to accept the amount which they cost him. The greenbacks rest on a specie basis, because they can be converted into bonds, the principal and interest of which are payable in coin.

The terrible evils, present and prospective, of this "irredeemable," inconvertible paper currency are purely imaginary. The people neither see, feel, nor believe in them; and they will never consent to an increase of their taxes to the amount of $27,000,000 per annum for the purpose of allowing the bankers of the country a monopoly of the circulation. There is another reason why I am opposed to retiring any of this currency, which is, that we want it for supplying the southern States. That matter was alluded to by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] in answer to the inquiry of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. PRICE,] whether currency had not been increasing while gold had been decreasing in value. The gentleman from Ohio answered "that six hundred millions of confederate currency had collapsed in a day, and the vacuum had to be filled; so that while our currency had actually increased it had diminished relatively, that is, in proportion to the business of the country." Now, unless the vacuum has been filled, which no one would pretend, this simple statement of the gentleman pretty effectually disposes of his argument in favor of contraction. This whole southern country is to be rebuilt, and with capital drawn from the North, unless a contraction of our money market drives her people to Europe to borrow. The money will be loaned upon mortgages, and repaid by the annual crops of the country and by its developed wealth. Whether this capital shall be British gold or United States greenbacks, depends upon the state of our money market. If we give them the paper money of the country, we make every man who has a dollar of it in his pocket interested to that extent in the Government, and in sustaining its credit. If we drive them to Europe by our inability to supply them, we alienate them from us, and allow them to identify their interests with those of our enemies. Every day's experience goes to prove that our true financial policy is to go on and provide for the maturing obligations of the Government, without contracting or disturbing the currency of the country, which is the life-blood of its commerce. Let it alone, and it will flow where it is wanted, and find ample field for employment. Let us confer no authority upon the Secretary to contract this currency; its contraction should neither be threatened by the Government nor apprehended by the people.

39TH CONG....1ST SESS.

Reconstruction—Mr. Grider.

HO. OF REPS.

Reconstruction.

SPEECH OF HON. HENRY GRIDER, OF KENTUCKY, IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, March 24, 1866.

The House, as in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, resumed the consideration of the President's annual message.

Mr. GRIDER. Mr. Speaker, as I am a member of the reconstruction committee, it is perhaps my duty, much as I feel disinclined, briefly to express and sustain my convictions in relation to its formation, powers, and action, as well as the action of Congress under it, now made exciting and of high interest and import, not only in Congress but throughout the whole country; involving questions until recently unassailed and always vital to constitutional freedom. We have had a most grievous and desolating war, and without stopping to dwell upon its disasters, its fearful visitations in the camp, the field, and the family circle, I proceed at once to show that the Federal Government had the express right granted in the Constitution "for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions" as the best hope of restoring peace and saving the Government in its integrity. This great beneficent end, so far as the insurrection is involved, has been accomplished, while it is to be regretted many wrongs and errors have been superinduced, wholly disconnected with the great end, the preservation of the Union.

The object of the war was conceded by all the authorities of the Government, and especially aptly set forth in the resolution of Mr. Crittenden, of the House, and President Johnson, then of the Senate, with scarcely a dissenting voice in either House or Senate, that the war, "forced upon the General Government without cause by the disunionists, should not be waged on the part of the Government in any spirit of oppression or for any purpose of conquest or subjugation, or purpose of overthrowing or interfering with the rights or established institutions of any of the States, free or slave, but to defend and maintain the supremacy of the Constitution, and to preserve the Union with all the dignity, equality, and rights of the several States unimpaired; and as soon as these ends are accomplished the war ought to cease." The war has ceased. One end to be accomplished was to keep up the dignity, equality, and rights of the several States unimpaired. The insurrection is suppressed. How stand the several States? What is their relation to one another and the United States? We shall undertake to show. They are certainly not Territories, conquered provinces, out of the Union, without the dignity and equality of the several States. They could not go out of the Union. If they had this right, then the General Government made war upon them wrongfully, and the Constitution giving this power to the General Government to maintain its own integrity by suppressing the insurrection is a nullity, wholly inoperative. Such cannot be the case. They must be in the Union or out of the Union. They went into insurrection to get out of the Union and form a separate government and failed. Then the insurrectionary States are under the Constitution and laws, where they were before the insurrection, with all the dignity, equality, and rights of the several States unimpaired so far as their status and representation are concerned.

But if this new and startling question is raised against the equality and rights of States, and against representation thereof, how is it to be decided? By the Supreme Court? Or by the Secretary of War? Or by the Senate and House? Or by the joint committee on reconstruction? We think not; this would be ridiculous; we believe such authorities, or their interposition, advice, or interference are alike uninvited and unwarranted, whether by law, joint resolution, or otherwise, you interpose any interference whatever. From long acknowledged principle and practice I hold that the House is exclusively the judge of its own members under the explicit terms of the Constitution, in these words, "Each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members." Any interference with the jurisdiction and action of the House exclusively to settle this question, is as absurd as to mangle and control the action of one court by the members, action, and interference of a different court of other powers, duties, and jurisdiction; and its tendency is to overwhelm all principle and condense power somewhere to subserve the end of those too fond to amend our fundamental and paramount law and place all the agencies of the Government in the hands of a fickle and variable majority. We must have a fixed rule; that rule is clearly set forth in the Constitution, and all are interdicted and excluded in their action but the House. The House by the Constitution is further invested, two thirds concurring, with the power to purify itself and expel members, showing that all laws, conditions, restraints, and interference with the House is uninvited and unconstitutional.

I had the honor to refer the following resolutions to the committee on reconstruction, which I here quote, expressive of some of the principles upon the subject now under consideration:

Resolved, That the United States Government grants the power peaceably, or if necessary by arms, "to enforce the laws, suppress insurrection, and repel invasion;" but the General Government cannot by any action whatever destroy itself nor the State governments, nor can the State governments destroy either, or legally disturb the harmony of the whole. All the grants and powers under the Constitution are conservative, none destructive; wherefore all the States have been and are always in the Union.

Resolved, That when the United States Government suppressed the insurrection it only vindicated its constitutional power and preëxisting rights, and no more; and the rights and powers of the Federal and State governments are all remitted back and assume the same condition and relations sustained before the insurrection, and (except so far as altered or amended) remain unimpaired and in full force and virtue.

Resolved, That the law of Congress apportioning Representatives to the several States (including the insurrectionary States) under the census of 1860 is constitutional and valid, and that members of Congress from all the States, regularly elected under said law, are entitled forthwith to their seats upon taking the oath of office to support the Constitution of the United States.

Resolved, That as a generous kindness and cordial forgiveness consistent with right, now peace exists, are the highest attributes of our nature, and as we must have "one Government, one Constitution, and one people," the glory, protection, and safety of all—cherishing these feelings, we say it is untimely, unjust, and impolitic to insist upon amendments to the Constitution to operate upon all until all are represented in the House and Senate.

Resolved, That it is illogical and unconstitutional to hold that States are in the Union to vote for constitutional amendments and yet not entitled to representation in Congress.

Resolved, That to tax any State by Congress and refuse to the people representation is contrary to the first principles of the American Government, and is inconsistent with the constitutional and equal rights of all the people.

I beg leave to support the first and second resolutions by the opinions of some learned men and courts. Reconstruction is a wrong word. The Union has always existed; there has been a temporary suspension of law, in particular States and places, but that law is now again in force as before.

In the case of the Amy Warwick, in admiralty, Judge Sprague of Massachusetts, said:

"It has been supposed that if the Government have the rights of a belligerent, then, after the rebellion is suppressed, it will have the rights of conquest; that a State and its inhabitants may be permanently divested of all political privileges and treated as foreign territory acquired by arms. This is an error, a grave and dangerous error. Belligerent rights cannot be exercised where there are no belligerents. Conquest of a foreign country gives absolute, unlimited sovereign rights, but no nation ever makes such a conquest of its own territory. If a hostile power, either from without or within, take and hold possession and dominion over any portion of its territory, and the nation by force of arms expel and overthrow the enemy and suppress hostilities, it acquires no new title, but merely regains the possession of that of which it had been temporarily deprived. The nation acquires no new sovereignty, but merely maintains its previous rights."

"When the United States take possession of a rebel district, they merely vindicate their preëxisting title. Under despotic Governments the right of confiscation may be unlimited; but under our Government the right of sovereignty over any portion of a State is given and limited by the Constitution, and will be the same after the war as it was before."

Judge Comstock says, in relation to the States in insurrection, that—

"The States are always members of the Union under the Constitution, with all the rights and immunities reserved in the compact; the armed insurrection of individuals being suppressed, the Constitution and laws resume their peaceful sway, the Union remains unbroken, and all the laws and institutions of slavery remain as they were before, unimpaired, and in full force and vigor."

And Judge Curtis remarks, when the insurrection is suppressed:

"That the McClellan policy of receiving the southern States back to their places in the Union as they were before they left it is the only policy that affords the slightest prospect of peace and reunion, with the Constitution preserved, with our nationality saved, and with the public credit rescued from destruction."

Judge Williams, of the court of appeals of Kentucky, (4 Metcalf's Reports, last case in the book,) says, upon this very question, coming up incidentally—and he has been classed with radical politicians—

"That on a restoration of the national authority over the seceded States, their constitution and laws which existed and were recognized by the Federal Government previous to the rebellion become operative as part of the national Government; that the States cannot constitutionally, by legislative, executive, or judicial action, destroy the United States Government, nor can they constitutionally destroy it by force of arms; nor can the United States constitutionally destroy a State government by any or all of these means."

Mr. Speaker, I ask to be indulged to quote once more upon this subject from Judge Nicholas, of Kentucky:

"Nothing short of success in the rebellion can get the rebel States out of the Union. They have, therefore, to be treated while the rebellion lasts, and after it is subdued, as States in the Union. Nothing can be more irrational than to suppose a power in Congress either to expel the rebel States or permanently to exercise despotic rule over them while the Constitution prohibits even the nation from depriving them by constitutional amendment, from their equal suffrage in the Senate. If there is anything equally irrational, it is the absurd attempt to deduce from the clause 'guarantying to every State a republican form of government' a power in Congress to impose upon a State a government that is not republican. This would be a plain breach of the guarantee under pretext of its fulfillment. A permanent form of government, dictated by Congress or any extraneous power, was certainly not intended, as it would certainly not be republican or self-government. After the rebellion is subdued (and it now is) the nation will not tolerate any protracted arbitrary government of the rebel States, even if Congress has the right so to govern during the rebellion. It would be the accumulation of vastly too much power in the Federal Government, leading to rapid consolidation and the overthrow of the most necessary safeguard of the nation's liberty."

Reconstruction—Mr. Grider.

A republican form of government is such as the States have themselves formed, uninfluenced by others; such as the States now have, and upon which, and in view of which, they were admitted into the Union; and such as any people of any State may form for themselves not in conflict with the precedents of the Government nor the paramount law of the nation. There is no power in Congress to say to the House you must not admit the members of a State until the State passes laws or conforms to certain conditions; no precedent can be produced resting upon constitutional authority for this course; and if prosecuted to the exclusion of members and Senators duly elected, from House and Senate it amounts to despotism and revolution. I rely upon the authorities quoted to show the insurrectionary States are in the Union—until very recently it has never been denied—and I now proceed most briefly to show they have been so treated by Congress during the whole rebellion. We have seen what was the object of the war; what was intended to be accomplished. We always, in Congress, claimed jurisdiction over all the States. We repeatedly gave representation in Congress to States in insurrection—I instance Virginia, Louisiana, and Tennessee. These States, some of them, were then in insurrection; and if out of the Union, as is now contended, why was this done?

In August, 1861, Congress passed a law assessing direct tax on Tennessee for $670,000, as I believe, and all other States in their just proportion.

In July, 1862, Congress passed a law to provide internal revenue, operating upon Tennessee and all the States, and even now, so far as the laws concerned, collecting revenue under it.

In 1863 Congress passed a law fixing the ratio of and apportioning representation for Tennessee and all the States, both North and South. This certainly was a full recognition that the southern States were in the Union, and that they were entitled to representation, especially when the insurrection was suppressed, leaving the House, according to the Constitution, to be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its members, divested of any conditions or terms imposed upon them from any extraneous intermeddling source whatever.

In 1864 the revenue law was amended and continued in operation alike upon all the States; and I believe in that same year Hon. Andrew Johnson, a citizen of Tennessee, was nominated by the majority now in Congress as Vice President of the United States. He was constitutionally eligible and elected, and now by operation of the Constitution is President of the United States. How, then, can gentlemen contend that Tennessee is out of the Union, or was ever out of the Union? All this happened and we never heard a word about the States being out of the Union. We were spending thousands of millions, sacrificing many lives in camp and field, and breaking up the prosperity and peace of our whole people to establish the contrary fact and theory, to maintain the supremacy of the Constitution and preserve the Union.

In 1865 the Federal arms were victorious and the insurrectionary army surrendered. Never until that fact was announced did we hear this new theory about States being dead, not sustaining practical relations, being out of the Union. I have been at a loss to see any good reason for this great change, this opposition to so large a portion of the United States, and this opposition apparently local, sectional, and unjust. We think it cannot be founded on principle. It must be that we need the revenue to combat the enormous debt that threatens us, and so tax the southern States as Territories; but if you give them representation, a correlative right, then the power in the Government may take a different stand-point and the people find other men to administer it.

Mr. Speaker, we must all agree and concur to have this Government administered for the good of the whole people as one people, without sectional jealousies, under equal laws and privileges, according to the grants, powers, and limitations of the Constitution. Then we will have no more insurrection, no more secession in the South, or revolution in the North; no further use for reconstruction committees, so called; no scores of amendments to the Constitution of the United States; no dictation to a State, what she shall do or not do, before her members, duly elected, shall be admitted; no dictation to a State whom she shall disfranchise or make eligible to office; what debts the State shall claim or release, pay or repudiate. I solemnly deny there is any power in Congress to put all these terms on Tennessee and the southern States before their members are admitted to their seats, or any other terms or conditions not found in the Constitution as to the admission of members and Senators.

If the States are dead, where does Congress get the power under the Constitution, the omnific power, to raise them into life? What does Congress claim, to receive or reject them by the action of a joint committee and the action jointly of House and Senate, granting by law restraining orders in effect? We have said there is no authority for this action; the House and Senate are each for themselves the judges; but if this joint action is to be had, and terms put upon House and Senate and States, why not do it, and take the responsibility and answer to the country? The admission of members is the first business of Congress, and now four months have elapsed since the session began and States by their members and Senators have been here all the time asking this matter to be settled, and no vote can be had on any one case. I deprecate this delay. The majority ought to have more respect for themselves and more kindness and generosity toward those over whom they claim to exercise their high powers and jurisdiction so new and unprecedented. But the majority of three to one in the House and twelve to three on the committee do not intend to take the responsibility to reject, as I believe, the members and Senators, and thus for the time being weaken if not dismember the Government. No, sir, they interpose charges, conditions, terms, and every possible excuse for delay and want of final action. They, the committee, institute inquiries and take proof about the loyalty of Tennessee and other States, much of it ex parte. Why, Mr. Speaker, you know Congress admitted members and Senators into Congress from Tennessee in the midst of the insurrection. Why then shall Congress be so very special now after so good a precedent? Tennessee is certainly more loyal now than she was then. Besides, the members-elect from Tennessee are all loyal and always were loyal; one of them was in Congress during the rebellion and two of them commanded Federal regiments during the war. Then why not admit the Tennessee members and Senators at once? No good reason for delay can be given. These are clearer and more commanding reasons than can be truthfully assigned for this delay, or their rejection, than can be found if you keep your reconstruction committee engaged till the session expires.

I beg leave, sir, to urge another particular fact that I think the majority ought to consider. When you ratified the constitutional amendment of emancipation, you not only counted Tennessee, but I believe five other southern States for the amendment; and thus it was ratified! Now, I ask gentlemen seriously, if Tennessee was in the Union, and partook by your consent and in behalf of emancipation in the solemn act of amending the Federal Constitution, if it is not a palpable and shameful inconsistency to say now either that they are not sufficiently loyal, or not in the Union, and cannot have representation in Congress like other States; and more especially is it a palpable inconsistency, inasmuch as Tennessee presents, as I understand, members of unquestionable loyalty!

But, sir, there is still a higher point than that presented in the resolutions I have quoted. You are taxing these States which have been in insurrection, and in that respect holding them to the liabilities and responsibilities of States and denying them their dignity, equality, and rights in the halls of legislation by their representatives. This is a cardinal principle in American jurisprudence. It lies at the root of our liberties. Taxation without representation is the yoke of bondage. You may maintain this principle awhile, but it will be painful and irritating, and finally lead to dissension and evil. It cannot be maintained. Our fathers would not bear it, and we should scorn to ask it of any people, especially our own people. They must have representation if they meet the requisitions of the Government, as they are doing liberally and largely both in taxation and obedience to law. I have found it my duty to take part in ascertaining the state of loyalty in Tennessee, and I had the honor, in the form of a resolution, to express my opinion and the minority of the committee upon that subject, which I ask to read:

"The minority of the committee on reconstruction on the part of the House beg leave to report that said committee have directed an inquiry to be made as to the condition and loyalty of the State of Tennessee. There has been a large amount of evidence taken, some part of it conducing to show that at some localities occasionally there have been some irregularities and temporary disaffection; yet the main direction and weight of the testimony are ample and conclusive to show that the great body of the people in said State are not only loyal and willing, but anxious, to have and maintain amicable, sincere, and patriotic relations with the General Government. Such being the state of the facts, and inasmuch as under the census of 1860 Congress passed a law which was approved in 1863, fixing the ratio and apportioning to Tennessee and all the other States representation; and inasmuch as Tennessee, disavowing insurrectionary purposes or disloyalty, has, under the laws and organic law of said State, regularly elected her members and Senators to the Congress of the United States in conformity to the laws and Constitution of the United States, and said members are here asking admission, and inasmuch as the House by the Constitution is the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its members," considering these facts and principles, we offer the following resolution, to wit:

"Resolved, That the State of Tennessee is entitled to representation in the Thirty-Ninth Congress, and the Representatives elected from and by said State are hereby admitted to take their seats therein upon being qualified by oath according to law."

Upon this resolution, however, the minority have not been able to get a vote. But to the proof. It cannot be reported in a short speech, being more than thirty pages of a large pamphlet; but I may remark, as I believe, not a single witness examined but states and concurs in the opinion, that to admit the representation from Tennessee would gratify the people and strengthen and encourage the loyalty of the State, conciliate the people and harmonize their action for the peace, advancement, and prosperity of the State and nation. The proof fully sustains the fact that the returned troops meet in social life like gentlemen of honor, principle, and peace, and no signs of disruption are found in their circle; that there are occasional local disturbances in Tennessee that the civil authorities are able to control, but these grow out of old personal animosities engendered during the insurrection, and not arising from any disaffection or rebellious spirit toward the General Government. This is the tendency of the proof, and accounts for the many rumors of disturbance in the country wrongfully attributed to disloyalty. It is further shown that the people of Tennessee are getting impatient to have a representation, and this long inquiry and delay is staying the strong tendency to full confidence in the Government, and in fact is injurious. Every recognition of Tennessee is encouraging to her people. "Every kind word uttered here goes as a healing balm to the wounded spirit of our people, and is as welcome as the olive branch brought by the returning dove to the ark." Loyalty is manifested, perhaps, better by the payment of taxes, willingly and without murmur, than any other duty; and in West Tennessee, where there is said to be, by some, slight disaffection, most disloyalty, Memphis, had, in January, 1866, with others in first district, paid $2,842,747 81. I think this looks like obedience to the laws of 1863-64. I beg leave to read a few extracts from the testimony to suit my argument and views, and do not intend to be charged with garbling the testimony as it is ordered to be published largely, I fear for party purposes; but I still deny that anything can be found, taking the spirit and intent of the testimony, to show the members and Senators from Tennessee are not, according to this very unusual and unwarranted process, entitled to their seats by the decision of any authority, especially of the Senate and House separately, and uninfluenced by extraneous influences. Among other things Hon. Mr. Leftwich says:

"It is the opinion of myself, as well as of most of the best informed with whom I have talked, (among them our lamented President Lincoln,) that, notwithstanding so many of our people were subsequently, by various influences, forced into the rebellion, the election in Tennessee in February, 1861, was, and is, the true criterion of the loyalty of our State; at which we gave a majority, as I remember, of sixty-five thousand against 'separation,' (thought to be a more palatable term than 'secession,') and nearly that number against even calling a convention to discuss it.

"When Mr. Johnson assumed the presidential chair he was more odious to the southern people and more feared by them than any man now in the North; yet he is now by these same people as universally beloved and honored, just in return for evidencing a kind and forgiving spirit."

Hon. Mr. Cooper says, among other things:

"I can say fearlessly, from an intimate personal acquaintance with the people of the fourth congressional district, composed of the counties of Rutherford, Cannon, Coffey, Franklin, Lincoln, Giles, Marshall, and Bedford, and which I have the honor to claim to represent, and where there are no Federal soldiers, and have not been any, except in Rutherford county, since the 1st of July, 1865, that peace and quiet and complete obedience to law prevail. No difficulties of any kind; law and order are everywhere observed. The United States assessors and collectors visit every part of the district unguarded and alone; are promptly paid and kindly treated. The United States marshal needs no military force to enable him to do his duty. The white men and freedmen live harmoniously together. Contracts are made between them, liberal, just, and satisfactory, and are faithfully performed by both parties. No complaints are being made. All recognize the Government of the United States as the supreme law of the land. They most earnestly desire to be once more fully restored to the benefits of its protection, so that they can once more feel that they are American citizens.

"I fully believe that the United States troops might be withdrawn any day, and the present State government would be protected and guarded until the expiration of its term without molestation or danger. It seems to me that the people feel the necessity of peace and law and order, and they intend to have it.

"The Legislature has passed all laws necessary for the protection of the freedmen, and there is but one single case in which the punishment of the white man differs from that of the freedman, and that is in the case of rape, or assault with intent to commit rape, on the person of a white woman."

I read a part of General Thomas's statement:

"By Mr. GRIDER:

"Question. You say you believe that there is a gradual improvement going on in Tennessee as to loyalty?"

"Answer. Yes, sir.

"Question. Will you give your opinion as to whether the admission into Congress of the Representatives from Tennessee would tend to encourage the loyal people of Tennessee, and strengthen the feeling of loyalty in that State?"

"Answer. I think it would very much. It would not only encourage the loyal people to exert themselves, but it would encourage the rebels to return to their loyalty, because they would see that their chances and hopes for another outbreak were passing away from them. If you will permit me to give additional reasons why I think the delegation from Tennessee should be admitted I will do so.

"Question. Certainly; state any reasons you may desire to state.

"Answer. I think the delegation from the State of Tennessee should be admitted into Congress for the reason that that State, of her own accord, has complied with every instruction of the President, and has done all that it was believed it would be necessary for her to do in order to gain admission into Congress. All that they have done of their own accord in Tennessee. They have repudiated the rebel debt; they have abolished slavery, and also adopted the constitutional amendment upon that subject; they have passed a franchise law, prohibiting from voting every man who has been engaged in the rebellion; and I believe they have now passed a bill giving the negro the right to testify in the courts; and all the members elected to Congress can take the test oath, both Senators and Representatives; and if their Representatives shall be admitted into Congress, it will be a precedent for all the southern States; they can see at once the reasons why the Tennessee members are admitted, and that if they expect their members to be admitted they must do as she has done.

"By Mr. GRIMES:

"Question. You have answered the inquiry of Mr. GRIDER in regard to the propriety of admitting into Congress the delegation from Tennessee; state, if you please, whether, if her delegation should be admitted into Congress, it would be safe for martial law to be then abrogated in the State of Tennessee.

"Answer. I would not abrogate it just yet.

"Question. Would you recommend the abolition of the Freedmen's Bureau in that State?"

"Answer. Not yet."

Hon. David T. Patterson states upon being interrogated, among other things, as follows:

"Question. What is your opinion in regard to the propriety of admitting into Congress the delegation from Tennessee at this time?"

"Answer. Situated as I am, it is very natural I should entertain the opinions I do upon that subject. I really think it would be advantageous to the loyal sentiment of Tennessee to be represented in Congress. I think the moral influence of a representation in Congress would do us good at home.

"It is very difficult to judge of men's motives and their real sentiments; but those who were rebels, and who have corresponded or conversed with me upon the subject, profess now to be loyal to the Government of the United States, to accept the results of the war in good faith."

Such is a glance at the testimony in part which has been taken as to the loyalty of Tennessee. There is much more of the same character. I have given one gentleman's statement from East Tennessee, one from Middle, and one from West Tennessee, and General Thomas from Nashville—men prominent and presumed to be best advised in relation to the issue made, and so far as I believe, there is no countervailing testimony taken by the committee as to Tennessee (and this is all I have examined) contravening the fair and logical conclusion, that upon the ground of loyalty and obedience to law, Tennessee is entitled to representation.

But this seems not to satisfy the majority in Congress; they themselves must fix terms and conditions to be adopted by State action before they can be admitted. This we have said is without authority. They must have guarantees. Now, I ask, what right has the Government of the United States to originate this demand for guarantees before a State shall have representation? Where is the power found, the grant given? Certainly not in the Constitution of the United States. It is an arbitrary assumption of a majority which they can now enforce, but which they, I trust, will not dare to do. "What!" we have been asked, "shall we admit traitors here with their bloody hands reeking in the blood of our officers and soldiers?" There is no argument in this; the Tennessee members are all loyal. We have heard this outcry of "raw head and bloody bones" ever since we were children, but we are too old to be startled by it now. It is mere alarm and false at that, and intended to make false issues, expand and change jurisdictions and not dare to meet the plain dictum and decision plainly announced in the Constitution, in substance, that the House is to be the judge of its members. I ask gentlemen, what guarantees do you expect or ask? What guarantees does the Constitution give you to warrant the competency of the members, the judgment of the House, and the oath to be administered after a regular election according to law manifested by their credentials? Is this sufficient? But gentlemen have said they would not trust their oath, must have guarantees. Well, sir, Washington in his Farewell Address clearly manifests, that according to his convictions, in courts of justice an oath under a sense of religious duty was of the highest obligation and importance, and no doubt he would have been willing in Congress, as a guarantee, to take the oath and honor of a gentleman-elect, and upon these grounds admit members; but I shall not raise the question whether those so distrustful are themselves worthy to be trusted.

The Constitution justifies no guarantees from extraneous sources to control the action of the House and putting conditions other than the Constitution has explicitly warranted. If gentlemen will not be satisfied with these, they must usurp the authority and govern by the arbitrary force of a majority.

Mr. Speaker, I fear we do not realize the responsibilities under which we are acting; I fear we do not consider the consequences of this exclusive policy, this policy that assumes so much righteousness for the majority and so little of principle and patriotism for the minority; I fear this rigid, unrelenting, unforgiving feeling in the majority is pregnant with much wrong and error, and may lead to an assumption of power in majorities amounting to despotism. Had we not better recur to the usages of the times when the Government was formed, and in mildness and reciprocal respect look upon this as our Government, embracing all, forgiving all, and especially the erring and unfortunate? No relentless persecution or angry raid against any, in feeling or in policy; but forgive as we would be forgiven. Do our duty to the whole country and commit the results to the gracious Providence that has spared us even amidst the afflicting visitations to which we have been subjected. We hope for the best, hope for harmony, equal laws, rights and privileges, and an early return of general prosperity.

New York Contested Election.

SPEECH OF HON. S. S. MARSHALL, OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
April 3 and 4, 1866.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the following resolutions reported from the Committee of Elections:

Resolved, That Hon. James Brooks is not entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative in the Thirty-Ninth Congress from the eighth district in New York.

Resolved, That William E. Dodge is entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative in the Thirty-Ninth Congress from the eighth district in New York.

Mr. MARSHALL said:

Mr. SPEAKER: It is very easy for gentlemen to be misled in regard to this case, even after having given some attention to it. The evidence is extremely voluminous and requires a great deal of time to read and understand it so as to get at the real bearing of the evidence and the right of the case.

I must say, sir, that I have been somewhat amazed at the speech of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES.] I have heard a great many ingenious speeches and arguments in courts of justice where gentlemen had reposed in their hands very difficult cases, and at such times it is too often the practice of counsel to keep back and out of view as far as possible the facts which would favor the adversary and bring forward and marshal with solemn gravity the evidence—often feeble and unimportant—which seems to sustain the cause they advocate. I must say, if I understand the case at all, the gentleman has in his argument here manifested quite as much ingenuity as I have ever seen practiced in a court of justice.

It has been well said in regard to other matters occurring around us that we are now making history; and it is important for us all individually in our action in our public capacity that we should so deport ourselves that hereafter that history may not come up in judgment against us. I know in times of strong party excitement it is exceedingly difficult for gentlemen, however honest and pure they may be, to avoid being biased and influenced in contests like this by party prejudices or predilections. I do not claim for myself any infallibility of judgment or more candor or sincerity than I am willing to accord to all other gentlemen. But I do fear, if I have not misunderstood the character and bearing of the testimony in this case, that the gentleman from Massachusetts, notwithstanding his acknowledged ability and candor, has allowed himself in some manner to be carried off from the true issue in this case, and has permitted his judgment to be warped. He has dwelt upon facts which are not in evidence, and has given the testimony of witnesses excluded by the committee. And this inadmissible, excluded evidence (admitted to be inadmissible) which is before us for no purpose whatever, is manifestly that which controls the judgment of the honorable gentleman, and without which there would not be a plausible pretext for sustaining the claim of the contestant. And I cannot otherwise account for the fact that very important evidence submitted in this case, admitted to be competent evidence, has been wholly ignored and forgotten by the chairman of the committee in his discussion before the House.

Before going into the evidence I wish to call the attention of the House to the difficulties under which the sitting member has labored in presenting this case to the House and to the country.

The contestant being one of the money lords of the land, and the expense of a protracted contest being to him a matter of perfect indifference, has taken advantage of his position in this respect. And in giving his specification of the grounds of contest, instead of stating distinctly the grounds on which he would rely in a form which would be recognized by any pleader, he has thrown together a mass of inconsistent, loose suggestions, conforming in no respect with the requirements of the act of Congress in regard to contested elections, thus misleading the sitting member in regard to the issues, and harassing him by accumulating a mass of evidence upon which he did not rely. He consumed the time authorized by law for taking testimony to such an extent that the sitting member was not able to examine the witnesses that he desired to examine, and the evidence closed at midnight on the last night allowed to him by law, and the appeal for further time to introduce additional evidence was denied him, although he had a letter from the chairman of the committee stating that evidence under such circumstances would ordinarily be admitted by the House.

It is also true, and ought to be remembered by the chairman of the committee, that the sitting member came before the House and before the committee since the meeting of this Congress, and asked, urged, and implored that time might be extended to him that he might poll the district and show by positive evidence that he received the number of votes which were returned for him. But this permission was not granted. Therefore, I say, without denying that the decision of the House and of the committee was right, that nothing can properly and fairly be inferred or presumed against him because he did not introduce this evidence. He had no opportunity of doing so; time was denied him for that purpose by the contestant, by the House, and by the Committee of Elections.

He furnished, as appears in the printed evidence, two thousand names of men that he proposed to call and examine for the purpose of showing by legal evidence that he had received the number of votes returned for him, but this was not permitted. And I therefore repeat that nothing can rightfully be presumed against him because he did not meet all the evidence, unsatisfactory and illegal as it was, brought on the part of the contestant.

If gentleman will look at the law of Congress and the specifications of the contestant in regard to the grounds of his contest, it seems to me that there cannot be any one who will not hold that there is a complete and utter failure to comply with the act of Congress which requires that the grounds shall be definitely pointed out. This is not done, as I insist, in any single instance. I cannot now go over them, but I imagine before we take the vote upon this question gentleman will feel called upon to look for themselves into this matter and determine for themselves.

I know it is held by many that this act of Congress is not binding upon this House; that the House being a judge of the election, returns, and qualifications of its own members, the law pointing out the modes of giving notice, and of taking evidence, and everything pertaining to the matter, is merely directory, and that the House may rightfully depart from it whenever it pleases.

I think this is an erroneous view of the powers and duties of this House. A court, as such, has no power of legislation. It is the judge of causes within the limits of its jurisdiction, but cannot prescribe the form of the process, the time within which suits shall be commenced and process served, or the rules of evidence. For all this it must look to the law of the land.

And this House being, under the Constitution, a judge of the election, returns, and qualifications of its members, has not the power to disregard the law in regard to the rules of evidence or the character of a notice of contest or the time within which it shall be given. We are to judge as other judges upon the case brought before us according to the forms of law. There is no other proper rule of construction that can be given to this act of Congress and the law governing this case. I insist that this act of Congress not only furnishes a rule that ought to be binding upon us in justice, but that it is a law binding upon us as much as any law is binding upon a common court of justice. We are but a court in trying causes of this kind, and in determining them we must recognize the mode of procedure and be governed by the rules of evidence prescribed by the proper authorities of the country.

I do not propose to dwell on this. It seems to me it is only necessary to suggest it for gentlemen to see the force of it. A judge does not prescribe the time within which a summons shall be sued out and served on a defendant. It is no part of his office. He must take the law as he finds it. He must adopt the mode of procedure prescribed by the law of the land. So in regard to this body in determining as judges upon the election, returns, and qualifications of its own members.

It is also a well-known rule of law that to justify a recovery in any case a sufficient ground of recovery must be distinctly and clearly set forth in the pleadings. And in the second place, it is necessary that the evidence shall sustain these allegations. In other words, the proofs and the allegations must correspond, and if there is a defect either in the pleadings or in the evidence sustaining the allegations the case necessarily fails. If there is no case made out in the pleadings, although the evidence may be clear and conclusive, there can be no judgment given to the party asking relief.

Before proceeding, I suppose it will not be improper for me to call the attention of the House to a few errors committed by the majority of the committee in regard to the facts of the case.

In the majority report it is stated that there were but four precincts to which the contestant applied his evidence, and that the evidence of the sitting member was confined also to those four districts—ignoring entirely the fact that the sitting member had impeached one of the districts which had given a large majority for Mr. Dodge, the contestant, and had submitted evidence for the purpose of sustaining his allegation in regard thereto, showing that there was illegal conduct on the part of the canvassers which vitiated the returns so far as to furnish grounds for throwing out those returns altogether. And if so, if the returns from that district are successfully impeached, then the sitting member is entitled to his seat, even though the other two districts are thrown out also. Throw out the other two districts entirely, as the chairman of the committee proposes, on account of irregularity, and then throw out this one in which Mr. Dodge had a majority, and you still leave the majority in favor of the sitting member.

But the fact that this district was impeached, and that evidence was brought forward for the purpose of excluding the vote, is ignored by the chairman and by the majority of the committee.

There is another statement, that Mackerelville, the fifteenth district, has a bad reputation in connection with the July riots. This is taken, I suppose, from the suggestion of the counsel of Mr. Dodge before the committee, for I have been unable to find any evidence to sustain the statement.

Another mistake is, that Andrew Brady, the clerk of the fifteenth district, was a self-constituted clerk. Now, it is true that his brother was first called as clerk and sworn, and that Andrew was substituted for him; but he was not self-constituted. He was accepted by the registrars and inspectors, and recognized as clerk. Mr. Hall, a Republican inspector and registrar, states in his testimony that he was appointed as such.

Mr. DAWES. Will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MARSHALL] repeat what he was saying? I did not fully understand him.

Mr. MARSHALL. I was speaking in regard to Andrew Brady, the clerk of the fifteenth district, being a self-constituted clerk. I say that is a mistake; he was accepted and recognized by the inspectors, and Mr. Hall stated that he understood that he was appointed after his brother, who had been first appointed, declined to act.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Andrew Brady was not sworn, I believe.

Mr. MARSHALL. There is a conflict of testimony in regard to whether or not he was sworn.

Mr. BROOKS. This is the testimony on page 220 of the large book:

"Question. And Mr. Andrew Brady did serve?"

"Answer. Yes."

"Question. Did he serve with the consent of the inspectors of registry?"

"Answer. Yes, sir."

Mr. DAWES. Daniel Brady says he was appointed and sworn; that Andrew Brady was appointed to take his place, and Mr. Hall says that Andrew Brady was never sworn.

Mr. MARSHALL. I do not propose to dwell upon that point. I am calling attention to the mistake of the chairman of the committee in calling Andrew Brady a self-constituted clerk.

Mr. DAWES. Perhaps it was not strictly proper to call him a self-constituted clerk.

Mr. MARSHALL. Daniel Brady was first appointed, but declined to act, and then Andrew Brady was substituted in his place. He is no more a self-constituted clerk than is any other clerk appointed by the inspectors to act in such cases. You might as well say that all clerks are self-constituted. Andrew Brady was just as much a clerk of election as was any one; and if there was an omission to qualify him, we have the decision of the supreme court of the State of New York, in the case of The People vs. Cook, 4 Selden, that such an omission does not vitiate the ballot. If he was appointed clerk, and acted as such, he was an officer de facto, and the omission to swear him is no ground for attacking and defeating the ballot. Why is the fact brought forward with such solemnity that Andrew Brady was a self-constituted clerk, and acted through a fraud? I say that in this fifteenth district there is no evidence of fraud, either in the conduct of the clerk or the registrars, or any other officers, in making up the register, or on the day of election. There is not one particle of legal evidence of fraud there, of any evidence that would convict any man of any offense on earth before any court. And yet we have it very solemnly paraded before us that Andrew Brady was a self-constituted clerk and acted fraudulently. Yet he testifies that he was a Republican, and not in the interest of Mr. Brooks, and at that election cast his vote in favor of Mr. Lincoln. And that was the case with the majority of the officers of election on that day; they were the partisans of Mr. Dodge, the contestant. And yet we have this brought forward here in the most solemn manner in order to show that Mr. Brooks and his friends were guilty of such frauds that this whole district should be disfranchised. I must say, with all respect for gentlemen, and raising no question about the fairness and impartiality of any member of this House, that such an enormity was never before attempted to be perpetrated in a legislative body as would be that of giving the contestant a seat in this House upon the evidence adduced.

Now, I want to call the attention of legal gentlemen from New York to what I am about to say. The chairman of the Committee of Elections misapprehends entirely the character of the board of registry. He calls them a board of judges, and from the manner in which he discussed that point you would be led to think that every elector in the district was compelled to go before this board and apply to have his name registered; and if objection is made he must produce evidence of his right to vote there, and that the board of registry have no power to act until that is done. Now, I insist that this is an erroneous construction of the law.

We have precisely such a law as this in the State of Illinois; and yet no man in that whole State ever dreamed of giving such a construction to it. I have never been before a board of registry in my life; nor do any of my neighbors ever think of going before them. The board assemble at the time prescribed by law, and names and information are furnished to them by any one. The board examine each name, and if satisfied that it is the name of a legal voter, they register it. It makes no difference how or from whom they obtain the names.

What matters it in this case if this bar-keeper did put down names on his account books of such as he thought were legal voters, and furnish them at the proper time to the board of registry? Were they placed upon the registry without the consent of the regular board? Certainly not. Some of these registrars were absent a part of the time; they did not remain there all day; but they came back and examined the register, approved it, and certified it according to the forms of law. I know not what may be the practice in other districts in New York; but I know that in Illinois, where the law is almost precisely similar, the voters of the district rarely think of looking over the registry to see whether their names are there or not. If they happen to do so and find their names omitted, they can at the second meeting, one week before the election, ask that their names be put upon the register; and it is done. The members of the board do not sit there as a court; and it is not absolutely required that a majority of them shall remain there all day. There is nothing in the law forbidding any one of them from absenting himself for awhile, and on his return looking over the list to satisfy himself as to its correctness. At most to do so is but an irregularity, and cannot operate to make the register a nullity. Is there any evidence that anybody, by their action, was deprived of the opportunity to have his name registered? Certainly no wrong was done unless some one was injured; and there is no proof that the right of any man to vote was jeopardized by the conduct of the board. I ask gentlemen from New York, all of whom must be affected by the construction to be placed upon this act, whether they are willing to sanction the construction contended for by the chairman of the committee, the result of which would be, that if the officers whose duty it is to appoint a place for holding the election fail to do so until the time fixed by law for the meeting of the registry board, or any officer of election fails in the discharge of his duty, all the voters of the district must be disfranchised. If it is so, then the vote of the district must be thrown out without any further evidence. If it does not have that effect, then the matter ought not to be thrown in here as a make-weight, because it is entitled to no consideration whatever.

There is another fact urged as affecting the validity of the poll. The inspectors or registrars were not residents of the election district. The law is somewhat vague in regard to that, but it seems to me that the law does require that the registrars shall be residents of the election district; I mean the law as it stood at that time. But the people of New York, many of them at least, and there will be further evidence on this point adduced before the House, understood the law to refer to the Assembly district, and the Legislature has since passed an act which is now in force, and which I imagine is an adoption of the popular construction, declaring that the registrar shall reside in the Assembly district and need not reside in the election district. That is the law as it now stands in the State of New York, and the old law was so construed and acted upon in many of the districts of the city, those in which Mr. Dodge obtained a majority, as well as in this district which is thus impeached. The evidence will be exhibited to the House that in some of the election districts in which Mr. Dodge received a majority the registrars were not residents thereof.

Mr. Speaker, I think I have, without dwelling further upon it, made it sufficiently clear to all who favor me with their attention that the chairman of the committee has been mistaken in the construction of the registry law of New York, and that there was no expectation on the part of the framers thereof, and such is not the practice under it, for the board to sit as a court, that all electors are to appear before them, and that they must decide upon evidence adduced as to the right of each to vote. There is no such practice. They are to use any means within their power, from recollection, from the copy of the last register, or any other means within their knowledge, for making out a list. If they can be satisfied upon their oaths that it is a true register, this is all that can be required. If they know of an elector who lives in the district, although he may be a thousand miles from home, it is their duty to return him.

Another statement is that the election was not held at the place designated. I hold, sir, if that were true, yet unless somebody had been misled and deprived of the right of voting that would not affect the election in any way whatever. Suppose that the house designated had been burned down, or that the owner of the place had seen proper to refuse to allow the election to be held there, are the people, then, not to be represented? Such is not the proper construction of the law, and such construction would not, I think, be placed upon it by any lawyer on the earth who calmly and maturely considered the question.

What are the facts in regard to this place of election? The place designated was "at James Thompson's." This James Thompson was the proprietor of a liquor store on a corner lot one hundred feet in length, I believe. The election was not held in his store, but on another part of the lot designated by some as a stable. It was in a public place and fronting on the street, not in the liquor store, but it was held at "James Thompson's," and on the lot designated. And even if it should be held that there was a slight deviation from the point designated it is clear that no legal voter was thereby misled or prevented from casting his vote.

There is another statement in the report that a canvasser in one of the districts was drugged and fell asleep during the canvass of the votes. It is not claimed that this district should be thrown out. Then why is this stated? Is it with the expectation of producing the impression that Mr. Brooks had been around drugging the officers of election? Where is there any evidence of the drugging of anybody? I have examined the testimony of this canvasser himself, who was a Republican, and a supporter of Mr. Dodge, and he testifies that he was not drugged; that he remained awake all the time that he was engaged in canvassing the poll—all day, and until two or three o'clock in the night. He says that he did get very much wearied, but that he remained awake during the time. If there is any evidence that he was drugged I have been unable to find it, although I know that it was suggested by the ingenious counsel for Mr. Dodge before the committee. I am afraid the honorable chairman of the committee, in drawing up his report, has forgotten the real evidence, and has adopted as facts and confounded with the evidence the statements of the counsel of Mr. Dodge. Is this one of the make-weights in the case, separately amounting to nothing, but which, when brought together, and paraded in solemn array before the House, may produce some effect upon the minds of gentlemen who cannot take time to read the evidence for themselves?

I know, sir, that there was no improper intention on the part of the chairman of the committee, but having come to the conclusion that Mr. Dodge is entitled to the seat, he has entered into the argument of the case with that feeling with which counsel generally enter into the argument of causes which they desire to gain. Having first made up his mind that he is right, he has brought forward arguments which he thinks will produce that conviction in the minds of others. It is natural that he should do so; but standing here with different convictions, believing that there is no legal evidence in the case that would authorize the House to unseat Mr. Brooks, much less to give the seat to the contestant, I think it my duty to bring to the attention of the House this discrepancy between the evidence in the case and the allegations in the report of the committee.

The object of all election laws is to facilitate, not to defeat elections. Registry laws are but directory for that purpose, and cannot be held to be more sacred or of more importance than the sacred right of the elector to cast his vote. It will never do to place a higher value on statutory regulations than on the right of suffrage itself. The whole object of a registry law is, not to throw obstacles around the right of the elector to vote, but to allow him to come untrammelled to the polls, and cast his vote in such manner as to secure a proper reflex of the sentiment of the people.

In presenting the law bearing upon cases of this kind, I am afraid I shall take up too much of the time of the House, but the law is very clear. In the State of New York, for instance, the State from which this contest comes, in the leading case of The People vs. Cook, 4 Selden's Reports, the court sustain every position that I take. I will read a paragraph or two. The court referring to the decision in the court below says:

"The learned judge decided, in his direction to the jury, that the votes given in the western district of the first ward of the city of Buffalo were properly canvassed and allowed to Mr. Welch, notwithstanding the inspectors took the oath of office upon a book called 'Wat's Psalms and Hymns,' and not upon the Gospels."

To this the defendant's counsel excepted. The court says:

"This exception is not well taken, for two reasons. First, the neglect of the inspectors, or clerks, to take any oath would not have vitiated the election. It might have subjected those officers to an indictment, if the neglect was willful."

The court refers to quite a number of cases to show that a failure on the part of the officers to take the oath, although it is an indictable offense in them, does not vitiate or affect the election; and then further remarks that—

"These, and numerous other cases, show that the acts of public officers being in by color of an election, or appointment, are valid, so far as the public is concerned."

Again:

"The statute requires that the inspectors, after taking the oath, shall appoint two clerks, who shall take the constitutional oath. This is directory. If no clerks can be procured the election is not to fail. The inspectors must perform the duty which ordinarily is devolved upon the clerks. The failure of the clerks to take the oath did not render their acts void. The occasional interference of more inspectors than three does not prejudice the return, since the whole election was conducted by inspectors who were at least such de facto, and for the most of the time by those who were such de jure."

And again:

"An officer de facto is one who comes into office by color of a legal appointment or election. His acts in that capacity are as valid, so far as the public are concerned, as the acts of an officer de jure. His title cannot be inquired into collaterally. The doctrine on this subject will be found in the following cases."

Citing a number of adjudicated cases.

Now, this case of The People vs. Cook settles the question of law in dispute here. I intended to refer to some other adjudicated cases; I am afraid of taking up too much time, but they are in entire accordance with the views I have taken. I will refer to Carpenter's case, 2 Parsons' Select Cases, page 539, where the principles of law bearing upon questions of this kind are discussed by the court. The tendency of the law and of all the decisions is that technicalities of this kind shall not be allowed to prevail against the voice of the people. In the Carpenter case the court says:

"Very soon after the passage of the law, giving this court authority to hear and adjudge upon the validity of the election of county officers, questions of this character presented themselves to our attention. We saw and felt that we were called to assume a new and delicate jurisdiction, which, if not exercised with prudence and circumspection, would involve the court in the heat and excitement of every contested election in the county. We felt the necessity of assimilating all such to other legal proceedings. We demanded of the parties seeking to impeach an election return preciseness and exactitude of allegation; refusing to recognize all general charges. And we confined the petitioners to the specific charges made, refusing to permit them, under the pretense of a precise allegation, to enter into another experimental attack on an election return, with the hope of finding something in it which might affect its validity. We required that a petition, contesting an election return, should be a thing, complete and perfect in itself, setting forth precise allegations, and containing all necessary statements to show, that if such allegations and statements were true, the election of the returned candidate must, of course, be vacated."

"Nothing less than this, we deemed, was due to a thing so solemn as an election return, which is the embodiment of the popular will, the expression of the sovereign power of the only sovereign known to our Constitution, the people. Aware that the citizens conducting these elections were equally with ourselves bound by solemn oaths to the faithful execution of their duties, we felt that the fundamental maxim of the law, that all acts purporting to be done by individuals de facto exercising such legal authority, were to be presumed to be done rightly, applied to them with the same force as it would be to us by a higher tribunal. Hence we demanded, as is always demanded, when the actions and doings of judicial, or semi-judicial officers are impeached, even for informality, much more for fraud, that those who make such an assault must be prepared not only to state in what exact way these officers have violated their duty, but that they have violated such duty in a manner so as to nullify the election of the individual apparently chosen by the people."

"If such officers were charged with offenses against the law in conducting an election, if it was charged that they had omitted to perform certain directory duties required by law, we said they merit it, and ought to receive punishment for the offense, but the people should not be punished for the defaults of their agents. That because from unfaithfulness or ignorance, officers had disobeyed or neglected the declaratory mandates of the election law in conducting an election, that this misconduct should not disfranchise the people of the county who had not participated in nor sanctioned their illegal acts. We saw that by so doing, instead of punishing an officer for violating the election law, we should disfranchise the people of a district. This we could not but see would invite unprincipled partisans to commit such offenses in order to defeat an honest majority by indirect, which they could not overcome by direct, means."

I might cite a number of cases to the same effect, and will refer gentlemen who wish to examine the law in regard to this matter to Skeritt's case in the same volume, where this subject is very fully discussed. We are departing from all the principles of law if we allow mere informality, if we allow neglect or ignorance on the part of officers, to defeat the will of the electors of the district, and to put in here a man who was not chosen by a majority nor by a plurality of the people of the district, to represent them here. Look at former elections, and look at subsequent elections in this district. They show that the votes were very largely against the views of the man who now claims the seat, and there can be no honest pretense that Mr. Dodge could under any circumstances have received a greater vote than Mr. Brooks at that election. There is no such pretense. There can be no honest pretense that Mr. Dodge received a majority or a plurality of the legal vote of that district. But upon a mere technical objection it is proposed to throw out election districts, the effect of which will be to leave Mr. Dodge with an apparent majority.

I will turn now to the fifteenth district of the eighteenth ward, and I will dwell some little time upon that, because the case turns mainly upon it. If the House holds the poll of that district to be a void poll, and one that we cannot receive, then, under the hypothesis of the Committee of Elections, Mr. Brooks is not entitled to retain his seat. I hold, however, that even in that case, the proper result would not be to place Mr. Dodge in a seat to which he was never elected, but to send the case back to the people.

Now, what are the specifications in regard to this fifteenth district of the eighteenth ward? Inasmuch as the case turns principally upon this district, I call the attention of the House to the fact that there is no charge by the contestant that there was any fraud or irregularity in the fifteenth district of the eighteenth ward. There is no charge in the pleadings that in the fifteenth district of the eighteenth ward there was any fraud, or any irregularity of any character. The specification is that there were illegalities "in the fifteenth district" without naming any ward.

Mr. DAWES. Will the gentleman tell me whether there is any other fifteenth district in the whole congressional district?

Mr. MARSHALL. There are three wards in the district.

Mr. DAWES. Is there any other fifteenth district?

Mr. MARSHALL. I do not know. It is not a matter that has been submitted to me for determination.

Mr. DAWES. But that is a highly important point.

Mr. MARSHALL. Well, what is the fact about it?

Mr. DAWES. I will state the fact that that is the only fifteenth district in the whole congressional district.

Mr. MARSHALL. I do not know how this is ascertained. I am not aware that we have any evidence on the subject but, admitting it to be true, that might be an answer before a town meeting, but it is no answer to pleadings in court; it is no answer to the law of Congress, which requires that the contestant shall specifically state the grounds upon which he makes his contest. Whether there are fifteen or more districts in the other wards in that congressional district it is not for me to say. I know that in some wards in the city the number of districts run up as high as twenty or more. How do we know from the pleadings that the "fifteenth district," where no ward is named, might not refer to some other congressional district in the city of New York? There is no such specification as the law requires—the sitting member had no notice of the precise ground of contest—and therefore I insist that legally we cannot properly go into this investigation. But I will not dwell upon that. I know that these technicalities do not have much weight here, although I think that here, as elsewhere, a party should be informed by the pleadings upon what his adversary relies.

There is another objection in regard to this district to which I wish to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee of Elections. He has, both in his speech and in his report, laid great stress upon the fact that the inspectors or registrars, were not residents of that election district. I call his attention to the fact that in the pleadings there is no charge, no specification, that they were not residents of the district. Even if the ward had been mentioned there is no allegation whatever in regard to this matter.

Mr. DAWES. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that I think I can answer that; but there are a good many other things in his argument that I would like to answer, and I prefer to take them all together.

Mr. MARSHALL. I would like to hear the gentleman's answer now, if he has one.

Mr. DAWES. Of course I hold that there is an answer, and I will endeavor to show it.

Mr. MARSHALL. I never knew until to-day that my friend was such a complete Yankee as he is. He has not answered directly a single question put to him to-day.

Mr. DAWES. I submit that that is not exactly candid. If the gentleman will recur to any interrogatory that either he or the sitting member put to me during my argument that I did not answer, I will do it now.

Mr. MARSHALL. You may have answered, but you traveled a long way round to get at it.

Mr. DAWES. The difference between my friend and myself is, that I take my own time to answer. The gentleman insisted on putting his interrogatories and prescribing the time in which I should answer them. I will treat him as he treats me, with entire candor. I will answer his interrogatory when I come to reply to his argument.

Mr. MARSHALL. This is a point that is very important. I have not been able to find any specification that the registrars were not residents of the election district; and I want the gentleman to show me where there is any such specification. I think it but fair that he should do so.

Mr. DAWES. If the gentleman insists upon it that I shall answer him now, I will state that there is a distinct allegation, and it is copied into the report, that there were illegalities that worked to the injury of the contestant.

Mr. MARSHALL. Does the gentleman call that a definite specification?

Mr. DAWES. That was one of the illegalities.

Mr. MARSHALL. Then why make any other specifications?

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman inquired if there was any specification, and I gave him the specification.

Mr. MARSHALL. Then I am to understand that that is the specification, that these registrars were not residents of the election district?

Mr. DAWES. Under that specification you can show any legality.

Mr. MARSHALL. I hold that that is no specification at all. It is no compliance with the law of Congress, and it amounts to nothing. If it covers this ground, why does it not cover every ground? And why require a contestant to say anything except that there were "illegalities" and "irregularities?" If it embraces that, it embraces everything.

Sir, this is the most transparent trifling with the law of Congress. That is no specification whatever. It sets forth nothing as to what the contestant intended to prove or rely upon.

[Here Mr. MARSHALL, having but five minutes of his time left, gave way to a motion to adjourn.]

39TH CONG....1ST SESS.

New York Contested Election—Mr. Marshall.

HO. OF REPS.

WEDNESDAY, April 4, 1866.

The same subject being again under consideration, the time of Mr. MARSHALL was extended by unanimous consent.

Mr. MARSHALL continued:

Mr. SPEAKER: The honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] in his argument yesterday, and I believe also in his report, says that there is fraud proven in making the registry in the fifteenth district of the eighteenth ward; and I ask the attention of the House to what I shall say on this point. As the gentleman alleges, there was fraud in making up that register. I ask him who perpetrated that fraud, and where is the evidence of it?

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman put several interrogatories yesterday, and I told him that I would endeavor to answer him when I came to close the debate, a right accorded to me under the rules. I do not propose at the present time to respond to these interrogatories. They are part of the case; and I hope to be able to satisfy the House, if I have not already done so.

Mr. MARSHALL. If the honorable gentleman declines to answer I must endeavor to get along without the information. As a matter of course the gentleman must elect for himself as to whether he will answer or not. I will have no opportunity to reply to him hereafter, and it certainly would be more fair for him to let me know now what evidence he relies upon to make out this charge. But he declines to do so, and I must submit. I have examined the evidence, and can see no shadow of proof to show fraud in the making of this register. Who committed it? Three of the four members of the board were Republican, partisans of the contestant. The three inspectors and the clerk make up the four members of the board, three being Republicans, partisans of Mr. Dodge, the contestant, and the fourth was an appointee of Tammany Hall, which organization was running Mr. Barr in opposition also to Mr. Brooks. Mr. Brooks did not have a single friend on that board. How could a board constituted of his political enemies be supposed to perpetrate a fraud in his behalf? Can this House come to such a conclusion unless we have some positive evidence? I do not think such a thing was ever before heard of. Such a conspiracy by a man's opponents to perpetrate a fraud to secure his election may be possible, but it is so highly improbable that without overwhelming and conclusive testimony no man can credit it for a moment.

The honorable gentleman on yesterday, in answer to an interrogatory which I propounded to him in regard to a question of law, drew a very ingenious distinction. He admitted that the law was, that the acts of an officer de facto were binding upon all parties just as much as if he was an officer de jure; but, said he, this applies only to a case where the officer was duly qualified—having personally no legal disqualifications—to hold the office, but there was some defect or omission in the appointment. But that where the person was disqualified for holding the office, as in this case not a resident of the election district, he could not be an officer either de facto or de jure, and that his acts as such, though regularly appointed, would be absolutely void. This is in substance the position taken.

I deny that that is law, and I ask the gentleman to produce any authority or decision sustaining such a position. Will he tell this House that if a foreigner in that district, who had not been naturalized for the length of time required by law to make him an elector, had been honestly (and by mistake) appointed by the proper authorities, had entered upon the discharge of the duties, had made out the registry in regular form according to law, and sworn to and certified it, that he would not be recognized as an officer de facto, and that his acts would be utterly null and void, and that as the result of this innocent mistake, made by parties acting in good faith, the whole district would be disfranchised? I repeat, this is not the law, and I believe that no authority can be found for any such position.

The Constitution requires that a member of this House shall be twenty-five years of age, and shall be a citizen of the United States. Now, suppose a man is elected to this House without this qualification, is sworn in, takes his seat, and upon some important measure gives the casting vote by which it becomes a law. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] tell this House that such person is not a member de facto, and that his act is not binding upon the public just as fully as the act of any other member of this House?

In the State of Illinois, by a constitutional provision, a man to be qualified for the position of judge of one of our courts must be at least thirty years of age. Suppose a man who is but twenty-nine is elected to that office, is commissioned, enters upon the duties of the office, tries causes and renders decisions upon them; will the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts tell this House that such judgments are not just as binding upon the parties as if he were of the age prescribed? He is an officer de facto, and, according to all decisions and all authorities on the subject, his acts are just as binding upon the parties and upon the public as if he were fully qualified to hold the office. There is, I think, no authority and no reason for the distinction which the honorable gentleman makes. These officers, not partisans of Mr. Brooks, were appointed in good faith; they entered upon the discharge of the duties of the office, and the parties and the public are just as much bound by their acts as if they were residents, all of them, of the election district. This, Mr. Speaker, seems so clear to me, and I think will be so clear to every member of the House, that I will not dwell further upon it.

Well, what other evidence is there in this case? Take away this attack upon the registry and the whole case falls as against the fifteenth district. It all depends upon that. There is no plausible pretext for excluding the poll if that fails. It is true the chairman of the committee in his report and in his speech refers to some other matters to which I will call the attention of the House for a moment.

When the evidence was nearly closed it appears that the contestant introduced an affidavit, not a deposition taken according to the forms of law, but an affidavit taken before a notary public, and brought it before the judge who was taking evidence and asked that it might be received, no notice having been given of the intention of the party to take this evidence. It is stated in the report that the deposition of this man was taken in the presence of the sitting member and his attorney. But no deposition was taken, and I ask the chairman of the committee, in his concluding remarks, to tell the House where he finds any evidence that such a deposition was taken or that the evidence was taken in any way in the presence of the sitting member and his counsel. Such was not the fact.

There is some complaint made, apparently, in the report that the sitting member did not allow that to be received as evidence. This affidavit has appended to it a list of some two hundred names of voters that Dean professed to have made search for. This information was based on the unsworn statements of others, and was at best but mere hearsay. It was not legal evidence, and would have been rejected in any court of justice. And besides, the time had nearly expired, and this was evidently a trap to throw Mr. Brooks off his guard and put him on a wild hunt for two or three hundred men, when his time was already nearly exhausted, and the contestant was refusing him further time for examining witnesses. Mr. Brooks would have done gross injustice to himself, to his constituents, and to the cause of justice if he had not objected to the admission of this illegal ex parte statement.

Now, I ask gentlemen who have this report to turn to page 6 thereof, and I will request the Clerk to read what I have marked.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"The contestant, for the purpose of tracing each voter who cast his vote at this precinct, and finding his residence, if he had any, as designated upon the registry and poll-list, employed a responsible person, by the name of Dean, canvasser for the city Directory, to visit each place designated as the residence of the voter. The deposition of this Dean was presented to the committee by the contestant, and objected to by the sitting member; the ground of the objection was, that when the deposition was taken, among the others constituting the proofs of contestant, the ten days' notice required by law for the taking of this deposition had not been given. And it appears that in giving the notice the name of this witness was by clerical mistake left out of the list served upon the sitting member, and the mistake was not discovered until the day the depositions were taken, when it was too late to renew the notice. It also appears that the deposition of said Dean, offered in evidence, was taken in presence of the sitting member and his counsel, and the deponent was tendered to them for cross-examination, but they declined to cross-examine him for the reasons already stated. The committee were of the opinion that the sitting member was entitled, if he insisted upon it, to the ten days' notice, and that therefore the deposition could not be received.

"The contestant then sought to prove the same thing by another witness who had obtained his knowledge of the facts from Dean himself. This was objected to by the sitting member as hearsay testimony, and the objection was sustained by the committee.

"The committee therefore were without the benefit of the results of the investigations so made by Dean, however satisfactory they might be in testing the accuracy of the registry and poll-list, and ultimately the honesty of the vote. The sitting member, however, in an effort to sustain this register and identify the voters named upon it, introduced the deposition of one Brennan, (page 309,) long a resident of the district, an official in the Catholic church near this voting place, and believed to have special knowledge of the residents. His testimony corroborates the other testimony as to the fraudulent character and inaccuracy of this register."

Mr. MARSHALL. This testimony, it will be observed, of Dean and Phelps, was not brought forward in conformity to any rule of evidence. Dean was not examined before the proper tribunal, no notice had been given, and the chairman of the committee tells us that that evidence was ruled out and would not be considered by the committee.

Now, it seems to me to be a very strange fact that this evidence which was excluded, which was not before the committee, which has no more business here than if it had never existed, should be brought before the House in this manner, and dwelt upon with such gravity. Complaint is made of Mr. Brooks, the sitting member, that he objected to it, for I can construe the language of the report in no other way than as an intimation that by taking advantage of a mere technical objection, no way affecting the merits, he had excluded important evidence, which, if admitted, would have made out a strong case against him.

Mr. Phelps was also introduced, who proposed to swear what Dean had told him, and the chairman tells us that that also was decided not to be proper evidence and was therefore excluded. We are therefore deprived of what might otherwise be very valuable testimony to lead us to a proper conclusion in this case.

How do we know whether this evidence is valuable or not? It can only be known by looking into the evidence. Who ever before heard of a witness being excluded and not permitted to swear in court, and then the judge retiring and asking him what he would have sworn if he had been a competent witness, and then basing his decision on that ex parte statement? It seems to me, from the reading of the report, that the chairman of the committee has permitted this affidavit, which is not evidence, having no business before the House and not properly referred to here, to have undue weight on his mind in coming to his conclusions in this case. How do we know that Dean was a responsible witness? Who tells us so? How do we find it out unless we take his testimony, and that is admitted not to be before the House or the committee? How do we know he had made a diligent examination of the persons who had voted in this election? Why should the House be informed of a matter of this kind that is not proven and could not be proven under the circumstances? How do we know that the contestant omitted, by mistake, to place the name of this witness in his notice to the sitting member? How do we know that the deposition was taken in the presence of Mr. Brooks and his counsel? We are informed of none of these facts properly or legitimately. It seems to me that this evidence having been excluded, having no right to come before the committee, having no right to come before the House, it ought not so solemnly to have been stated by the chairman of the committee in making his report of the facts to the House.

New York Contested Election—Mr. Marshall.

As I before stated, it is not customary with us in the West to exclude a witness, to decide that he is not competent to be sworn, and then privately inquire of him what he would have testified to if he had been a competent witness, and make up our judgment on his outside and ex parte statement.

Now, I cannot account for this proceeding in any other way than this: that the chairman of the Committee of Elections [Mr. DAWES] having made up his mind, honestly no doubt, that Mr. Brooks ought not to be permitted to hold his seat, and that Mr. Dodge, the contestant, ought to be admitted in his place, has, in his examination of the case, permitted this excluded ex parte affidavit to control his judgment in making up his decision. Now, this is a strange kind of proceeding, a strange kind of law. It may answer in some countries, but we are not accustomed to this kind of proceedings where I have been in the habit of appearing before courts of justice. Some years ago, in one of the courts of Illinois, a lady filed her petition for a divorce, charging that her husband, while he was a very good sort of man to hoe corn, go to mill, and attend to other little matters of that kind, as a husband he was just no man at all. In the West, as you know, Mr. Speaker, we always give relief in such cases. To establish her charge she introduced a witness, an old lady versed in such matters, and by her testimony she made out a very bad case against the defendant. The old lady was cross-examined by a little gimlet-eyed lawyer who worried her very much, and she got a little irritated. Finally, the lawyer said, "Admitting that the defendant is not much as a husband, do you not think he would do?" "Well," replied the old lady, "I will tell you just the fact about it. I suppose he would do back yonder in Massachusetts, where you come from, but out here in the West he won't begin to answer. Here we want men." [Laughter.] And so in regard to a proceeding of this kind. It may answer in some places, but it seems to me that before this high court, in the trial of one of our peers, touching his right to hold a seat here, and bound by the established laws of the land, it cannot possibly be entitled to any consideration at our hands.

We are told also, in this same extract, that Brennan and Jung were introduced by the contestant, and that their testimony corroborates to some extent what goes before. Corroborates what? Why, corroborates the testimony of Dean and Phelps; because no other witnesses have been introduced for the purpose of proving fraud in this election. Leaving out what is said about the enrollment, there is no reference to other witnesses, and the testimony of those witnesses has been excluded. Now, who ever heard of a witness who has not been sworn, who was not permitted to testify, being corroborated by some other witness who was brought on the stand? Who ever heard of a proceeding of that kind in any court of justice? A witness is excluded. Is not permitted to testify; and yet some other witness is examined by the opposite party in reference to some other matter, not to contradict or impeach the testimony of this excluded witness. Yet it is claimed that the witness excluded is corroborated, and in that way the case is made out. It seems to me that that is a most extraordinary kind of logic, unknown to the books, and having no parallel in the practice of any judicial tribunal on earth.

But there is another thing that is brought in as a make-weight in this case. It is said that the vote in this district was unusually large, and therefore the election there must have been fraudulent. Is it any evidence of fraud that the vote at one election is much larger than at some other election? Is there any man on this floor who does not know that frequently in ordinary elections one half of the voters do not go to the polls? Because there was a smaller vote in this district in 1863 than in 1864 does it follow that the voters were not there in 1863? Sir, in the gentleman's own State, the State of Massachusetts, I have noticed the statistics of the elections, and that even in some of the important elections there the vote does not exceed one half of the number of voters which are proven by the census to reside in the State. And so it is in many other States. It is only on extraordinary occasions, when great excitement prevails, that there is anything like a full vote got out in any precinct anywhere in the United States.

But the evidence in the case explains this matter, and vindicates the correctness of the election in this district as fully and completely as anything of the kind can be explained and vindicated. On page 24 of the report, gentlemen will find a comparison between the registry of this district, made in 1865 after this election, and that made in the districts in which Mr. Dodge received a majority of votes, and also a comparison of the vote in this fifteenth district with the vote in the Republican districts at this and other elections. This comparison shows that in those districts where Mr. Dodge received a majority, there was a much larger falling off than in this fifteenth district, (indeed there was no falling off in this district,) where it is charged there must have been fraud. The registry shows that if there was fraud anywhere it was in the Dodge districts, and not in this fifteenth or Brooks district. I ask the Clerk to read the passage which I have marked in the report of the minority.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"Under the new revised registry act (act of 1865) of New York, the registration of voters was thoroughly reviewed and revised, and in that act the tendency was to cut off the foreign vote, supposed to be mostly Democratic, by exacting the show of naturalization papers before the registry, and by other rigid demands. This new revised registry of 1865 and the vote of 1864 and 1865 demonstrate, mathematically, the following facts:

A CONTRAST.

Democratic—15th district, 18th ward.	Republican—3d district, 18th ward.

"The 1864 registry in the Democratic district is thus demonstrated to have been correct by the revision of 1865, while the decrease of 107 in a single year throws great doubt over the Republican district.

"There is no answering such overwhelming facts as these but by declaring the two great Dodge districts to be as 'fraudulent,' as the Brooks districts is alleged to be."

Mr. MARSHALL. The registry subsequent to the election, a carefully revised registry, shows a much larger vote than was given at this election, which is charged to have been fraudulent.

But, sir, I am taking up too much time in discussing this district. It has been my only purpose to call the attention of the House to these facts; and I hope that members will look into the evidence for themselves.

The committee also throw out the vote of the seventh district of the twenty-first ward. The specification is that "sundry persons voted for the sitting member who were not legal voters, to wit, one hundred and upward." This is very indefinite, and not in accordance with the law of Congress; but I will not dwell upon that. It is charged that the vote is much larger in 1864 than it was in 1863 or 1865. I refer the House to page 19 of the report, where the House will find a comparison similar to that which has been read, and which explains the matter to the satisfaction of any reasonable man.

New York Contested Election—Mr. Marshall.

HO. OF REPS.

ANOTHER CONTRAST.

Vote of 1864. New revised registry, 1865.
 7th (Dem.) district.....389.....367
 12th (Rep.) district.....493.....337

"Thus demonstrating that so far as we can judge by analysis and comparison of the poll of 1865 for State officers, with the poll of 1864 for Congress, the seventh (Dutch Hill) district was an honest and juster poll than the three Fifth avenue wealthy districts."

There is no direct charge that there was any irregularity or fraud in the registry in this case. There is, however, an attempt to prove that illegal votes were cast; and to establish this fact, there is introduced a witness the most extraordinary, I think, that was ever examined in any court upon earth. Mr. Speaker there is probably no member of this House who does not know that in any great metropolitan city, like New York, a man who has command of a large amount of money, and who is willing to use it for the purpose of securing office, can find scoundrels who will testify to anything. I do not charge that there is any evidence that this witness when he appeared upon the stand was bribed; but taking all the circumstances, and taking the testimony of the man himself, I say that I have no doubt in my own mind that he appeared upon the stand a bribed and perjured witness, and that he testified with the fruits of his perjury in his pocket. I do not, however, charge that there is any proof that the contestant had knowledge of this. The evidence shows that he had numerous friends who were willing to expend money by the thousands to secure his return from this district, and this man Stephen Geoghegan was a proper subject for any one who was in search of a willing and useful witness. A more infamous scoundrel, according to his own showing, never appeared to testify on any subject. In order that Stephen Geoghegan may have justice done to him he must be allowed to speak for himself. No one else could do him complete and full justice. And "none but himself can be his parallel." I will ask the Clerk to read the pages I have turned down. This is the evidence on which the people of this district are to be disfranchised and turned out of the House without a hearing or a voice.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"Question. Do you know of any man who voted on these names which we have just gone through, who voted for Mr. Brooks?"

"Answer. I do, sir."

"Question. How many were they?"

"Answer. Well, about—I guess there was in the neighborhood of thirty or so."

"Question. How do you know that they voted for Mr. Brooks?"

"Answer. Because I gave them the tickets, a great many of them, myself."

"Question. Do you think you gave Mr. Brooks's tickets to as many as thirty of these?"

"Answer. Yes, sir; I am certain."

"Question. How did they happen to go for him?"

"Answer. They generally go with any man that takes an interest in the election."

"Question. Are you sure these men whom you gave these tickets to voted them?"

"Answer. Yes, sir; I am certain they did. I was so kind to them as to walk right in with them with it in their hands."

"Question. How did you get so good a knowledge of this district and the names that were on the registry?"

"Answer. I lived a long time there—keep store there and been implicated in the election every year."

"Question. Do you keep more than one store?"

"Answer. I do, sir—two stores."

"Question. Do you always take a great interest in the elections?"

"Answer. I do."

"Question. Attend the polls all day?"

"Answer. I do. I wouldn't take time to eat my meals, for fear I would lose the voting."

"Question. Did you have a list of these voters who were dead and who were away?"

"Answer. I know them to be dead; but we substitute a man to vote their names, and keep them on. We've got to do that, you know, to help a friend."

"Question. This time did you render this efficient aid to Mr. Dodge, or Mr. Barr, or Mr. Brooks?"

"Answer. I done it for Mr. Brooks."

"Question. And you feel pretty confident that you got these thirty votes for him that you say voted Mr. Brooks's ticket?"

"Answer. Yes, sir; I am sure of it."

"Question. Did you attend any other district polling place during the day?"

"Answer. No, sir; I never left it. I didn't scarce take time to go up to my dinner."

"Mr. ANTHONY:

"Question. Did Mr. Dodge ever tell you that he was going to have you indicted?"

"Answer. No, sir; I never seen him only once before to-night."

"Question. Don't you think that any decent man would have you indicted for what you said to-night?"

"Answer. No, sir; I don't."

"Question. Do I understand you to say that you gave tickets to men to vote whom you knew were illegal voters in that district?"

"Answer. I did, sir."

"Question. And that you took these men in and had them deposit their vote?"

"Answer. Yes, sir; I always do that."

"Question. I understand you also to say that you gave tickets to men who were representing dead voters?"

"Answer. Yes, sir."

"Question. And that you induced them to deposit those votes?"

"Answer. Yes, sir; I done so, and always does that."

"Question. And you knew in doing that, and you know now, you were guilty of a felony?"

"Answer. Generally we takes that as a risk."

"Question. Didn't you know that it was so?"

"Answer. I suppose we are."

"Question. Don't you know that no decent man would believe you when you did that?"

"Answer. Yes, they will."

"Question. Do you think so or not?"

"Answer. It makes no difference to me whether they do or not."

"Question. Do you think that any decent man or any gentleman would believe a word you say?"

"Answer. I don't care whether they would or not."

"(Question repeated.)"

"Answer. I think they would, sir."

"Question. Has Mr. Dodge expressed any disapproval of your conduct on that occasion?"

"Answer. Not a word; I never spoke a word to him in my life about it."

"Question. Who have you spoken to about it?"

"Answer. I do this of my own free will."

"Question. When did you speak to Mr. Dodge about this matter?"

"Answer. Last night."

"Question. Did he express any disapproval?"

"Answer. Not a bit."

"Question. Did he say you had been guilty of a crime against the laws of your country?"

"Answer. No."

"Question. Did he express himself in any way as disapproving of your conduct in this matter?"

"Answer. Not a bit."

"Question. How many times have you been arrested?"

"Answer. About four or five times in my life."

"Question. Not more than that?"

"Answer. That's all."

"Question. Are you under bonds in any criminal matter at present?"

"Answer. No, sir. I was arrested once in my life."

"Question. Haven't you been arrested more than that?"

"Answer. No."

"Question. When was that?"

"Answer. Two years ago."

"Question. What for?"

"Answer. Fighting."

"Question. What disposition was made of that?"

"Answer. I was put under bail and the case was dismissed."

"Question. Where were you tried?"

"Answer. In the court of special sessions."

"Question. By whom?"

"Answer. Before Judge Kelly."

"Question. When were you tried?"

"Answer. I can't tell the trial now."

"Question. Give me the date, if you please."

"Answer. I can't."

"Question. As near as you can."

"Answer. Sometime in the middle of next summer two or three years ago; I forget which."

"Question. Give me the year as near as you can."

"Answer. About 1863, I think."

"Question. Who was the complainant in that case?"

"Answer. A man by the name of Mahom."

"Question. You say you were discharged on that?"

"Answer. Yes, sir."

"Question. Were you convicted and discharged after you were convicted?"

"Answer. No."

"Question. And you have never been arrested except that once?"

"Answer. Never."

"Question. Do you mean to swear that positively?"

"Answer. Yes, sir."

"Question. You've never been arrested but once?"

"Answer. Oh, yes; but never for no crime."

"Question. How many times have you been arrested?"

"Answer. Well, about, I guess, three times in my life; but then never kept in, only the one time—just appeared, that's all."

"Question. Were you ever arrested at the complaint of John Mahom?"

"Answer. Yes."

"Question. What was that for?"

"Answer. For shooting."

"Question. Were you ever arrested at the complaint of a man named Jagger?"

"Answer. I was, but I wasn't retained."

"Question. What was the charge against you?"

"Answer. Assault and battery."

"Question. Did you count this in the arrests that you mentioned?"

"Answer. No, sir; I don't call it an arrest when a man appears merely and is discharged."

"Question. How many other criminal complaints have you had made against you?"

"Answer. None that I know of."

"Question. Try to think and see if you can remember."

"Answer. No, not as I know of. You may think of it yourself."

"Question. Who else did you work for besides these two persons that you have mentioned?"

"Answer. Well, no other persons in New York."

"Question. Whom have you worked for anywhere else?"

"Answer. The first place I worked in America was in the South."

"Question. Whereabouts?"

"Answer. New Orleans, Georgia, Charleston, Savannah, and all over the South."

"Question. What did you work at there?"

"Answer. I peddled some of the time; more I worked at cotton stores, plantations, &c."

"Question. How long ago was it that you peddled there?"

"Answer. About '51 or '52 and '54."

"Question. How many times were you arrested down there?"

"Answer. No or a time, that I remember."

"Question. Don't you think you could remember if you thought about it?"

"Answer. No, sir."

"Question. No complaint ever made against you down there?"

"Answer. No, sir."

"Question. How many fights do you suppose you have been in in the course of your life?"

"Answer. A great many. In the course of the election I'm the whole time fighting generally; I fight with my nails election day."

"Question. How many times did you vote at the election?"

"Answer. Only once; I was too well known."

"Question. How many persons did you induce to vote illegally?"

"Answer. I guess in the neighborhood of twenty or thirty."

"Question. How many do you generally induce to vote illegally?"

"Answer. All that ever I can get. I couldn't give you any regular statement, for everybody I can get to vote I make them vote. It's a business I practice."

"Question. As a general thing at elections, how many do you put in?"

"Answer. I don't keep any memorandum of it."

"Question. Where was it that you saw Mr. Dodge?"

"Answer. In his own house the first time that I saw him; I went there to call on him."

"Question. How long were you there?"

"Answer. About five minutes."

"Question. Where did Mr. Dodge receive you?"

"Answer. In his own house; in his parlor."

"Question. What passed between you and him on that occasion?"

"Answer. Nothing, only he asked me if I wouldn't go down and testify to the best of my knowledge what I knew about the district."

"Question. That was the whole of the conversation?"

"Answer. That was the whole of the conversation. I told him I would do so with pleasure."

"Question. Where did you see Mr. Phelps?"

"Answer. I saw him down in Wall street in his office."

"Question. You didn't go to his house?"

"Answer. No, sir, I went to his office to tell him that I knew a little about the district."

"Question. When did you go there?"

"Answer. Some day last week; I don't know the exact day. I went there some day through the week myself, without his or any man ever sending for me."

"Question. Have you ever been to Mr. Brooks's house?"

"Answer. No, sir."

"Question. Have you ever seen Mr. Dodge in any other place except in his own house?"

"Answer. In no other place, sir."

"Question. Have you never seen him down here?"

"Answer. I have never known Mr. Dodge before I knowed him that night."

"Question. Now that you do know him, have you never seen him down here?"

"Answer. I never saw him until I did the other night."

"Question. Until last night?"

"Answer. Yes. I saw him the other day, and I was told it was him."

"Question. Where did you see him?"

"Answer. Down here."

"Question. In what part of this building?"

"Answer. Right here in this house—outside there."

"Question. Anywhere else in this building; were you up stairs in this building?"

"Answer. I was, sir. I did not know Mr. Dodge was there until he came down and shook hands with me at the door."

"Question. Do you know James B. Barlow?"

"Answer. I do, sir."

"Question. Where does he live now?"

"Answer. He lives across town now, sir."

"Question. Whereabouts?"

"Answer. I can't tell you."

"Question. What is his business?"

"Answer. I believe he is a coachman."

"Question. For whom?"

"Answer. I can't tell."

"Question. Can you give me any information of his whereabouts?"

"Answer. No, sir; I can't."

"Question. How long had you known him?"

"Answer. About three months or four before the election."

HO. OF REPS.

New York Contested Election—Mr. Marshall.

39TH CONG....1ST SESS.

"Question. Did you induce him to vote?
 "Answer. It was I gave him the tickets.
 "Question. Did you induce him to vote?
 "Answer. Yes, sir.
 "Question. Did he tell you that he wasn't a legal voter?
 "Answer. No.
 "Question. Did he tell you that he wasn't an American citizen?
 "Answer. I knowed he wasn't myself.
 "Question. How did you know it?
 "Answer. Because I knew it. I know the man wasn't long enough in the country to be voting.
 "Question. When did he come into the country?
 "Answer. I can't tell you.
 "Question. How did you know that he hadn't been long enough in the country?
 "Answer. I know he wasn't, sir; I am swearing he wasn't. You can get it at the recorder's office.
 "Question. What means of knowledge have you?
 "Answer. I know he's an alien; he never was a citizen of the country.
 "Question. Do you know when he came to this country?
 "Answer. No, sir.
 "Question. Then how do you know that he has not been here long enough to be a voter?
 "Answer. That might be, and still he might never be naturalized. I know he was not.
 "Question. How do you know it?
 "Answer. I am swearing he is no citizen.
 "Question. Do you think everything you swear to must necessarily be true?
 "Answer. Yes, sir.
 "Question. How many votes have you sworn in in the course of your life?
 "Answer. I never swore in any that was not legal.
 "Question. Was this man Barlow registered?
 "Answer. I registered him.
 "Question. Were you one of the registers?
 "Answer. No, sir; but I just told them that he was a friend of mine, and that he was a voter in the district.
 "Question. That was false, wasn't it?
 "Answer. Yes.
 "Question. You lied to them, then?
 "Answer. Of course.
 "Question. Did they want any affidavits with regard to that?
 "Answer. No, not a bit; no bother in the world.
 "Question. Who were the registers of that district?
 "Answer. John Farrell, I think, was one, and Taylor (I believe he is here) was the other.
 "Question. Warren S. Taylor?
 "Answer. This man with the bald head, (pointing to Mr. Warren S. Taylor.)
 "Question. Who was the other?
 "Answer. The other I forget; some little fellow.
 "Question. Is Mr. Taylor a Democrat or a Republican?
 "Answer. He is a Republican; we used to have some fights, and he always fought for the Republicans?
 "Question. Is Campbell a Republican?
 "Answer. I believe he is a Republican; I can't tell you.
 "Question. It was a Republican register?
 "Answer. Yes, sir; there was two of them, and we had one Democrat.
 "Question. Do you know who the inspectors of election were?
 "Answer. I know them, but I forget their names.
 "Question. Was it a Republican appointment, the inspectors there.
 "Answer. Yes, two Republicans and one Democrat."

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Speaker, I will not detain the House with further extracts from this scoundrel's testimony. It fills many pages of this book. Without Geoghegan there is no evidence in this case amounting to anything at all. Without him there is no plausible pretext for charging that there was any fraud or irregularity in the election at this poll.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that no member of this House ought to be turned out, or have his seat even jeopardized in the slightest degree by the testimony of a man leprous with infamy, who, by his own acknowledgment, is a criminal of the deepest die, a man who unblushingly stands up in the face of mankind and boasts of his own infamy.

It may be said he is not properly contradicted. Who would think of contradicting the testimony of such a witness? There are various ways of impeaching witnesses; one by proving a bad character, another by proving what he says to be absolutely false, and the third by cross-examination, showing by his own statement that he is utterly unworthy of credit. If you succeed in either it is unnecessary to call any other witnesses to contradict or impeach him. If I were defending a man for murder, where even life was at stake, and such a witness as Stephen Geoghegan were brought upon the stand to testify, convicting himself of infamy and scoundrelism as this man did, I would not bring any witness to contradict him. The jury that would listen to the testimony of such a man would be utterly unworthy of the confidence and trust reposed in them.

But it is said that another witness, Russell Myers, in some respects confirms some of the testimony of Geoghegan. I will not take up the time of the House by asking the Clerk to read his testimony, but I hope each member will examine it for himself. This testimony amounts to nothing but hearsay. He went to certain places in the district and inquired of women and children for men who had voted at this election. He did not know the persons of whom he inquired, and is unable to give us the name of one of them. This witness was well known as a detective, and as a draft had just then been ordered his inquiries alarmed the people. It was natural when he inquired of the women whether such and such a man lived in a particular house, that they should prevaricate or say that no such person lived there. On such testimony as this, which is in fact not evidence at all in any legal sense, for the persons of whom Myers inquired, if they knew anything about it, ought to have been called and sworn as witnesses, are the people of this district to be disfranchised and turned out without a voice and without a hearing?

But I must pass on. This is all that it is necessary to say in regard to this district. This is all there is in the case. Take out this beautiful specimen of a witness, Stephen Geoghegan, and there is nothing left. If this House on testimony of that character will exclude this district and turn out of the House one of our peers, we will in my judgment be doing great injustice to ourselves and to the cause of truth and right.

The chairman of the committee in his report says that the evidence is confined to these four districts impeached by Mr. Dodge, forgetting the fact that Mr. Brooks had attacked the thirteenth district of the twenty-first ward, and had shown that the canvassers, in violation of law, after they had commenced canvassing the votes, left the polls unguarded with all the election papers and a large number of ballots lying loose on the table, and absented themselves from the room for half an hour with a crowd standing around the place. This was in direct violation of the statute of New York, which declares, (volume one, Revised Statutes, page 180:)

"As soon as the poll of an election shall have been finally closed, the inspectors of said election shall proceed to canvass the votes. Such canvass shall be public, and shall not be adjourned or postponed until it shall have been finally completed."

It was not only imprudent to leave the poll thus unguarded, but it was in direct violation of law. And the chances of fraud and tinkering with the ballots were so great, that I think that the return in that district ought to be excluded. Indeed, the case made out against this district is a much stronger one than the one made out against the two Brooks districts, so strongly assailed by the honorable chairman, and if any of them are thrown out this thirteenth district of the twenty-first ward ought to have priority in their march out of these Halls. No man can feel any assurance that a canvass thus conducted gave a true return of the vote in that district.

I do not assert that these inspectors or canvassers intended fraud, but an act like that endangers the purity of the poll. And at that poll the vote for Mr. Brooks and Mr. Barr combined did not run up to that on the presidential ticket, while Mr. Dodge is returned as receiving a majority of 258 over Brooks. It seems to me that this is a stronger case of impeachment than any of the others.

Now, if the seventh district of the twenty-first ward, and fifteenth district of the eighteenth ward, are excluded, and also this thirteenth district of the twenty-first ward, it still leaves Mr. Brooks with a clear majority of 155 votes. This being the case it is not necessary, it seems to me, to dwell further on this case. I, at least, am very firm in my conviction that there is not even a plausible case made out against the sitting member by the evidence which has been produced.

But there is another fact that this House ought to consider in this case. The contestant, as is shown, is a man of extraordinary wealth, with an income of more than a thousand dollars per day, and he has not been very modest or parsimonious in the use of it for the purpose of forcing himself into this House. It is shown by the evidence that some ten or fifteen thousand dollars at least were expended by him and his friends for the purpose (I cannot call it anything else) of corrupting the very sources of the elective franchise. Where it went he does not explain. Money was poured out and disappeared like water upon the sand. Who got it and in what way does not appear.

It appears that not only Mr. Dodge, but a host of friends of his engaged in this contest of money against brains to secure a seat in this House. In his own examination, Mr. Dodge produced two subscription lists made by his friends, amounting in the aggregate to $5,120. I will submit an extract in regard to this money branch of the question from the minority report:

"The sums of money expended by Mr. Dodge himself, and known to be expended by or through him, are then admitted to be—

"Extract from Mr. Phelps, (D., 499.)

"It wasn't an expensive election at all. We would have made it far more so if we had only known as much as we know now."

Mr. Phelps was the lawyer and election agent of Mr. Dodge. How much more money was expended, of which we have no trace, we can only conjecture.

But it seems to me, without charging anything upon the contestant, that his friends, who are so free to lavish their money by thousands for the purpose of forcing him into this House from a district where there is a clear majority of four or five thousand against him, by buying up another candidate, and thus dividing the vote of the adverse party; I say it seems to me that it would not be presuming a great deal to say that some of his friends at least would not hesitate to put money into the pockets of such creatures as Stephen Geoghegan, and use them to effect the object they have so much at heart. And I submit, with all respect, that if the House decides against Mr. Brooks, and places the contestant in his seat upon the evidence that is adduced before us, it will leave a taint upon us and upon this House from which we should shrink with horror. No man is worthy to occupy the seats in these Halls, once filled by the grand characters and great minds of our country, who is not himself free from the taint and suspicion of corruption and dishonor. We ought to tell this contestant, when he comes here with such a claim and asks us to set the returns aside, that he should come with clean hands and not with evidence like this, showing such attempts to corrupt the elective franchise. And it should be borne in mind that there is no evidence of any such corruption on the part of the sitting member, no attempt to buy his way into this House by the lavish expenditure of money, nothing that shows even an improper act on his part or on the part of any person in privity with him. Therefore it seems to me we would be doing gross injustice to ourselves and to the country—to the cause of right and of justice—if we should do otherwise than say to Mr. Dodge, "Go home, and when you come here again bring a case that upon its face, at least, is honest and fair. Until you do that, this House cannot give you a seat here, or even listen with patience to a claim destitute even of plausibility, and carrying with it such potent evidence of an attempt by the claimant and his friends to poison the very fountains of the elective system, and to sap the foundations of republican government."

Civil Rights Bill—Veto Message.

SPEECH OF HON. GARRETT DAVIS,
OF KENTUCKY,
IN THE UNITED STATES SENATE,
April 6, 1866.

The Senate having under consideration the bill (S. No. 61) to protect all persons in the United States in their civil rights and to furnish the means of their vindication; which had been returned by the President with his objections—

Mr. DAVIS said:

Mr. PRESIDENT: I intend to say something upon the subject under debate. We have heard the President of the United States denounced in the Senate on this occasion by men who were lately his friends, by men who have approved of the entire course of the President of the United States, up to the time of the introduction of this act. If the President, in accordance with the importunities of men in the Senate, and out of it, in addition to the conditions which he urged upon the southern States, had also required them to confer suffrage upon the negro, neither those Senators nor one of their radical associates would have made any opposition to the President. He insisted that those States, by provisions in their constitutions, should prohibit slavery perpetually, that they should accept the proposed amendment of the Constitution abolishing slavery throughout the United States, and that they should repudiate their debt created in the cause of the rebellion, which they, one and all, accepted; and his only, but with them great, short-coming was that he did not require them to confer upon the freed negroes the right to vote. Their objection is not that he did interfere with the States lately in rebellion as to those matters, but that he did not go far enough, and use all his influence and power to force them to extend suffrage to the negro race.

I know from the best authority that this last condition was endeavored to be enforced upon him by Senators who are now in their seats, and by a member of the Supreme Court of the United States; and it was said to him that if he would make this condition a sine qua non of the readmission of the southern States into the Union, he would do all that they expected of him, and satisfy the utmost demands of the party.

I do not approve entirely the course of the President of the United States in relation to the conditions that he did require the southern States to come under. The most satisfactory explanation of that line of policy that I have heard was from the honorable Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. DOOLITTLE,] in a speech in this Chamber some weeks since. It was to this effect: that the President of the United States had the right, and it was his duty, to offer his counsel to these States to agree to terms of pacification; that they had the option to accept or reject the advice which he gave them; and that by their acceptance of the conditions proposed to them the effect was the same, and no more, than if the terms had originated with them. I agree to that general truth. I go further, and say, that if the President of the United States, or any other man in the nation, had drawn up a constitution in extenso for each and all of those States, and they had by their popular conventions accepted and ratified those constitutions, they would have been legally and validly the constitutions of the respective States for which they were thus made. The acceptance or rejection was a matter for the people of the States to decide for themselves respectively, in view of the terrible dangers that environed them. That the conditions were not more clement and magnanimous was because the President was beset and constrained by the wicked, revengeful, and furious leaders of the party which had elected him.

Mr. President, we have been together long enough in this Chamber to understand each other. I think I understand most of the men in it, and their particular sentiments and opinions, and the principles and considerations upon and the ends for which they act. If the southern States had presented their constitutions here with the additional provision that the freedmen should be entitled to political suffrage, which is so intensely desired by the majority in this Chamber, we would not have heard an objection to the admission of their members into this Chamber or the other House of Congress. I have heard it passionately exclaimed in this debate, "Will you admit upon the floors of the two Houses of Congress men whose hands are reeking with the blood of their murdered countrymen?" If those red hands had clasped the black hand of the negro and there had been inscribed upon the united hands, "We are men; we are brothers; concession of equal political rights," we never would have heard in either House the language, "Notwithstanding this concession your Senators and Representatives must stand back, because your hands are dripping with the blood of your murdered brothers!" The blood-stained hand of the southern rebel thus interlocked with the black hand of the negro freedman, to the radical statesmen of Congress would have looked as pure as the white lily. The same men who appear here to represent those States in the two Houses and have had the doors slammed in their faces would have found them wide open, and been warmly welcomed by every Republican member.

I will say one word upon the subject of the admission of these States into the Union, a matter so frequently brought up in debate. They have been admitted once into the Union, and all the power of Congress in regard to their admission was then exhausted. The State is not to be admitted again. She is in as one of the United States forever, or until she is torn away by revolution. The idea that Congress may require these States again to present their constitutions, as they did originally, and that it has the right to pass upon these constitutions and the admission of the States into the Union as members of the Confederacy, is altogether false and unfounded; it has no authority whatever in the Constitution. If every State in the Union during the existence of this war, and while it hung in doubt whether it would result favorably to the rebels or to the United States, had chosen to change her constitution, each State that was in relations with the Government and acknowledged obedience to it would have had the perfect right under that condition of the case to change her constitution. Suppose your own State, sir, [Mr. CLARK in the chair,] had changed her constitution during the pendency of this war; suppose all the New England and all the loyal and adhering States had changed their constitutions, would they not have had a perfect right to do so? Would not the action of the conventions and people of those States changing them have been regular and valid? Who would have had the folly to say that a State thus having changed its constitution would be required by the Constitution of the United States, or by any precedent in the history of our Government, to bring that constitution before Congress and submit it to their judgment to determine the question, whether it was a republican form of government, and ask for readmission into the Union? Who would question the right of their Senators and Representatives to be admitted to seats upon the presentation of their proper returns, as the members from the States that had not changed their constitutions.

A State whose people are in rebellion can do no valid act while she is in the insurrectionary condition. All changes and alterations in her constitution and laws which she may then make are void. Her people have a perfect right to abandon their revolt, and return to their obedience to the United States; and on its termination in that way, or by military coercion, as to their constitution and laws, they revert back to the exact position which they occupied before the revolt. The State is as much in the Union as though she and her people had not resisted the authority and laws of the United States. As a State she has forfeited or lost nothing, because as to the State the Constitution declares no forfeiture or loss, and confers upon the General Government no power to punish a State; but the people who were engaged in the revolt may be treated, tried, and punished as criminals in the mode provided for by the Constitution and laws of the United States, but in none other.

The honorable Senator from Illinois has made a long argument against the veto and in support of this bill. I have great respect for that Senator as a man, as a Senator, and as a jurist. The ability and fidelity with which he sustained the right of the ejected member of the Senate from New Jersey to his seat challenged my admiration. I only regret that the intellect and the legal ability that he displayed throughout that contest should, upon so important a measure as this act, be withdrawn from the cause of his country and his country's Constitution and be given to faction and the interests and fortunes of a reckless faction.

The honorable Senator complains that the President's judgment of this bill has undergone a change since it was first drawn up by those who gave it form. I ask that Senator if the President of the United States was satisfied in his judgment and conscience by his subsequent examinations of the bill, that it was in conflict with the Constitution, if it was not the highest duty which he owed to the country to place his veto upon it? I believe myself, notwithstanding the fling which the honorable Senator made at the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. JOHNSON,] that the principles and arguments embodied in this veto message are sufficient to satisfy any unprejudiced man that the bill itself, in all of its essential provisions, flagrantly infracts the Constitution.

If it be true that the President at the first was predisposed, and desired to approve both this measure and the bill to increase the powers of the Freedmen's Bureau, but on their deliberate examination reached the conclusion that duty required him to put his veto upon both, it proves him to be possessed of the very highest order of moral courage, integrity of intellect, and patriotic purpose; and the able and unanswerable arguments against their constitutionality and policy, embodied in his veto messages, afford the most satisfactory testimony of his preëminent fitness for the office which he fills. I have a strong conviction that if that honorable Senator had brought to the investigation of these two measures the same impartial and independent reason, the same unselfishness and rectitude of purpose, as did the President, he too would have been constrained by the power of truth to have come to the same conclusions. I doubt not that if life is spared to the Senator, as I hope it will be, until the passions and madness that rule the day shall have subsided, that his own reflections will bring him to acknowledge that the President was right and he was wrong.

Mr. President, the title of an act is a sort of label of what it is. The title of this act, and its text also, is delusive. There is a studied want of clearness, a studied ambiguity, I think, in the language in which both are expressed. If I, after the best examination which I can give to this act, was asked for an appropriate title, I would propose to the Senator from Illinois, "An act to abolish and modify all laws, statutes, ordinances, regulations, and customs throughout the United States, so far as they make any discriminations for the white against the black or colored population thereof; to punish by fine and imprisonment all persons who may enforce such discriminations; and requiring certain officers to institute criminal and civil proceedings against them, at the cost of the United States." The Senator might object to this, as he does sometimes to my speeches, that it is too long. I would then give him a shorter title, in these words: "An act to consolidate all the reserved sovereignty and powers of the several States into the Congress and Government of the United States." That is a concise title, and one which, in my judgment, truly speaks the true character of this bill.

I have heard no plausible, much less any satisfactory, defense of this measure. I have not heard it attributed to any source of power which, in my opinion, furnished it with a decent covering. The honorable Senator from Illinois said truly that the gravamen, the chief efficacy of this bill, was in the first section; and the power of Congress to pass it was that it is in the nature of a declaratory law. That position was swept away by the Senator from Maryland yesterday, so as not to leave a vestige behind, and it would be superfluous to say another word in refutation of it.

But I will read the first section, or its substance—

All persons born in the United States, and not subject to any foreign Power, excluding Indians not taxed, are hereby declared to be citizens of the United States, without distinction of color, and there shall be no discrimination in civil rights or immunities among the inhabitants of any State or Territory of the United States on account of race or color or previous condition of slavery; but the inhabitants of every race and color, without regard to any previous condition of slavery or involuntary servitude, shall have the same right to make and enforce contracts, to sue, be parties, give evidence, to inherit, purchase, lease, sell, hold, and convey real and personal property, and to full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings for the security of person and property, and shall be subject to like punishment, pains, and penalties, and to none other, any law, statute, ordinance, regulation, or custom to the contrary notwithstanding.

I propose to discuss the principal features of this section; and first, the one which declares all persons born in the United States, except untaxed Indians, to be citizens. I deny wholly the power of Congress to make citizens of the United States. It is a principle of universal law that every person born in a country, who is not a slave, is a citizen or subject of that country, and unless excluded by special laws is entitled to all the rights and privileges of its citizens and subjects. All white persons born in the United States and not having become the citizens or subjects of some other country are citizens thereof. The only authority conferred by the Constitution upon Congress, relating to citizenship, is embodied in this clause:

"Congress shall have power to establish a uniform rule of naturalization, and uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States."

Congress at an early day passed a naturalization law, and from time to time have enacted amendments to it. These laws formed

"the uniform rule of naturalization" which Congress was authorized to establish. Having only the power to make the rule, it has none to make the citizen, either individuals or classes, any more than after enacting uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies it would have the power to adjudge individuals to be bankrupts, and issue them certificates. This provision of the Constitution is conceded by all to apply to none others but aliens. The treaty-making power may make citizens of aliens by acquiring foreign territory, and stipulating that the persons inhabiting it shall be citizens of the United States. There is, then, but the three modes of becoming citizens of the United States: by birth, according to the naturalization laws passed by Congress, and by treaty. The special laws referred to by the Senator from Illinois, which made citizens of the people of Louisiana and of the small remnants of Indian tribes, were either in execution of treaties or without authority on the part of Congress, and inconsiderately passed.

My further position is that the States have no power whatever over the subject of citizenship. To have perfect uniformity of law and rule upon this important subject, the States by the Constitution surrendered to the General Government all and exclusive power over it, as they did all power in relation to coin. The citizens of all the States, at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, became citizens of the United States. Their descendants, and all foreigners conforming to or coming within the naturalization laws passed by Congress, and their descendants, and all native born whites are citizens of the United States; none others. There is no distinctive State citizenship. There is in our country but one citizenship, that of the United States, and every person that is entitled to the denomination is a citizen of the United States, resident in some particular State or Territory. Every State may confer in its own mode local rights and privileges on whom it may please, but that does not constitute any person a citizen of the United States in the sense of the Constitution, or entitle such person to any rights, immunities, or privileges under it.

But the matter of citizenship in any and all its aspects, barely touches the question of the propriety of this veto; that is a question to be decided by the power of Congress under the Constitution to pass it, and the policy of the measure.

This section assumes for Congress jurisdiction over all the inhabitants, of every race and color, of all the States and Territories of the United States, over all their civil rights and immunities, and over all the penalties and punishments to which they may be subjected. In the simulation of imperial will and power in relation to all those most interesting concerns, appertaining to every human being in America, it declares there shall be no discrimination as to persons on account of race, color, or previous condition of slavery. This general and sweeping language is used for a purpose; it is a sort of mask to cover partially the true beneficiaries and objects of the measure, the negro race and their aggrandizement. There was no call, or need for such a law for the white race; and if there had been no blacks in the United States, it never would have been devised.

In many, if not most of the States, there are discriminations in relation to some of those important concerns against the negro race, made by their constitutions and statutes; and this act abrogates not only those constitutions and laws to that extent, but makes their execution by the State officers appointed for that purpose, a high misdemeanor, and punishes them heavily by fine and imprisonment.

Let us see what would be the effects, to a limited extent, of this measure in Kentucky and the State of the honorable Senator, Illinois. A few weeks since, in Louisville, a negro man violated a girl of only eight years of age; and within a few days, in my county, a similar outrage was committed on a white girl ten years old, after which the black monster cut her throat and disemboweled her. This crime, in Kentucky, when perpetrated by a negro upon a white woman is punishable with death; but when by a white man, by confinement in the penitentiary. The judge, the prosecuting attorney, the grand jury who preferred the indictment, the petit jury who might find a verdict, and the sheriff who should execute a criminal guilty of this shocking crime, by the terms of this act would be guilty of a high misdemeanor against the United States, and it is the duty of the United States' district attorney, marshal, deputy marshal, and commissioner to have each and all of them prosecuted in the United States courts, at the national expense, and those criminals would be each subject to be fined not exceeding $1,000, and to be imprisoned for any period under twelve months, or both, at the discretion of the court.

By the laws of Kentucky a negro is not permitted to give evidence in a suit in which a white man is a party; but a free negro has always had the same right to sue as a white man; in such a suit, by this bill, the negro party would have the right to introduce a negro witness, because the white man would have that privilege. But the law of that State denying it to the negro party, the judge would refuse to permit his witness to testify; and for thus executing the law of the State, according to his official oath, he would under this act be prosecuted ex officio by certain United States officers, in a Federal court, at the national expense, as a criminal.

Both in Illinois and Kentucky the State laws make it a penal offense for a negro to marry or to contract to marry with a white person. The laws of those States also declare it a penal offense for the clerk to issue a license, and the minister of the gospel, or other person, to solemnize the rites of marriage between a negro and a white person. Marriage is a contract; the right to marry is a civil right. A white person in Kentucky and Illinois has the right to marry another white person; and this act guarantying the same right to negroes, the clerk who refused a license to a negro to marry a white person, the preacher who would not perform the ceremony, and the officers of the law who would enforce its penalties against persons who had violated it, would themselves become criminals, and subject to punishment under this act. Unfortunate men! if they refused to execute the laws of their own States, in conformity to their oaths, they become criminals against them, and liable to punishment by their respective authorities; and the execution of those laws would make them criminals against the United States, and subject them to punishment under this act.

The honorable Senator fell into a paroxysm of exultation over the President, because in his veto message he named legislators as one of the classes of State officers whom this measure would punish. The Senator referred to the verbiage of his bill in the second section, and vociferated, "No such thing?" and declared that it proposed to punish only those who act under color of law, and does not include the law-makers. Is the Senator entitled to that triumph? His bill says:

That any person who, under color of any law, statute, ordinance, regulation, or custom, shall subject, or cause to be subjected, any inhabitant of any State to the deprivation of any right secured or protected by this act, or to different punishment, pains, or penalties on account of such person having been held in a condition of slavery or involuntary servitude, or by reason of his color or race, than is prescribed for the punishment of white persons, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction shall be punished by fine not exceeding $1,000 or imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both, in the discretion of the court.

If in the future the Legislature of a State were to pass laws to secure any right to white persons and withhold it from negroes, or to subject negroes to a different punishment from white persons who commit the same offenses,

I wonder if the legislators who might pass such laws would not cause the negroes, who would be by them deprived of civil rights assured to white persons, or have different punishments inflicted upon them from white people who had committed the same offenses, would not have caused those discriminations against negroes; and would not, therefore, come within the purview of the penal section of this bill. The Senator's triumph over the President is but his own self-delusion.

But this measure proscribes all discriminations against negroes in favor of white persons that may be made anywhere in the United States by any "ordinance, regulation, or custom," as well as by "law or statute." I never heard, until the Senator informed us in his speech, that punishment of negroes, free or slave, had ever been authorized by any custom in any of the late slave States; and he will pardon me, I hope, for telling him that he has been misinformed. The owners, by authority of law, both universal and local, were authorized to inflict reasonable personal correction upon their slaves; and this was all of it. The same principle applies to children and apprentices, and how long has it been since it was in force, in many cases with great severity, in the Army and Navy of the United States? And it still exists in extreme rigor in every other military and naval service.

But there are civil rights, immunities, and privileges "which ordinances, regulations, and customs" confer upon white persons everywhere in the United States, and withhold from negroes. On ships and steamboats the most comfortable and handsomely furnished cabins and state-rooms, the first tables, and other privileges; in public hotels the most luxuriously appointed parlors, chambers, and saloons, the most sumptuous tables, and baths; in churches not only the most softly cushioned pews, but the most eligible sections of the edifices; on railroads, national, local, and street, not only seats, but whole cars, are assigned to white persons to the exclusion of negroes and mulattoes. All these discriminations in the entire society of the United States are established by ordinances, regulations, and customs. This bill proposes to break down and sweep them all away, and to consummate their destruction, and bring the two races upon the same great plane of perfect equality, declares all persons who enforce those distinctions to be criminals against the United States, and subjects them to punishment by fine and imprisonment, and directs the appointment of legions of officers to prosecute, both penal and civilly, for the benefit of the favored negro race, at the cost of the United States, and puts at the disposal of these officers the posse comitatus, the militia, and the Army and Navy of the United States, to enable them to execute this bold and iniquitous device to revolutionize the Government and to humiliate and degrade the white population, and especially of the late slave States, to the level of the negro race. Vain effort! All the forces summoned by this measure to insure its execution would fail. The mass of them would ultimately turn with loathing and horror from the detestable enterprise to overwhelm its authors—an enterprise not only against the instincts and customs of the whole white race, but also against the unchangeable laws of nature.

Has the Constitution delegated to Congress the power to pass this monstrous measure? If it has the power to take up the revision, generally and indefinitely, of the State constitutions, "laws, statutes, ordinances, regulations, and customs" that establish and control all the civil rights, all the crimes and misdemeanors, pains, penalties, and punishments for the entire people of the United States, which the provisions of this bill recklessly arrogate; if Congress possesses the sovereign power to abolish, reform, and conform at its will throughout that vast and varied domain of legislation, to repeal, to restrict, to lop off, to change, to alter and modify the entire body of State laws, constitutions, statutes, ordinances, regulations, and customs, and to declare what parts shall remain and be executed, and what parts shall cease to be and shall not be executed; and that all enforcement of the portions it proscribes shall constitute crime, and the State officers executing them shall be criminals and tried by courts created by it, and punished according to the measure it may prescribe, what is there to prevent Congress from passing an entire and exclusive civil and criminal code for all the thirty-six States? Grant to Congress the principles and the amount of power embodied in this bill and it cannot be successfully denied that it does possess all that would be required to force upon the States their entire civil and criminal bodies of law.

But the Constitution created no such a hydra-headed monster as a Congress with such enormous power would be. Every man with ordinary knowledge of the civil history of our country knows that before the adoption of the Constitution all the States were sovereign and independent, and that their Articles of Confederation were only a league, terms of federation, made by independent nationalities. The people of the several States formed a common Government by surrendering parts of that whole political sovereignty, which each one of them possessed, and all the powers which they parted with they expressed in the Constitution, and by its provisions organized them into a Government of three departments. This new Government being formed, not by one people of their original and plenary political sovereignty, but of particular powers, delegated by thirteen separate and independent States, the people of each of which were possessed of full political sovereignty, the same powers being surrendered by each State to a common Government according to the provisions of the Constitution, one of its necessary and fundamental principles was that all sovereignty, rights, and powers not delegated by the Constitution to the common Government, nor prohibited to the States, were retained by them respectively and separately. The Constitution thus divided all political sovereignty and power between the States and the common Government.

The exact line of partition, what powers were delegated to the General Government, and what were retained by the States, was a most interesting problem, that was early and generally discussed by the people, and particularly by the conventions of the several States which adopted the Constitution. This discussion has continued ever since, without a full and satisfactory solution having been reached. I will read some extracts from several of those able papers over the signature of "Publicus," by Hamilton, Madison, and Jay, urging upon the people of the States the adoption of the Constitution; and which numbers were, soon after they were published, compiled into a book with the title of "Federalist." Those letters were written before the Constitution was adopted, and were of course restricted to the exposition of the original text. The passages I will read, bear with directness and conclusive force on the question of the constitutionality of the pending act:

Hamilton, in No. 17 of the Federalist, page 76, says:

"Commerce, finance, negotiation, and war, seem to comprehend all the objects which have charms for minds governed by that passion, [ambition:] and all the powers necessary to these objects ought, in the first instance, to be lodged in the national depository. The administration of private justice between citizens of the same State, the supervision of agriculture, and of other concerns of a similar nature, all those things, in short, which are proper to be provided for by local legislation, can never be desirable cares of a general jurisdiction. It is therefore improbable that there should exist a disposition in the Federal councils to usurp the powers with which they are connected," &c.

On page 77, the same writer says:

"There is one transcendent advantage belonging to the province of the State governments which alone suffices to place the matter in a clear and satisfactory light: I mean the ordinary administration of criminal and civil justice. This, of all others, is the most powerful, the most universal, and most attractive source of popular obedience and attachment. It is this which, being the immediate and visible guardian of life and property; having its benefits and its terrors in constant activity before the public eye, regulating all those personal interests and familiar concerns to which the sensibilities of individuals are more immediately awake, contributes, more than any other circumstance, to impress upon the minds of the people affection, esteem, and reverence toward the Government. This great cement of society, which will diffuse itself almost wholly through the channels of the State governments, independent of all other causes of influence, would insure them so decided an empire over their respective citizens as to render them at all times a complete counterpoise, and not unfrequently dangerous rivals to the power of the Union."

Again, Hamilton, in No. 23 of the Federalist, page 104, says, in speaking of the powers proposed to be conferred on the Government of the United States by the Constitution:

"The principal purposes to be answered by union are these: the common defense of the members; the preservation of the public peace, as well against internal convulsions as external attacks; the regulation of commerce with other nations and between the States; the superintendence of our intercourse, political and commercial, with foreign countries."

The same, No. 33, on page 144, says:

"If the Federal Government should overpass the just bounds of its authority and make a tyrannical use of its powers, the people, whose creature it is, must appeal to the standard they have formed, and take such measures to redress the injury done to the Constitution as the exigency may suggest and prudence justify. The propriety of a law, in a constitutional light, must always be determined by the nature of the powers upon which it is founded. Suppose that by some forced construction of its authority—which, indeed, cannot easily be imagined—the Federal Legislature should attempt to vary the law of descent in any State, would it not be evident in making such an attempt, it had exceeded its jurisdiction and infringed upon that of the State? Suppose, again, that upon a pretense of an interference with its revenue, it should undertake to abrogate a land tax imposed by the authority of a State, would not it be equally evident that this was an invasion of that concurrent jurisdiction in respect to this species of tax which the Constitution plainly supposes to exist in the State governments?"

In the same number of the Federalist, page 145, is this passage:

"Though a law, therefore, laying a tax for the use of the United States, would be supreme in its nature, and could not be legally opposed or controlled, yet a law abrogating or preventing the collection of a tax laid by the authority of a State (unless upon imports and exports) would not be the supreme law of the land, but a usurpation of a power not granted by the Constitution."

Mr. Madison wrote No. 39,<sup>ii</sup> and on page 178 it says:

"But if the Government be national with regard to the operation of its powers (acting individually and personally on all citizens composing the nation) it changes its aspect again when we contemplate it in relation to the extent of its powers. The idea of a national Government involves in it not only an authority over the individual citizen, but an indefinite supremacy over all persons and things, so far as they are objects of lawful government. Among a people consolidated into one nation this supremacy is completely vested in the national Legislature. Among communities united for particular purposes it is vested partly in the general and partly in the municipal Legislatures. In the former case all local authorities are subordinated to the supreme, and may be controlled, directed, or abolished by it at pleasure. In the latter the local or municipal authorities form distinct and independent parties of the supremacy, no more subject within their respective spheres, to the general authority than the general authority is subject to those within its own sphere. In this relation, then, the proposed Government cannot be deemed a national one, since its jurisdiction extends to certain enumerated objects only, and leaves to the several States a residuary and inviolable sovereignty over all other objects. It is true that in controversies relating to the boundary between the two jurisdictions the tribunal which is ultimately to decide is to be established under the General Government. But this does not change the principle of the case. The decision is to be impartially made according to the rules of the Constitution."

We have in these extracts a clear and precise statement of important principles of the Constitution; and an elimination of some of the powers of both the United States and the States, by the two greatest intellects and statesmen of the Convention. According to their authority, the enactment and the administration of all laws regulating the affairs of citizens of the same State, and all other things which it is proper to be provided for by local legislation; the ordinary administration of criminal and civil justice, which is the immediate and visible guardianship of life and property, having its benefits and its terrors in constant activity before the public eye, regulating all those personal interests and familiar concerns to which the sensibilities of individuals are more immediately awake; these various and great interests belong exclusively to the States. They say further, that the power and jurisdiction of the General Government "extends to certain enumerated objects only, and leaves to the several States a residuary and inviolable sovereignty over all other objects."

"That the principle purposes to be answered by the General Government are the common defense, the preservation of the public peace, as well against internal convulsions as external attacks, the regulation of commerce with other nations, and between the States; the superintendence of our intercourse, political and commercial, with other countries;" and that all the powers necessary and proper to give effect to those purposes are conferred on the General Government. That the General Government is supreme within the sphere of the powers conferred upon it by the Constitution, and that all other powers were retained by the States, and within that sphere the States are possessed of distinct and independent supremacy, and no more subject to the authority of the General Government than it, within its appropriate sphere, is subject to the authority of the States.

These authorities further announce in plain language, that if Congress should pass an act impinging on any of the reserved powers of the States, it would be no law because of its wanting the sanction of the Constitution. Hamilton tests the point by putting the case of one of the classes of civil rights, which this bill secures to the negro race and all other persons. He says:

"Suppose that by some forced construction of its authority, which indeed cannot easily be imagined, the Federal Legislature were to pass an act to vary the law of descent in any State, would it not be evident in making such an attempt, it had exceeded its jurisdiction and infringed upon that of the State? Suppose, again, that upon a pretense of an interference with its revenue, it should undertake to abrogate a land tax imposed by the authority of a State, would it not be equally evident that this was an invasion of that concurrent jurisdiction in respect to this species of tax, which the Constitution plainly supposes to exist in the State governments?"

An act of Congress, to abrogate a State law upon any subject, of which the Federal and State Legislatures were invested with concurrent jurisdiction, Hamilton expressly concedes would be void; and if that position is evidently true as to such an act of Congress, in all cases where it held a concurrent jurisdiction, how much clearer is its truth in all cases where it has not a vestige of jurisdiction. In what terms could an act of Congress which assaults all the laws of all the States relating to the civil rights, and the penal sanctions of all their people, according to the principles of those two greatest of the great architects who built up the Constitution, be too strongly condemned.

The people generally were not altogether satisfied with the Constitution, as it had been offered to them for their acceptance and ratification. The ratifying conventions of most of the States proposed amendments to it; and but for the perfectly moral certainty that the most important of them would be proposed by Congress and ratified by the requisite number of the States, the Constitution would have been rejected. The ten amendments first made were within the two years next succeeding its adoption. The great jealousy of the people of the powers of the General Government and of what would be the tendency of its administration to encroach on the reserved sovereignty and rights of the States, was the cause that the tenth amendment was framed expressly as a check upon its supposed inherent proclivity to centralization, in these words:

"The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people."

Many years after this amendment was made Chancellor Kent wrote his Commentaries. In his chapter on Congress is this paragraph:

"The power of making laws is the supreme power in a State, and the department in which it resides will naturally have such a preponderance in the political system, and act with such mighty force upon the public mind, that the line of separation between that and the other branches of government ought to be marked very distinctly, and with the most careful precision.

"The Constitution of the United States has effected this purpose with great felicity of execution, and in a way well calculated to preserve the equal balance of the Government, and the harmony of its operations. It has not only made a general delegation of the legislative power to one branch of the Government, of the executive to another, and of the judicial to a third; but it has especially defined the general powers and duties of each of these departments. This is essential to peace and safety in any Government, and especially in one clothed only with specified powers for national purposes, and erected in the midst of numerous State governments, retaining the exclusive control of their local concerns."—1st vol. 231, (223.)

This I consider a clear and most satisfactory summary of principles that utterly condemn the pending measure.

The division of sovereignty, of all of the powers of government, between the United States and the several States, as stated by Hamilton, Madison, and Kent, have often been recognized by the Supreme Court of the United States, and all the courts, Federal and State, that have passed upon them. In the case of McCullough vs. The State of Maryland the opinion of the court pronounced by Chief Justice Marshall, principles of constitutional law in accordance with those recognized by Hamilton, Madison, and Kent, are thus stated:

"In America the powers of sovereignty are divided between the Government of the Union and those of the States. They are each sovereign with respect to the objects committed to it, neither, with respect to the objects committed to the other.

"This Government is acknowledged by all to be one of enumerated powers. The principle that it can exercise only the powers granted to it would seem too apparent to have required to be enforced by all those arguments which its enlightened friends, while it was depending before the people, found it necessary to urge."

"The tenth amendment, which was framed for the purpose of quieting the excessive jealousies which had been excited, declares that 'the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.'"

"We admit, all must admit, the powers of the Government are limited. But we think a sound construction of the Constitution must allow to the national Legislature the discretion with respect to the means by which the powers it confers are to be carried into execution, which will enable that body to perform the high duties assigned to it in the manner most beneficial to the people. Let the end be legitimate, let it be within the scope of the Constitution, and all means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to the end, which are not prohibited, but consonant to the letter and spirit of the Constitution, are constitutional."

"Should Congress, in the execution of its powers, adopt measures which are prohibited by the Constitution; or should Congress, under the pretext of executing its powers, pass laws for the accomplishment of objects not intrusted to the Government, it would become the painful duty of this tribunal, should a case requiring such a decision come before it, to say that such an act was not the law of the land."

As to all these principles the great authority of Judge Story, in his Commentaries on the Constitution, was in perfect accordance with Hamilton, Madison, Marshall, and Kent; as were every judge and jurist of national reputation before the rebellion. How could it be otherwise with men of enlarged minds, deeply learned in the science of the law and statesmanship, since those principles are so plainly embodied in the Constitution, in the calm and impartial reason and judgment that had ever before characterized the great and virtuous judges of the United States, who were previous to that time unperturbed by passion, unperverted by sectionalism and fanaticism, not debauched by ambition?

But the chairman of the Judiciary Committee claims for Congress the power to pass this act under section two, article four, of the Constitution, in these words:

"The citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States."

That provision relates exclusively to the privileges and immunities guaranteed to the citizen of one State in some other State, and it does not touch the privileges and immunities of a citizen of a State within the one in which he resides. It refers to and provides for relations of persons and property between two or more States, not at all to those which are local, domestic, and wholly within the limits of one State. This construction was certainly given to it by Hamilton and Madison, otherwise they would have referred to it as qualifying the exclusive power which they attributed to each State over all its citizens and their concerns within it. The honorable Senator and his friends are proved to have had purposes in this act for transcending the scope of that provision of the Constitution, by the fact, that I twice offered amendments to it, limiting its effect and operation to the execution of that constitutional provision, and he and they, on both occasions, unanimously voted them down.

The Senator also assumes that the second section of the amendment of the Constitution abolishing slavery invests Congress with power to enact this measure into a law. The first section of that amendment can have no other effect than to give freedom to the persons who were then slaves. By its language it merely declares: "Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude shall exist in the United States." This provision can operate only on persons who were then in slavery or involuntary servitude, and how many were in such condition? In 1860 there were in the United States 482,122 free negroes. Before this amendment Maryland had liberated her 87,187 slaves, Missouri 114,931, and Tennessee 275,719; and at that time, by the census of 1860, there were in the United States 927,899 free negroes, who had been liberated by the States or their owners, and estimating the entire black population besides to have been slaves, and there were 3,023,686 in the United States. It is utterly unsound and absurd to contend that the second section of this amendment would authorize Congress to pass this measure to comprehend those slaves, and confer upon them the same civil rights and punishments as appertained to white persons; but if that were even true, there is no color of authority for extending it to the 929,899 blacks who were free before the adoption of this amendment, and also to more than 80,000,000 of white people, and the civil rights and punishments of this aggregate people. The whole effect of the second section by its language clearly is restricted to the persons made free by the first, and can not be made to comprehend any other persons whatever. In this aspect also the passage of the act by Congress was a flagrant, reckless, and enormous usurpation of power by the majority of the two Houses.

This measure in its every provision is violative of the Constitution, and also of all statesmanship and sound policy. In the extensive conflict it seeks with the State laws and authorities; in the transfer of all penal prosecutions and civil suits instituted in the State courts for offenses and trespasses committed under color of it into the Federal courts; in empowering and requiring "district attorneys, marshals, commissioners, the officers and agents of the Freedmen's Bureau, and every other officer who may be specially authorized by the President, to institute both penal and civil proceedings at the cost of the United States, against all persons who may be charged to have violated it, and to cause them to be arrested and imprisoned, or bailed; in empowering the courts to increase the number of commissioners without limit to execute it, and conferring upon such commissioners judicial powers; in authorizing these commissioners to appoint persons without limit to execute warrants and other process that may be issued under it, and giving authority to the persons so appointed to call on the bystanders, or posse comitatus, the land or naval forces of the United States, or the militia, to enable them to perform their duty, and insure a faithful observance of the clause of the Constitution which prohibits slavery; in providing that the fees of the cormorant officials who may do anything under this act, and ten dollars in every case to the commissioner, and five dollars for every arrest to the person making it, shall be paid out of the Treasury of the United States; in requiring that any person who shall harbor or conceal another against whom any warrant shall have been issued, without regard to the guilt or innocence of the person charged, shall be subject to a fine not exceeding $1,000, and imprisonment not exceeding six months; in empowering the President to make any district court ambulatory throughout the district, to administer the justice—no, the terrible injustice and oppression organized by this act; and finally, in providing for a special standing army, a permanent force, land, naval, and militia, to enforce its execution. All this extraordinary, extensive, costly, stern, and despotic organism, has been devised to pamper and exalt the negro, and to abase, degrade, and oppress the white race!

The honorable chairman has quoted laws and precedents to justify the pains and penalties which his measure has provided to be inflicted on State officers, who may execute State laws inconsistent with its strange and revolting features. Those laws were directed against the mere forms of law, which were in conflict with the Constitution, and therefore utterly null and void; and against persons who submitted themselves to be made tools and petty tyrants to perpetrate wrong, oppression, and crime under them—such wicked devices as this act. If the States should resort to similar legislation as that relied upon by the honorable Senator to punish those who attempt to execute this measure, it would be a timely, wise, and constitutional remedy. I hope all the States concerned will. I can confidently assure him that at least one will.

As I understand the pending measure, and the act to increase the powers of the Freedman's Bureau, if they were permanently established as the law, they would establish principles that would wholly absorb all reserved State sovereignty and rights, establish a centralized and aristocratic despotism impersonated in the members of the two Houses of Congress, and so much the more oppressive and galling to the people because instead of a single tyrant there would be many. To such a monster Government I would prefer a limited monarchy, but being the enemy of both, I am much more the enemy of the former; and whenever it raises its horrid form, I declare myself beforehand to be its mortal foe, and I will dedicate what of life and energy remains to me to its overthrow and the reinstatement of the Constitution and liberties of my country.

The radical party, who are now striding on to consolidation and despotism to perpetuate their possession of power and office, have able, unscrupulous, and daring leaders. In 1860-61 they would listen to no just and constitutional terms of compromise. Two or three days after the first disastrous defeat at Bull Run, they male fide voted for this resolution offered by Andrew Johnson, then a Senator from Tennessee. I will read the resolution and the yeas and nays on its passage in the Senate:

"Resolved by the Senate, That the present deplorable civil war has been forced upon the country by the disunionists of the southern States, now in arms against the constitutional Government, and in arms around the capital; that in this national emergency, Congress, banishing all feelings of mere passion or resentment, will recollect only its duty to the whole country; that this war is not waged on their part in any spirit of oppression, or for any purpose of conquest or subjugation, or purpose of overthrowing or interfering with the rights or established institutions of those States, but to defend and maintain the supremacy of the Constitution, and to preserve the Union with all the dignity, equality, and rights of the several States unimpaired; and that as soon as these objects are accomplished the war ought to cease.

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Browning, Chandler, Clark, Cowan, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Harlan, Harris, Howe, Johnson of Tennessee, Kennedy, King, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, Latham, Morrill, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Salisbury, Sherman, Ten Eyck, Wade, Wilkinson, Willey, and Wilson—30.

"NAVS—Messrs. Breckinridge, Johnson of Missouri, Polk, Powell, and Trumbull—5."

The armies of the United States have conquered the rebellion, and the southern people have submitted and sued to come back to their allegiance and position in the Union and the Government, given up slavery, both by provisions in their own constitutions and ratifying an amendment to the Constitution of the United States abolishing it throughout the land, and repudiated the debts incurred to sustain their revolt. These are conditions beyond the just and constitutional principles upon which you declared you would make the fight and make the peace.

The President, whom your party elected, offered those magnanimous terms to the insurgents, and all of you in this Chamber but two, and all of your party in the other House, I believe, with him pledged yourselves to their maintenance; and now, because he will not go with you in their flagitious violation, you turn upon him, denounce him, and threaten his impeachment. Two sessions ago you passed an enabling act to authorize Nebraska, with a population of 22,841, Colorado, with 34,277, and Nevada, with 6,857, according to the census of 1860, to form constitutions preliminary to their admission as States in the Union. Their aggregate population was but little more than half the ratio for one Representative; but the great consideration was that each one of these infant Territories that assumed the name of State would bring to its patronizing party two Senators and one Representative, and add that much to the material of a two-thirds majority in both Houses.

The war terminated more than six months before the beginning of the present session of Congress. The magnitude of the conflict, and the fierce and determined energy with which it was fought on both sides, imparted to it a terrible grandeur; and the suddenness of its termination, the completeness of the submission of so many million insurgents, and their universal desire to return to the Government against which they had risen, and the obstinate purpose of the majority of Congress to reject their overtures, are not less strange. The latter aspect seems surpassingly sinister and inexplicable, except on considerations of excessive selfishness and criminal ambition.

Whenever the rebels grounded their arms, and the authorities of their respective States in good faith offered to place the States and themselves in proper relations with the Government of the United States, such States and their people had a perfect right to have their Senators and Representatives in Congress. Individual Senators and Representatives might be excluded for sufficient causes personal to each; but a valid objection to keep the State out is impossible under such a state of fact. Her citizens now loyal, having the qualifications prescribed by the Constitution, and the proper returns of their election to the Senate or House of Representatives, may rightfully demand their admission to their seats; for a ruling majority to keep them out is revolutionary. A majority of the Senators who have taken the oath of office and been admitted to their seats have assumed by this revolutionary act, not merely to mutilate the Senate, but to sunder the Union and subvert the Government by closing the doors of this Chamber against the Senators of eleven States, which States and their people are at peace with the United States and obedient to their authority.

You are responsible for this disorganized condition of the Senate, for you have made it. You further aggravated it within the last few days by ejecting from his seat the model Senator from New Jersey, when every intelligent reader of the newspapers in America knows that he was legally and constitutionally elected by the majority of the Legislature of that State. In the House the same process is going on in a more aggravated form; your political friends are more than decimating their and your opponents, without sufficient cause, while they hold in their seats their political friends against whose election valid constitutional and legal objections have been established. In the mean time you are recklessly passing propositions to amend the Constitution, and overriding the President's veto of this flagitious measure, which requires two thirds of both Houses. You are rushing onward from outrage to outrage with terrible rapidity. You delude yourselves if you believe such a career can long continue.

The courts will decide that you being the wrong-doers, having mutilated Congress, and having passed your revolutionary measures by less than a majority, by a plurality which you created for your purposes in excluding twenty-three Senators from their seats, your acts are revolutionary and void. Public justice is often slow, but generally sure. Think you that the people will look on with folded arms and stolid indifference, and see you subvert their Constitution and liberties, and on their ruins erect a grinding despotism. No; ere long they will rise up with earthquake force and fling you from power and place. I commend to your serious meditation these words: "Go tell Sylla that you saw Caius Marius sitting upon the ruins of Carthage!"

New York Contested Election.

SPEECH OF HON. JAMES BROOKS,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

April 5 and 6, 1866.

The House having under consideration the following resolutions reported from the Committee of Elections:

Resolved, That Hon. James Brooks is not entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative in the Thirty-Ninth Congress from the eighth district in New York.

Resolved, That William E. Dodge is entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative in the Thirty-Ninth Congress from the eighth district in New York—

Mr. BROOKS said:

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not know I have ever before risen to address a public body with emotions and feelings like those with which I now rise to address the House of Representatives. I am in some sort arraigned at the bar of this House by a committee, for the members of which I feel the highest respect, and by a contestant whose position as a merchant and whose abundance of wealth surround me with embarrassment and make me feel diffident in addressing the House in a matter which concerns my own interest. But if I know my own heart, proud as I am of a seat in the House of Representatives and of my associates here, I do not rise so much for the honor of this seat as to vindicate the right of two hundred thousand people in one of the largest representative districts of the United States to the choice of their own Representative upon the floor of this House to vote for them on the many important questions which come up here for action.

Sir, this election has excited profound interest here and elsewhere. In our district it was one of the hardest-fought contests I have ever seen in any part of the country. Yes, sir, fought by all manner of means, and in the midst of most extraordinary excitement; and when it was over I thought it was over for good; but it has not been over; it is prolonged to this moment, during a year and a half of one continuous struggle. The members of the House of Representatives are almost all acquainted with the localities of the imperial city which I have the honor in part to represent. I am sorry to say that a large portion of the wealth of my district has not been with me, but against me; and it is the richest district in the whole country, and approached in wealth by only one other, and that in Boston. I am sorry to say that the wealth and prosperity of that district located on Fifth avenue and the adjacent streets were for the contestant; while in the river districts, where our laboring population reside, the hard-fisted mechanics, the men who send our ships floating over every sea, and carrying the stars and stripes triumphant from pole to pole, the men who are the architects and artificers of our grandeur and glory; that class of men, situated in the river districts of New York, in the main gave their support to me.

My contestant in this case availed himself of that fact, which I cannot more deeply regret than he. I would be proud to represent the property and wealth of New York, as well as its labor and industry, and hitherto in a former Congress, in the last House of Representatives, I did represent both. The contestant has availed himself of that fact to say, in describing the geography of this district:

"It embraces the extremes of poverty and wealth, ignorance and intelligence, crossing the city from river to river, including the Fifth avenue, Murray Hill, and Dutch Hill. The interior districts are the abodes of wealthy citizens and intelligent middle classes; the river districts, in tenement house and shanty, hide the rowdies, roughs, and worst floating population of a great city."

I have no comment to make upon that classification which my contestant would make of the people whom he claims to represent. Let it go forth to these people. Let them read it, let them know it, and hereafter, as we shall meet again at the polls, undoubtedly, not here, but there, we will discuss the description of our constituents that he gives in a document which he lays before this House.

I have said I am surrounded by difficulties and embarrassments and have been throughout this contest, because from the very start even till now I have been met by a man of immense wealth and boundless resources. That is no discredit to him, however. It is an honor to have property if it is honorably earned or acquired and well used. But I have been met throughout—and I dwell upon it because I have been thus met—by a man whose income as recorded is $384,415 per annum, and if we add his unrecorded income from United States bonds, seven-thirties and five-twenties, from certificates of indebtedness, from railroads, from coal companies, from iron companies, and from insurance and marine companies of all kinds, it swells up to $500,000—an income which, calculating three hundred and thirteen days in the year, is $1,519 every day of his life; which, calculating twelve working hours, is $3,038 a day; which is $251 every hour, and $4 20 every breath he breathes, when he is off his bed and wide awake.

"Sir, I should have thought, possessed of a vast fortune like that, a hereditary fortune, a fortune by inheritance as well as by industry, claiming to be a representative of the merchants of New York, he would have been content with the declared and recorded election on the day of election; or, if not content with that, that he would have let alone a district giving about six thousand majority for General McClellan, and would not have aspired to misrepresent on the floor of this House a population like that of the eighth district of New York.

But nothing has surprised me in the course of this contestant throughout from beginning to end. In some early remarks which he made upon this floor, with profound anxiety to appear here at the earliest period, he is reported in the Globe (February 3) to have said:

"Reluctant as I was to enter into such a contest, yet I was urged to it from all parts of the country, and especially by those who had taken a deep interest in the canvass in my own district. And out of deference to them and to public sentiment generally, I felt it to be a duty to expose, as I thought I had an opportunity to, the machinery by which for years the wealth and influence of the mercantile portion of the city of New York had been deprived of a proper representation on the floor of Congress."

terest in the debates that have been going on, but compelled to be a silent listener."

"Knowing that there was to be a prolonged adjournment for the holidays, I sent again to my attorney in New York and urged him to see the attorney of the sitting member and ascertain whether it was not possible to have the testimony sent here, that it might be printed, that the case might come before the committee, so that I might know whether I was to have the privilege of participating in the important discussions of this body or whether I was to return to my home and engage in my ordinary mercantile business."

"Now, at this late period of the session, when two months have already expired, and when questions of such large interest to the nation, and especially to the commerce of the city which I believe I was called on to represent—which I have not a doubt I am legally entitled to represent—when questions of such vast magnitude are coming before the House, I feel that I ought to have an opportunity to participate in its deliberations if I am to have an opportunity at all."

"But I do not want, if I am entitled to a place on this floor, to sit here silently and have all these great financial and other important measures passed, I having no voice in the matter."

Sir, from the tone and tenor of that address it is apparent enough where it was born. One would know what inspired its origin. Certainly, it was not inspired in the river districts of New York city. Nor was it inspired on the Fifth avenue of New York. Only in Wall street are men thus inspired to address each other.

"L'état, c'est moi," said the French king; "Congress is I, and I am Congress," one would think from reading the remarks which have been reported here.

The contestant began nearly a year and a half ago to strike at these river districts of New York. Seventeen distinct allegations are in the pleadings which he submitted to the House, and he lighted upon thirteen different river districts at once, so as to employ all my time in order to meet him and his wealth in the contest. By presenting an immense front, by threatening my position on all sides, by not letting me know at what portal he was to enter, without regard to means, he sought only success, no matter how obtained. But he finally fell down on four districts, and at length the four are reduced to two. Two out of thirteen! And upon these two alone is it necessary to make remarks, so far as he is concerned.

The districts which he would throw out are of course the river districts. A is right on Murray Hill, where the gentleman lives, and which some people christen "Shoddy Hill," but all is wrong on Dutch Hill and in Mackerelville, where laborers of the congressional district reside. All is right directly among us, in our own neighborhood, but all is wrong elsewhere, where other people than ourselves reside, whom he desires to disfranchise in order to elect himself.

To maintain his position the contestant has introduced all sorts of witnesses and all sorts of testimony. I propose to call the attention of the House as briefly as possible to the character of some of these witnesses and to some of this testimony.

In the first place, the most extraordinary arena that ever man devised for the taking of testimony and for the introduction of such witnesses was chosen by the contestant in this case. Men who had never before entered the portals of a church, men who had hardly heard of a divine Master, men of the character of Geoghegan, who has already been described as the fraud broker, are for the first time introduced into the portals of a church.

Geoghegan, I need not describe him. I wish gentlemen could have seen him within the portals of that church as he was seen upon the day when the testimony was taken, with two of his fingers bitten off in various fights, from New Orleans to New York, lacerated in his person, powerful, vigorous, an outlaw, a bruiser, a fighter, a bully, a man who dwells in the very lowest purlieus, in the very sink of iniquity, from whence the contestant in this case fished him up for use on this occasion. He was one of the main witnesses in this case for the contestant—indeed, the Ajax Telamon.

Another was Myers, whom the Committee of Elections designates as a United States deputy marshal. Well, he was a rover, the testimony shows, all over California and Australia. Originally a butcher, he became a police officer, and during the excitement and turmoil of the war he got to be deputy United States marshal; or, in other words, a Government detective for the United States, a spy, a man to find out what was going on, a man employed to go here, there, and everywhere, sometimes in Missouri, sometimes in Kentucky, wherever he was wanted.

Here let me say, in presence of this House, that however useful detectives may be in time of war, whatever services they may have rendered to their country, if there is a character on earth more despicable than another it is the spy. The Government detectives that are chosen on all occasions are never chosen for their character, but because they have no character, men utterly regardless of truth or right. And this was another test witness in this case on behalf of the contestant.

Another of these witnesses was Chase, a man who performed an extraordinary operation within the portals of that church. In order to throw out the seventh district, twenty-first ward, two fellows, (Peter Funks we call them in New York,) by the names of McLaughlin and Coughlan, were introduced into the holiest precincts of that church to Mr. Dodge by Geoghegan; and there these Peter Funks told this Chase (so Chase swears) that they had voted four times for me and only once for Mr. Dodge. Now, these two witnesses thus introduced by Geoghegan this Chase swears that he never saw before. He did not know that their names were McLaughlin and Coughlan, only that they said they were; and yet by the introduction of such witnesses as these an effort is made to disfranchise the whole district and to throw me out of Congress. I did not know at the time that this was being done, but when some friends of mine became cognizant of such rascally tricks as Chase and Geoghegan were engaged in they resolved to have an offset for such, whenever they were to be of any worth, in Congress. Hence, not in the holiest precincts of the church, where it is written upon the walls, "Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbor," but in the purlieus of a liquor shop, where "whisky," "gin," "rum," are truthfully written upon the labels of the bottles, the Messrs. "McLaughlin" and "Coughlan" were again introduced, and there they stated to another man that they voted "four times for Mr. Dodge and only once for Mr. Brooks." That is the character of the witnesses they presented to perform his miserable part on this occasion. That is the part the witness Chase, in concert with Geoghegan, acted to trick me out of my seat and to trick Mr. Dodge in. What sort of a character is that of Geoghegan? What sort of a credit ought he to have among honest men?

Another of those witnesses was a Mr. Burchell, the land agent of the contestant in the contested third district, twenty-first ward. This Mr. Burchell there represented for Mr. Dodge a large landed property he held in the third district. That ward was originally a farm belonging to Mr. Phelps, the father-in-law of Mr. Dodge. And by the conversion of the farm into city lots the property became of immense value. Through this Mr. Burchell an effort was made to prove that the contestant in this case had 188 instead of 137 votes in this district. He exerted all his landlord power and all his ingenuity to accomplish that purpose. Irishman after Irishman and German after German was brought up before the judge on that occasion to swear how they voted, for whom they voted. It was supposed to be certain that by the ownership of mortgages upon their property, by the possession of their houses, by having control of their wives and children through the tenelements in which they lived, the contestant in this case, through his land agent, Burchell, could force these Irishmen, Germans, and Americans, too, to be recreant to their oath. Thank God, he failed. Though they may have told him for the purpose of saving their property that they voted for Mr. Dodge, yet when they were brought up before the judge to give their testimony upon oath, with very few exceptions they were true to truth, and the contestant failed to make out his case in that district. Instead of producing 187 votes, with all the violence of his landlord power, he was able to produce but about 120 votes, running behind his ticket, and therefore the Committee of Elections could not throw out the district as he intended and desired.

"I have sat here for two months, taking a deep in-

Another of these witnesses, one Hargin, of the thirteenth district of the eighteenth ward, was another character. This Hargin was an Irishman, originally from Connaught; an upholsterer by trade, afterward a low play-actor by profession, and finally an employé of the Federal Government for the purpose of enrolling people of the city of New York. It is not only proven in the evidence that he is a man of utterly abandoned and worthless character, so abandoned that the committee had to throw all his evidence out, but that he was willing to receive, and did receive, twenty or thirty dollars from the laboring men of that district to release them from the enrollment.

Sir, this congregation of witnesses needed something else added to them. It needed a saint as well as a satan. Geoghegan was the satan, and they got a Mr. Dean to work up the fifteenth district of the eighteenth ward, who in his affidavit swears at the start, "I am a man of religious principle." To make out the conglomeration perfect, it was necessary to have this saint as well as all these satans. What a set of witnesses to swear a member out of his seat! What a regiment of rogues, cheats, and even saints! Sir, when I look at all these witnesses, when I dwell upon their character, and when I see how Mr. Dodge and Geoghegan marshaled them in his parlor and in his church, I am led to exclaim, in the words of Shakspeare:

"Eye of newt, and toe of frog,
Wool of bat, and tongue of dog,
Adder's fork and blind-worm's sting,
Lizard's leg, and owl's wing,
For a charm of powerful trouble,
Like a hell-broth boil and bubble."

During a year and a half of the hardest work of my life, I have realized the force of the line of Shakspeare—

"Double, double, toil and trouble."

Sir, when I look at the character of these witnesses produced from that great city which I in part represent, and which is in some degree the modern Rome, I am often reminded of the glowing words which Cicero used when describing a cloud of witnesses which Rome vomited forth upon the expulsion of Catiline:

"Quis veneficus, quis gladiator, quis latro, quis sicarius, quis parricida, quis testamentorum subjector, quis circumscripta, quis ganeo, quis perditus inventiri potest, qui se cum Catilina, non familiarissime, viciisse pateatur."

"What wretch," it may be translated, "what rogue, what scoundrel, what abandoned villain has the contestant in this case not had either in his church or in his own parlor!"

Let me read from the record here, which is to me one of the most agreeable and yet one of the most painful records I ever met with in all my life. I read from the examination of Geoghegan:

Interviews of Geoghegan with Dodge, in Dodge's Parlor. Extract from D., 454.

"Question. Where was it that you saw Mr. Dodge?"
"Answer. In his own house, the first time that I saw him; I went there to call on him."

"Question. Where did Mr. Dodge receive you?"

"Answer. In his own house; in his parlor."

"Question. What passed between you and him on that occasion?"

"Answer. Nothing, only he asked me if I wouldn't go down and testify to the best of my knowledge what I knew about the district."

"Question. That was the whole of the conversation?"

"Answer. That was the whole of the conversation. I told him I would do so with pleasure."

"Question. Where did you see Mr. Phelps? (Mr. Dodge's counsel.)"

"Answer. I saw him down in Wall street, in his office."

"Question. You didn't go to his house?"

"Answer. No, sir, I went to his office to tell him that I knew a little about that district."

"Question. When did you go there?"

"Answer. Some day last week; I don't know the exact day. I went there some day through the week myself, without his or any man ever sending for me."

"Question. Have you ever been to Mr. Brooks's house?"

"Answer. No, sir."

The part of this evidence which I read with pain is that which records that a merchant of New York, aspiring to represent its commerce and its trade, a representative of the noblest class of men, should have consented, for political purposes, to introduce within the portals of his house, and into the presence of his wife and family, a perjurer, a bruiser, a fighter, a man maimed in his limbs by the innumerable fights in which he had taken part. On the other hand, that part of this record which I read with pleasure and delight, and which I wish to place before the country on record is the closing remark of Geoghegan, that he never was in Mr. Brooks's house.

One word as to the character of this man Myers, the coöperator of Geoghegan to disfranchise the seventh district twenty-first ward, another of the witnesses in this case. I must read the testimony which is on page 398. Myers was using a city letter-carrier to drop letters for him to enter on the registry, telling him at the time to take no trouble to find them:

"Question. Do you know whether it is usual for carriers to hunt in couples?"

"Answer. Not very usual."

"Question. It is rather more usual for policemen to hunt in couples, is it not?"

"Answer. I was learning my route."

"Question. Why did you have to learn it?"

"Answer. It was merely a subterfuge."

"Question. In other words, you acted a lie on that occasion?"

"Answer. We have to use such dodges sometimes."

"Question. You don't think it wrong, as a partisan, to use either dodges or subterfuges?"

"Answer. No, sir."

"Question. If your party had required it, you would occasionally tell a lie as well as act it?"

"Answer. No, sir."

"Question. Is there any very great distinction between acting and telling a lie?"

"Answer. A great deal."

"Question. Please define the difference between acting a lie and telling one."

"Answer. A detective has got to use all subterfuges in the world, without compromising himself in a lie, in getting any information he wants."

"Question. Are you a detective?"

"Answer. I have been."

"Question. And your habits as a detective cling to you still, don't they?"

"Answer. They do a little."

It was in the time of the drafts that this well-known Government detective was sent to hunt upon Dutch Hill for names upon the voting list and registry. Myers was known to everybody in this district. What did he do to find men not residents in the district? Why, sir, in the midst of this excitement he went to the women and the children. In such times women would swear their husbands were not residents, or dead, although they were right aside of them or under the bed, to escape a draft. Children would swear in the same manner to the police officer or the Government detective, and yet such testimony of affrighted women and children is brought up here to oust me from my seat. Let me read from the testimony of Myers here:

"Myers, as a spy on Dutch Hill, goes around among the women and children not to find voters."

Extract from D., 402.

"Question. Were they men or women that you asked?"

"Answer. Women."

"Question. Women entirely?"

"Answer. Yes."

Extract from D., 407.

"Question. Where did you inquire for this Herwin Lonkin?"

"Answer. Up between Thirty-Ninth and Fortieth streets."

"Question. On the hill?"

"Answer. Yes, sir; an old resident up there said he lived in Forty-Fifth street."

"Question. Who is that old resident?"

"Answer. An old lady that has lived there for years and years."

"Question. What is her name?"

"Answer. That's more than I can tell you."

"Question. What is her business?"

"Answer. I can't tell you."

Extract from Myers, D., 409.

"Question. How many do you think you informed yourself about through Steve Geoghegan?"

"Answer. He gave a good deal of information when I looked for parties I could not find myself. He corroborated other people's statements."

"Question. How did you happen to go to Steve Geoghegan to get information about these parties?"

"Answer. By being acquainted with him, that's all."

"Question. Did you send for him, or did he send for you?"

"Answer. I didn't send for him at all; I used to stop in his house when I went up that way on several occasions."

I am to be sworn out of my seat in the House of Representatives by a lot of women and children protecting their husbands and brothers from a draft, or Geoghegan, whose testimony is distilled to this House through Myers.

Sir, before the lawyers of this House I should but waste time to dwell upon the worthlessness and illegality of all such hearsay testimony as this. I forbear to say more here on that point.

We have another character, Brady. Now, Brady was clerk of the regular fifteenth district of the eighteenth ward, appointed by Mr. Dodge himself, or his friends in his interest, another of the witnesses who is now used in this case to swear me off the floor of the House. Let me read from his testimony in the big book to show the character of the man:

"Question. How many times had you taken something to drink that morning that you went down there to act as clerk of the registry?"

"Answer. I don't know."

"Question. How many times do you think?"

"Answer. I couldn't form no idea."

"Question. Are you really positive that you hadn't taken so much that it influenced you?"

"Answer. Oh, no; it didn't influence my nerves."

"Question. How many glasses does it take to affect you?"

"Answer. It depends altogether on how the system is."

"Question. How was your system at that time?"

"Answer. I didn't take note of it."

"Question. How many glasses did you take that day?"

"Answer. I don't know; I didn't count them; I wasn't that particular about it."

"Question. How many did you take?"

"Answer. I don't know; I might have taken four, or two, or six, or fifteen."

"Question. If you had drunk fifteen, would it influence you much?"

"Answer. If I drank 'em right down it might; but if I took all day I don't think it would."

"Question. Did you vote for Mr. Barr more easily because Mr. Dodge was a temperance candidate?"

"Answer. I didn't make any inquiries about whether they were temperance men or not."

"Question. Now, just be careful and think whether you could not have taken so many that morning—whether you hadn't taken so many that you had forgot whether Mr. Dougherty administered the oath to you?"

"Answer. Oh, no; it was too soon."

"Question. How early do you commence generally?"

"Answer. Not until after I get out of bed; it depends upon how I feel."

"Question. How did you feel that morning?"

"Answer. I think I felt like taking a drink; I don't know whether I took one or not."

"Question. Did you take any before you started?"

"Answer. I don't know; it's such a usual occurrence that I didn't take note of it."

"Question. What do you drink when you do drink?"

"Answer. Sometimes ale, sometimes Bourbon, sometimes lager."

"Question. Did any person ever say anything to you about any consideration, beneficial to yourself that you could have for voting for Barr?"

"Answer. No, sir."

"Question. Do you say that positively."

"Answer. I am pretty well satisfied of it."

"Question. I ask you if you can say positively?"

"Answer. I say so positively; because I don't recollect."

"Question. You would know if there was?"

"Answer. If I got it; yes, sir."

"Question. If you were to get it, it is a matter you would know?"

"Answer. All I got, I got a few dollars to spend towards electioneering."

"Question. Who did you get them from, O'Brien?"

"Answer. Yes, sir; toward helping the election of Mr. Barr."

"Question. And you told him you would vote for Barr?"

"Answer. I told him I would do what I could for him."

"Question. And you voted all the Republican ticket except for Congress?"

"Answer. Yes, sir; that is, the Union ticket."

"Question. Who did you vote for for President, now?"

HO. OF REPS.

New York Contested Election—Mr. Brooks.

39TH CONG....1ST SESS.

"Answer. I voted the Republican electoral ticket."
 "Question. How came you to vote for Barr for Congress?"

"Answer. Because I felt like it."

Now, Mr. Speaker, it would weary the House too much for me to enter into further reading to show the character of the witnesses in this case. I need not say to you, Mr. Speaker, and to this House, that New York is in some respects the sewerage of the whole earth, that no criminal throughout all Europe, many a criminal in Asia and Africa, no criminal in any of our own States, no rascal who wishes to hide himself, can so well bury himself and his iniquities as in the streets occupied by the million of people who make up the vast population of New York. I need not say to this House, in a population like that witnesses can be suborned to swear to anything anybody wishes them to swear to.

But let me not be misunderstood in reference to that noble and magnificent city. No city on the earth presents nobler characteristics. It is a place of abundant charities. It has palatial structures which line its rivers and deck its numerous islands to receive the poor and miserable from all parts of the world. It has churches, hundreds in number, whose spires point to heaven, all proclaiming the Christianity, the religion, the excellence, the general patriotism, and charity of that people. In such a vast population, resembling that of ancient Rome as described by Cicero, in words I have quoted from one of his orations against Catiline, of course it was to be expected, if men of wealth, of gigantic income, chose to purchase scoundrels and perjurers, and to receive them in their parlors or offices, they could secure scores of them to swear if necessary even the very hair from your head.

Mr. Speaker, in the course of this discussion some very extraordinary theories have been advanced in the report of the Committee of Elections, and in the speeches of some members, the most extraordinary of which, as it seems to me, is that in contested districts the sitting member is to account for every voter, if all the districts should be contested, even for the whole twenty-six thousand-odd voters, Brooks, Barr, and Dodge men. There is no sense, if there is any law, in all that. But such was the task I was put to in the seventh district, twenty-first ward, and fifteenth district, eighteenth ward, and the success of my task has been wonderful, and can be seen by my brief, &c.

If the expenses of such witnesses can be paid, I can produce here, on the floor of this House, for I have seen them since, in the city of New York, and will bring them here, witness after witness to contradict Myers and Dean. I cannot produce all the thirteen thousand voters that voted for Mr. Dodge; or the forty-five hundred that voted for Mr. Barr, or all the thousands of men that voted for me. That is out of my power. It is out of human power. It is no such duty as a man can be expected to perform. And such a theory as this is heard for the first time on the floor of this House.

More than a year after the election how am I to be accountable for any of the men who voted for Dodge or Brooks or Barr? The thing is impossible; and every man must know it is as senseless, I am sure, in law as in human judgment, for law is the essence of sense, and not of such nonsense as this would make of law. Suffice it to say, that in these two election districts there were two Republican registrars and one Democratic; two Republican inspectors and one Democratic; and two clerks, one of whom was a Republican. I had not a single friend whatsoever; no, not one. These officers of the election were appointed by the Tammany organization and by the Republican organizations of the city of New York. Tammany Hall was opposed to me and the Republicans were opposed to me. I had not one inspector or registrar or canvasser there at that election, and yet

I am arraigned here for frauds said to have been committed—it may be by Dodge, it may be by Barr, but never even alleged to have been committed by me.

Sir, I made an experiment at that election—a great experiment known to the people of this country. I made an experiment to see if a man could run for office and be supported by the people of New York who would not pay for or buy the nomination from a convention. The conventions of both parties in New York have men in them who are held up in the shambles for sale to the highest bidder. Relying upon the people, I went not to those conventions to purchase or to higgie or to buy one. I did not march up and down among the men of property in that district, for they seldom go out to public meetings or take any interest in anything that adds not to their property; but in those river districts, night and day, at the cart-tail, upon every little stage that I could improvise in street, as well as in hall, I invoked the people of New York to cast aside these false and corrupt nominations, and send me back to Congress by their own will. I told them, though, "I will pay no money whatsoever for an election, but of you, the people, I beg and implore your suffrage."

Proud and defiant elsewhere, I addressed those who are the real sovereigns of the country, and who could elect me to office despite all arrangements elsewhere. And thanks to the people, thanks to the virtue of the hard-fisted mechanics, these steamboat men, these machinists, these fishermen, these gas-men; thanks to them, they crushed the machinery of parties all to pieces and sent me back triumphant to the floor of this House. And I say to you now, here on this floor, with all due humility and submission, that if you throw me out from this House or this constituency I will come rolling back here, amid the thundering voices of thousands and thousands of these people, for these hard-fisted mechanics who have broken all political machines will dare to send me, and even dare to proclaim their will omnipotent. I shall go again to the foundry-shops and the gas-shops; I shall again mount the cart-tail and the barrel, and reproclaim that I desire the suffrages of the people, and I know they will give their hearts and heads in cheerful free will.

But what a theory is this, that I am to be held accountable for every man upon the register or upon the poll-list; that I am to be held responsible, months and months after the election, for every man who voted in the vast population of an ever-changing city! Why, sir, to apply the same rule to the contestant that he applies to me, the evidence discloses that a witness was sent to the Fifth Avenue Hotel to hunt up who voted as from thence, and on the poll-list, and from which he received some 60 or 70 votes, and after the election they could produce but 20 or 30 who were, if I recollect aright the number, really resident there! The evidence shows that a change in the population is greater in the streets and houses where the rich live even than in the tenement houses inhabited by the hard-fisted mechanics.

A great cry is then raised here against the sale of liquors near the polling places. Why, Mr. Speaker, there is more liquor in the cellars of the Fifth Avenue Hotel, or in the hotels contiguous to it, at this day and this hour, more rum, gin, whisky, brandy, and wines of all kinds than are to be found in all the avenues of the river districts, which are inhabited by the hard-fisted mechanics. The only difference is this, that in the cases of the hotels the liquor may be good, while in the river districts it is not quite so good as it might be.

Now, sir, let me illustrate the difficulty of finding the names of voters on the register. It is proved in the testimony that a man by the name of Jung, when shown his own name written down on the poll-list "Young," declared that "such a fellow never did live at that place," and that he had never heard of him, although his own name is pronounced "Young." Then here is the case of a man by the name of Fleische. He says that no American can write down his name; that it is pronounced like "Fletcher," and that upon every poll-list his name is written down Fletcher. Now, if the great poet, Goethe, had voted in New York, his name would have been written on the poll-list "Gerta;" and if that magnificent genius had gone to the polls he would have found his name thus recorded. Nothing is more common than a change of name from one to another. Whenever, during the old French war, the British sailors captured a ship from the French navy, they always rechristened it; thus, the "Bellerophon" the "Billy Ruffian," and the "Andromache" became the "Andrew Mackey." Changes like these are of constant occurrence, and yet I am held responsible by the Committee of Elections, not alone for the orthography of voters, but for the phonography also. What injustice upon my constituents as well as upon me!

Mr. NIBLACK. Will the gentleman from New York give way for a motion to adjourn?

Mr. BROOKS. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. DAWES. I hope we shall close up this matter to-night.

Mr. BROOKS. I shall not be able to finish what I have to say this evening.

Mr. DAWES. I hope the gentleman will complete his speech, and then, if the House will listen to me for a few minutes, we will close up the talk on this case, and be ready to take the vote in the morning.

Mr. BROOKS. I will proceed. Now, here in the seventh district of the twenty-first ward, there are eleven officers, under their solemn oaths, swearing to the verity of this election. Three registrars, three inspectors, three canvassers, and two clerks—a large majority of whom belong to the dominant party here. And yet, by the evidence of Geoghegan and Myers, an effort is made to disfranchise over four hundred voters in that district. In addition to all that, it will be found that the clerk of the polls, the clerk of the registrars of that district, Beckman, was a Republican, who testified before the judge what his politics are, and that he did not vote for me; and he swears that everything was properly conducted there. Now, I put it to the justice and to the common sense of this House, and to its honor, if, upon any mere informality, eleven sworn officers of the election are to be overthrown and four hundred-odd voters utterly disfranchised upon such worthless testimony as that of Myers and Geoghegan.

But even if the whole vote of the seventh district of the twenty-first ward be thrown out, it does not change the result. Hence the great contest in this case is upon the fifteenth district of the eighteenth ward, and upon that I propose to enlarge at some considerable length. The officers of this district were, as they were in the other district, two Republican and one Democrat registrars, two Republican and one Democrat inspectors, with a Republican clerk.

A great effort has been made, and it has been argued so that the House now comprehends it, to show that the registrars must live in the particular election district where they serve. And it is argued that if they do not all live in the little election district where they serve, that district must be disfranchised, because the votes there were illegally received.

Now, among legal gentlemen, there have been doubts upon the subject of what was the construction of the law in the case. There are doubts in the city of New York; but the practice on both sides has been, for instance, to select from the Republican districts their keenest and sharpest men as officers of the election to be sent into the Democratic districts, while the Democrats have taken from their districts their keenest and sharpest men to send into the Republican election districts.

I hold in my hand the Proceedings of the

39TH CONG...1ST SESS.

New York Contested Election—Mr. Brooks.

HO. OF REPS.

Board of Supervisors of New York for 1864, an official book, recognized by the law. Now, to show that this invariable practice has existed there, I propose to read a resolution presented by Supervisor Purdy. It is as follows:

"Supervisor Purdy presented a resolution disqualifying inspectors of registry from serving in such capacity who were appointed for districts in which they are not residents, and declaring their places vacant."

No action was had upon the resolution. It was laid over; thus showing that the supervisors thought the custom was according to law; that they were content with the practical construction of the law there given, with the well-known fact that Republicans were selected for the Democratic districts, and Democrats for Republican districts.

In addition to all that I hold in my hands numerous affidavits, to which I wish to call the special attention of the gentlemen on the other side of the House to show the construction given to this law. The construction given to it by the committee would not only throw me out, but it would throw out the contestant over and over again. And for the district represented here by Hon. Mr. DARLING, the true Representative upon the floor of this House, under this construction, is not Mr. DARLING, but Hon. Fernando Wood, and in the district represented by my honorable colleague to whom I am now addressing myself, the same result would be shown.

I desire to call particular attention to the twelfth district of the twenty-first ward; that district gave Mr. Dodge 310 votes and Mr. Brooks 155 votes. The registrars of that district did not live in the district and did not vote in the district. And that was the case with the eighth district of the twenty-first ward, which gave 197 votes for Dodge and 98 for Brooks, and the fourteenth district of the twenty-first ward, where the vote was 380 for Dodge and only 135 for Brooks.

With these remarks I send one of these affidavits to the Clerk's desk, as a specimen of numerous other affidavits which I have at my desk; and I ask that it be read.

The Clerk read, as follows:

City and county of New York, ss:

Bartlett Donuhue, John McAuliffe, James G. Sinclair and John O'Shaughnessy, of said county, being duly sworn, depose and say, that for the months of October and November, 1864, they were appointed by the board of supervisors of the county of New York as registrars of election, and acted in such capacity for the November election of said year in the following districts of the twenty-first ward, namely: twelfth district, fourteenth district, eighth district, twelfth district, and fourteenth district.

And deponents do further depose and say, each for himself, that they were not at that time residents of such election district, but resided in election districts in said ward other than the districts in which they acted in the capacity of registrars of election.

State of New York, city and county of New York, ss:

I, William C. Conner, clerk of the city and county of New York, and also clerk of the supreme court for the said city and county, being a court of record, do hereby certify that Elbrit A. Woodward, before whom the annexed deposition was taken, was, at the time of taking the same, a notary public of New York, dwelling in said city and county, duly appointed and sworn and authorized to administer oaths to be used in any court in said State, and for general purposes; and that his signature thereto is genuine, as I verily believe.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand, and affixed the seal of the said court and county, the 29th day of March, 1866.

W. C. CONNER, Clerk.

Mr. BROOKS. I also call attention to the second district of the eighteenth ward, and I ask the attention of the House to the enormous vote given in this district: for Dodge, 462; for Brooks, 199. I ask that the following affidavit, which I send to the Clerk's desk, be read.

The Clerk read, as follows:

City and county of New York, ss:

Eugene Durain, of said city and county, being duly sworn, deposes and says that he was appointed a registrar of election for the November election of 1864 by the board of supervisors of the county of New York, for the second district of the eighteenth ward in said city and county, and acted in said capacity for said November election for the year 1864.

And deponent further says that he was not at that time, the months of November or October, 1864, a resident of said second district in the eighteenth ward of the city of New York, but was then and is now a resident and voter in the tenth district of said eighteenth ward in said city and county of New York.

W. C. CONNER, Clerk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. DAWES. I move that the time of the gentleman be extended.

No objection was made.

Mr. BROOKS. Now, I am not lawyer enough, and I thank God I am not, to understand the arguments of some of the gentlemen who have alleged that no place for the election was designated by law. I do not understand such technical arguments, nor how they can influence the election. It is said that this election was illegal, because the place for holding the election was not designated, yet it is proved that early in the month of September, the common council, the lower branch of the city legislature, designated the place of James Thompson as the place for holding the polls. But for some cause that action was not concurred in by the board of aldermen until the 3d day of November.

[Here Mr. BROOKS yielded the floor for a motion to adjourn.]

FRIDAY, April 6, 1866.

The same subject being again under consideration,

Mr. BROOKS continued:

Mr. SPEAKER: I have come over to my old seat, the seat I occupied in the last Congress, and I desire to call the attention of the members of the Committee of Elections to some things which they have reported. Before doing so, however, I ask the attention of the House to the construction of the committee. It is composed of seven Republicans and only two Democrats. Let me call the attention of the House to the fact that there are six lawyers upon one side and but one on the other. Hon. Mr. RADFORD, who is a member of the committee—a man abundantly adapted from his practical business knowledge for a position on the Committee on Commerce or the Committee on Naval Affairs or the Committee on the Post Office—has been selected to adjudicate upon a legal matter.

I do not complain of the way in which the Speaker has organized the committees. I know that he meant to do right, and that he had but little material in the paucity of the Democratic number here for the construction of committees; and I take pleasure in here paying my tribute to the fairness and impartiality with which he has presided over all our deliberations. What I wish to take notice of, however, is the political construction of the bench of judges—seven to two. I do not mean to complain of the action of the Committee of Elections or its honorable chairman. I have taken occasion to express my confidence in his honesty and uprightness, and I trust he will continue to deserve the compliment; but it has been my impression ever since the discussion in the case of Bruce vs. Loan that, beaten there, he has relied upon the party majority and never means to report against his party again. The House overruled his decision in that case, notwithstanding he advocated and maintained it with great vigor and great force. The impression made upon his mind has never been favorable to his impartiality since.

And when I call the attention of the House to some facts which I will now submit, with all due respect for that committee, I hope the other side of the House will again overrule the decision of this committee, and not hold that decision to be binding upon the House if the facts of the case do not sustain it.

Perhaps no more complicated election case was ever submitted to the House of Representatives than this. There are nearly a thousand pages of printed matter to be read. It is impossible for any one man, unless he is deeply interested in it all, to read the whole of that testimony. I have heard of but one man on that side of the House who has read the whole of it throughout from beginning to end; and hence when I say that the chairman of the committee has not read the testimony—and I am sure when I call his attention to the facts to which I will now refer, he will agree that he has not read it throughout—then he owes it to me and to the House to reconsider the judgment which he has submitted to the House.

On the first page of their report the majority of the committee say:

"The contestant, however, confined his proofs to the allegations affecting four precincts only, namely, thirteenth district of the eighteenth ward, fifteenth district of the eighteenth ward, third district of the twenty-first ward, and the seventh district of the twenty-first ward."

That is true.

"And the sitting member confined his own proof to a reply to that offered by the contestant in relation to these precincts. It therefore became unnecessary for the committee to examine further the other allegations on the one side and the other."

That is not true. And now I ask the chairman of the committee, and I hope he will not avail himself of his parliamentary privilege of silence not to answer the question, is not that statement an error? On the contrary, did I not in my specification at the beginning, and also at some length in my brief, call the attention of the committee to the thirteenth district of the twenty-first ward, to which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] called his attention yesterday? Yet the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] has omitted in his report to give the least attention whatsoever to it. Now, I would be happy to hear him upon that subject.

Mr. DAWES. I will say that it is not my purpose to interrupt the gentleman during his argument.

Mr. BROOKS. I beg the gentleman to interrupt me.

Mr. DAWES. But if I fail to notice his interrogatory in what I shall say in conclusion, then I ask him to call my attention to it.

Mr. BROOKS. I am sorry not to have a reply now.

Mr. DAWES. It is very evident that neither the gentleman himself nor myself can pursue a proper line of argument if we do it in this way.

Mr. BROOKS. This is the only way to get the facts to the direct attention of the House.

Mr. DAWES. I do not mean to omit to notice any fair interrogatory the gentleman puts to me.

Mr. BROOKS. Let me call the gentleman's

HO. OF REPS.

New York Contested Election—Mr. Brooks.

39TH CONG....1ST SESS.

attention to another point. On the fourth page of the report he says that the July riots were in the fifteenth district of the eighteenth ward. Now, where is the proof of that? If the gentleman has not time now to look it up, I hope that when he comes to reply, if he does not find it, he will candidly confess it to the House.

I now state, with all the solemnity of my position, that there is no such fact proven in the whole record of the testimony. The July riots were not in the fifteenth district of the eighteenth ward. The gentleman has been misled by the persistent argument before the committee of the counsel upon the other side, and by the proof which was submitted respecting another district in another ward. The riots spoken of in that testimony were a mile from the fifteenth district of the eighteenth ward, in another ward and in another direction. And the gentleman has confounded two different districts and two different wards, and this fifteenth district of the eighteenth ward is made to bear the burdens of the injury, outrages, riots, and disturbances elsewhere. I will not say, I dare not say, that this is done to inflame the opinions of the majority of this House, for the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts must be utterly incapable of such an act.

Now, I ask that, when he rises to speak, he will either verify what he has asserted, and that I know he cannot do, or as an honorable man, as a member from the old State of Massachusetts, as a lawyer, and as my judge in this case, he will correct the record he has made, and say that there were no July riots in the fifteenth district of the eighteenth ward.

[Mr. Dawes here gave some intimation of a desire to have that part of his report read.]

The report states, on page 4, that this district "had a bad reputation in connection with the July riots." Now, sir, there is no proof whatsoever of the riots having taken place in that district. There is no proof whatsoever that it had a bad reputation. The riots were not in that district nor near there, but a mile distant.

Now, sir, I call the attention of the honorable gentleman to another point in the testimony, and I do it with all kindness, for no man can comprehend so vast a mass of testimony, not even if he were paid for it. A man ought really to have a fee of $1,000 for examining and comprehending such a mass of testimony. I call the gentleman's attention to another fact. He alleges that in the third district of the twenty-first ward the canvasser was drugged. The report says that, "in consequence of the free use of liquor, one of the inspectors, who was also a canvasser, became drugged, and fell asleep before the canvass was completed." Now, sir, there is no proof whatsoever of that character. The nearest approximation to it is that during the day Mr. Heisner, who was employed as an inspector and canvasser, became worn out with continued watching from sunrise of one morning to sunrise of another, and slept a very few moments. There is no proof in the record that this canvasser was drugged. And I assume that the gentleman from Massachusetts, when he rises to speak, will verify the statement of the report, or will, as an honorable man, take back the allegation.

It is alleged also that Brady, the clerk in the fifteenth district of the eighteenth ward, was a self-constituted clerk; in other words, that he made himself the clerk on that occasion. Now, sir, this is shown to be incorrect by reference to the Dodge book, pages 220 and 289.

This Brady served as clerk with the consent of the registrars, as all of them swear. In the Dodge book, page 219, Hall admits that this clerk was sworn. Yet the committee say on the fourth page of their report that "the entire duty of the board was discharged by the self-constituted clerk, Andrew Brady." The gentleman from Massachusetts has here manifestly fallen into an error; I do not say a criminal error. It is an error into which any committee might fall, in view of the multiplicity of facts and the abundance of testimony which the committee have had before them.

Again, the report states that Dougherty, one of the registrars, was not present. Yet in the Brooks book, page 86, Cowen swears that Dougherty was present "pretty much all the time." Hall states, in the Dodge book, page 220, that he is not certain that Dougherty was absent.

Sir, these are important and essential facts. Yet, notwithstanding these facts, the honorable gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SHELLABARGER,] who I regret to see is not now in his place, averred that there were frauds throughout that whole election in the fifteenth district of the eighteenth ward, when, so far as the record shows, everything was just and proper. Though there were irregularities, they are admitted by the honorable gentleman from Ohio not to vitiate the election; and it is nowhere pretended in the record that these irregularities amounted to fraud.

Now, sir, it has been averred in the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio, as well as in the report, that Mr. Thompson, at whose place this registry was held, received a list of about two hundred names, and that he himself entered those names upon the registry. There is in the record no proof whatsoever of this statement. The averments to this effect are incorrect, because those who make them have not read the testimony. Let me read the testimony.

Brady swears, (Dodge vs. Brooks, page 271 :)

"Question. Who did Mr. Thompson give that list to?"

"Answer. He fetched it in, I think, and laid it on the table."

"Question. Who did he address himself to when he brought it in?"

"Answer. I don't know; there was both Hall and Cowen there, the registrars in the district, he might have addressed himself to both."

"Question. What did he say?"

"Answer. I don't recollect the precise language. He said there was names that he got; there was persons came in and did not see their names on the books and he took them down, or words to that effect. I ain't got it down fine. There was some little objections raised, I believe."

"Question. Who raised the objections?"

"Answer. Hall did, I believe."

"Question. But you were finally told to put them on the registry list?"

"Answer. Yes, sir; I had to do as I was told."

"Question. I ask you if you put any names on any of those copies of the registry list, except such as you were instructed to put on by the inspectors of registry."

"Answer. Yes; I put down names that I was not instructed by them to put down."

"Question. Who told you to put them down?"

"Answer. There was nobody there to tell me to put them down."

"Question. How came you to do it?"

"Answer. Well, persons would come there to get their names registered, and I would be writing there as clerk, and I put them down."

"Question. Did you put any on that copy of the registry list except such as you were told to put on by the inspectors of registry, or the names of persons who came in and registered themselves—who gave you their own names?"

"Answer. No, not as I know of; I am pretty sure I didn't."

"Question. Did you never hear that it was a subject of great complaint in that district that you had put wrong residences opposite people's names?"

"Answer. Yes, sir; I was accused of that the next setting of the charter election, and I denied it point-blank."

"Question. Do you know one person who was entered on either of those registry lists who was not a legal voter in that district?"

"Answer. No, sir; I was not acquainted down there. Do you mean his name down as a voter?"

"Question. I ask you if you can name a single person whose name was upon that registry list who was not a legal voter in that district?"

"Answer. Yes."

"Question. Who?"

"Answer. My name was on it?"

"Question. Can you name another?"

"Answer. Yes, sir; there was Hall. I don't believe he lives in that district; he might; his name was on the back of the book."

"Question. Who else?"

"Answer. That's all I know of."

"Question. Were either of those names you have mentioned on the books as the names of voters?"

"Answer. No, sir."

"Question. They were only on as certifying?"

"Answer. Yes, sir."

"Question. Then you don't know the name of any person on there as a voter who was not a voter of the district?"

"Answer. No."

"Question. Did you do any cheating in making up that registry?"

"Answer. No, sir; although I was accused of it."

Now, sir, that is Brady, the Republican clerk, a witness in the case, who swears he put down the names by order of the registrars, and that, so far as he knows, the registry is correct.

I trust when the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Dawes] comes to address the House he will correct that fact on the record. I trust the honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHELLABARGER] will also make a correction. I regret not to see him in his seat. Oh, yes, there he is in the distance, and I am rejoiced to see him present. He charged names were entered upon the registry by Thompson. Let him take the testimony and do me the justice, as I know he will, as an honorable man, to say that he was mistaken in the allegations he made.

I do not know the length of this Hall, but I suppose it is over one hundred feet. It was on a corner lot of one hundred feet, a small lot in New York, where this election was held. It was proved that the stable door had a connection with the house. I put it to every member of the House, I put it to every man of common sense, whether because the election was held on one part of this one hundred feet lot, and not another; in a stable, and not in the liquor shop, it shall be thrown out?

Now, the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts on page 6 of the report alleges that the testimony of Brennan corroborates the other testimony as to the fraudulent character and inaccuracy of this register. Let me read:

"Question. Do you know of any illegal votes polled that day?"

"Answer. No, sir."

"Question. You did not take an illegal vote?"

"Answer. No, sir; not a single one."

I claim the gentleman from Massachusetts and the gentleman from Ohio shall not add the weight of their authority to oust me from the House without further examination of the testimony.

I refer to Brooks's book, page 326:

Brennan, Patrick, No. 222	Not Not Bauman, P., No. 222 Avenue A.
255 Avenue A,
Schere, Adam,	Not Burr, Adam.

I have thus gone through and proved by Kearney's testimony that some sixty-odd voters were misspelled, either accidentally by Dean, or by design, in order thus to throw me out of my seat.

[Mr. Brooks here read at length B. 3,011, the testimony of Frederick Jung, a German, whose name in English is pronounced "Young," to show by this Jung that German names could not be rightly written upon English registers, and that Dean's names on the poll-list were not the real names of the Germans who really voted. "Zines" was formed into "Hines," "Charles Boxberg" into "Charles Boske," "Wierle" into "Wierd," "Zeigler" into "Zeiler," "Emil. Heine" into "Herr," "Raar" into "Root."]

It is almost impossible for an American to pronounce many German names; hence they may be transformed into almost anything on the poll-list. A German, Blum, was asked if he knew "Jung," written "Young" on the poll-list, and he said, as we pronounced it, "I do not know such a man," though that very "Jung," pronounced "Young," was living in his house.

Now, I shall perhaps exhaust the patience of this House if I go on with the whole twenty-four names in Jung's testimony, of whom the gentleman from Massachusetts says but four could be found, whereas the whole twenty-four are found, or accounted for by errors on the poll-list, or in the brief submitted in debate by me to the committee, but not read, not even examined when an opinion was made up in this case. These errors are constantly and necessarily recurring from the fact that Americans were registering German names, and Germans were registering American or English names. A man with a certain name could not be found with an English pronunciation, while there have been real men, well known, as pronounced in German. Pass the resolution, then, submitted by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] and order a new investigation, and I will bring up these Germans who will pronounce the names in their own native tongue, and show that they do exist, and that they also had a right to vote on election day.

I do not, however, blame the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] except for not reading the testimony when he was acting as my judge. I do think, however, that he ought to have taken the trouble at least to read the brief of a fellow-member of Congress whom he was going to condemn, more especially when he was holding me responsible for the orthography and phonography of almost every German, Norwegian, or Swede, in the fifteenth district of the eighteenth ward.

I appeal, then, to the gentleman from Massachusetts, as the Representative from that Commonwealth, not to oust a member because he may not like his political opinions. because he may have party prejudices against him. I appeal to him not to disfranchise two hundred thousand people of the city of New York because of any passion or prejudice or indisposition to examine fairly a long case like this. He should remember he is acting as a judge, not as a prosecuting officer in this case.

But I am not done. I now call his attention to the following names, which he has entirely ignored. They prove the names, residence, and voters there, whom his silence at least alleges not to exist; whose testimony, evidently, he has never seen:

Names of Voters proven in the Testimony.

John A. Morschamer, (B. 206.)	proves names.....	12
John M. Cormick, (B. 150.)	proves names.....	8
Charles Boyle, (B. 244.)	proves names.....	22
Max Blum, (B. 159.)	proves names.....	2
Ignat Waisman, (B. 160.)	proves names.....	1
James M. Laine, (B. 158.)	proves names.....	1
Barnard Dalton, (B. 160.)	proves names.....	1
Thomas Cahay, (B. 161.)	proves names.....	1
Charles Boxberg, (B. 159.)	proves names.....	4
Philip McDermott, (B. 202.)	proves names.....	6
Total names.....		58

Here I have shown 58 names corroborating Brennan to that extent; names of actual voters that are utterly ignored by the majority of the committee in their report, and treated as if they never existed; and then there were 26 other names corroborated of men voting by affidavit.

The man who votes by affidavit, I wish the House to understand, is a man whose name is not registered, but who can vote if he is not registered, provided he is first sworn, and provided, in the second place, he brings a householder to swear that he is a bona fide voter. There were 26 of these, and yet in the report of the honorable gentleman they are all ignored throughout, as well as the testimony of the 58 affidavit names, 26 proven names, 58 in all, as since corroborated, are they not, by Brennan throughout.

From the extent of their testimony it was quite impossible for the Committee of Elections to do justice to it all, if they had even tried, and do justice also to the dozen other cases that are before them. The gentleman cannot deny the fact that after the committee ordered me to make a brief, which cost me ten days of the hardest labor of my life, eighteen hours every day, in hunting up of hundreds of names which were necessary to compile that brief, it was submitted to the Committee of Elections at ten o'clock on Monday morning, when they had another case before them, and they could not have looked at it on that Monday, while the House was in session, and the only possible attention the gentleman could have given to it was on Tuesday, for on Wednesday in the committee, in the morning, this case was decided against me, notwithstanding the great labor I had spent in collating the names from that precinct. Is that the way to form an opinion, and to make up a case?

His own opinion, it was evident, was made up before he called for the brief or even read the testimony of this case, and his opinion became the opinion of his party portion of the committee, save the honorable gentleman from Wisconsin, who examined the case.

The gentleman, I see, has noted the fact that I said he had a prejudice, a party prejudice it alone can be, against me. I came to that conclusion when on the printing of the testimony of this case he addressed this House in a style and language which did not seem to me civil, certainly not parliamentary, and so unlike the honorable gentleman that I hardly knew what had inspired such bad feeling on his part. He accused me of trifling with the Committee of Elections, as if I would trifle with the men who are to be judges of my right to a seat on this floor! He accused me of laches; he almost insinuated—though he did not directly declare it—that I held back the testimony in order to tamper with the report!

Now, I do not mean to insinuate that the honorable gentleman is not a just man. I am in duty bound to think he is. His honesty I have vouched for. And yet the same human passions that move all men doubtless inspire the gentleman from Massachusetts in his examination of this case; and such as led him to his extraordinary remarks upon the printing of the testimony in this case.

I ask at his hands now a reëxamination of facts he has never taken the trouble to read; and with the exposure of facts here submitted to-day, have I not a right, as a member of Congress, to demand it? I put it to the gentleman and to his associates, members from Massachusetts, that old Commonwealth in which I was born, that they do not oust a man who has already a seat in this House without an examination and a trial. If I had been arrested for some crime, if I had been indicted, if I had been guilty of fraud in the election, if I had spent enormous sum of money, and been convicted in a court, of frauds, the gentleman would have looked at my brief and record of these names a longer time than he gave to the consideration of this report. And hard, hard indeed, it is to be tried, condemned, and executed, without even having your judges listen to the testimony in your case.

The gentleman from Massachusetts and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHELLABARGER] made a point against me that there was a great increase of the vote in these two new districts, twelfth and fifteenth of the eighteenth ward—from 496 to 811 in one year—from the year 1863 to the subsequent year, 1864. I call attention to the fact that this fifteenth district was a new district, as new and fresh as any district on the prairies of Iowa, Minnesota, Dakota, or Nebraska. It was a new settlement of new people. No inconsiderable portion of it was a promontory built out into the East river and occupied by laboring men, with a large gas-house having five hundred men in it, as is proved by the testimony. And I call attention to the fact that the old district was not large enough to poll all the votes, and hence a new district, the fifteenth, was created from necessity.

And if there is nothing in all that, I call the attention of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHELLABARGER] to the fact that in the second district of the eighteenth ward there was an increase in nearly the same proportion. That district gave 462 for Dodge and 199 for Brooks. In the year 1863 it cast 485 votes, and in 1864 it cast 754. Now, by the rule of proportion which I was taught and practiced as a schoolmaster in New England, if 485 gives 754, what will 496 give? And I find the result is 756, or nearly the increase in the fifteenth district. What reply can be made to that? Here the second district, eighteenth ward, was a Dodge district; the fifteenth district, eighteenth ward, a Brooks district. Is it to be disfranchised for that?

It is well known that in 1863 there was a comparative lull throughout the whole country as regards politics—very little excitement. The vote in the State of New York fell off nearly one half—some 175,000 decrease, I think—while in 1864, in the presidential election, when all parties were marshaled in fullest array, when the sailors in the public service voted, though absent from home, and when the soldiers in the field voted, it is a notorious fact that there was a full vote. The votes everywhere increased, but they increased no more in proportion in these twelfth and fifteenth districts of the eighteenth ward than in several of the districts where Mr. Dodge had a majority in the eighteenth and twenty-first wards. The proportionate increase was nearly the same in all those districts.

I call the attention of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHELLABARGER] to this fact, and ask him to verify it, and then do me justice in presenting it to the consideration of his friends on that side of the House.

Mr. Speaker, I know these things are tedious to the House, and I am sorry to trouble the House with them. But there is no other way for an outcast like me to obtain justice from the party in power but by appealing to them for justice. I know they will give it to me if they will only study the case until they can comprehend and understand it. I have reliance upon that side of the House; and I am addressing my arguments mainly to that justice, for justice alone do I demand of them. And having submitted these few facts, I will drop the consideration of that subject in order to proceed to others that demand my attention.

The point to which I wish now to especially call the attention of this House, and more particularly the attention of my honorable colleagues from the State of New York, is the utter violation in this case of the statutes of New York by the contestant and his friends—the statutes against bribery and corruption.

The laws of the State of New York, and I trust it is so in other States, are very rigid against the employment of money in elections, except solely for the purposes of printing, or for bringing sick and infirm voters to the polls. The honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES], and the honorable gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SHELLABARGER], whose attention was called to those laws against bribery in the elections, in the argument, and the law was also set forth in my brief, have not given those statutes the least possible attention. Now, how is that? Why was that? The honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHELLABARGER] was pleased to address this House with all the power of his logic, with all his influence, and with all the eloquence he can array, and to ask what would be the consequences if the people of this country permitted irregularities like those which he alleged existed in the fifteenth district of the eighteenth ward.

Now, I ask him here, what more dangerous, alarming, terrible precedent can be set than to allow a man with the enormous income which I have proved this contestant to possess, or to allow his friends to use it so as to control peculiarly the district in which he may live, or any other district in which he may choose to exert the influence of his money. The custom is but little known in this country I hope, though it is well known in England. The nobility and great capitalists of England, especially of London, are in the habit of buying up whole boroughs and thus destroying the perfect right of representation. This practice has never before been introduced into this country; or if it has been introduced, it has never before been made a matter of record until this case arose.

Now, I have proved from the contestant's own confessions, in his remarks of February 2, as delivered before this House and published in the Daily Globe, that he spent $6,000—or some sum not exceeding that, it was not quite up to that sum—of his own money, and he drew forth from his pocket on his examination, when this testimony was taken, the two subscription papers which I hold in my hand, having in them $5,000 more, making over $11,000 in all, which came from him and some of his friends. Now, I have proved from the record that he and his friends spent over $15,000, and I charge here, with the fullest belief in the fact, that he spent thousands and thousands of dollars beyond that.

But if it were only $6,000, or if it were only $4,000, what right had the contestant to use these vast sums of money to procure an election to this House? Or if he does thus procure an election to this House, what right has he to come here, reeking all over with fraud and corruption, and attempt to turn me out upon charges of corruption and fraud? I say to him, "You, sir, who charge others with fraud, ought to come before the Representatives of the people with clean hands and a pure heart. But your hands are soiled with corruption; you have shaken hands with perjurers and scoundrels; your parlors have been desecrated by the presence of the vilest of men; your associations have been with men who have never entered my house or my domicile. And yet you come here, in the Hall of the Representatives of the people, and allege fraud against me!"

For this expenditure of $6,000, or of $15,000 as I allege, has been made for purposes of corruption which the Representatives of the people here will never sanction; or if they do sanction it here, it will never be sanctioned elsewhere.

Now, I might enter into an analysis of the names upon these subscription papers, if I considered it worth while. I could go through the whole record and show the motives which prompted these contributions. But I will not do it; let them go for what they are worth.

Now, does the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] know that Mr. Dodge had no connection with the expenditure of this money? If he says so, then I call the attention of the House to the testimony of Mr. Cowden, on page 48 of the Brooks book. When asked who suggested that he should act as treasurer, he said:

"Mr. Cannon suggested that I should act as treasurer; I only acted as treasurer for such money as Mr. Dodge put in my hands for certain purposes. I did not collect one single dollar; I did not ask a man for a dollar for Mr. Dodge's election. Mr. Dodge said, 'Here is a campaign to be carried on, and money is wanted; you have had some experience in the matter; just do whatever you would do for yourself.'"

And yet I am to be told that Mr. Dodge had no connection with this great expenditure of money!

Now I call attention, with something of pain and something of reluctance, to another matter. I am not a member of a church; I deeply regret that I am not. I have not made any profession of religion whatever. I often pray in my inner heart, and before my eyes close in death I hope I may be so changed that I may be sure of entering the portals of heaven. But I am now no professor of religion; I never set myself above other men; I am no better than they, and yet, as the poet Hood says,

"I sometimes kneel upon the sod,
Et formid pauperis sue to God."

But the contestant in this case is a professor of religion; a member of the church. He is one who reads the commandments, among which is this: "Remember thou the Sabbath day and keep it holy." He is bound to live up to every one of his professions. Yet he comes in here and charges me with frauds, while he and his agents have been guilty of acts to which I will call the attention of the House.

I shall show that a vile bargain, a corrupt bargain, was made by this treasurer of Mr. Dodge, this Elliot C. Cowden, and by another man, Le Grand B. Cannon, both of them, I regret to say, members of a church in the city of New York, with the Tammany Hall Democratic candidate; consorting with Democrats, notwithstanding his horror of them, and that, too, on the Sabbath day. I shall show by this record here that on a Sunday they drove a hard bargain, and were nearly successful in accomplishing the purpose for which that bargain was made.

Mr. Cowden was under examination, and I will read as follows:

"Question. Mr. Cannon has testified that the interview you and he had with Mr. Barr at your house was, he thinks, the Sunday before the election. Does that agree with your recollection?"

"Answer. I should think it was longer. I should think a week before the election; still I cannot say."

"Question. That was the interview at which you agreed to give Mr. Barr $2,000?"

"Answer. It must have been."

"Question. The election was on Tuesday, the 8th?"

"Answer. I paid him on the seventh; then very likely it was the day before, on Sunday."

"Question. Now, did Mr. Barr come to your house on Sunday by appointment?"

"Answer. I am not quite sure that he did not come to my house three times; he called at the door once; he came once by appointment, and once not; I asked him to come; I said, 'Let me see you again.' He came to my door one evening for the purpose of inducing Mr. Dodge's friends to induce him to withdraw on the ground that it was a democratic district, and that he (Barr) could be elected; then I said, 'I have got some friends here to-night, and if you can, come and see me when we can talk about it.' I did not like to throw cold water upon him at once; he came to see me at my request; I think he came three times."

"Question. Now, I recur again to my former question, which you did not answer, whether the meeting at your house the Sunday before the election was by appointment?"

"Answer. It is very difficult to say whether it was or not; I know I told him that I was generally at home in the evening, when he came the first time, and that I should be glad to see him at any time. I cannot tell you whether I asked him to come that Sunday or not; but I know I told him if he had anything particular to say, he would almost always find me at home in the evening."

"Question. Before he came there that Sunday evening, did you mention to Mr. Cannon that Mr. Barr was to be there?"

"Answer. It appears to me I did; that I thought he would be there."

"Question. Then it must have been by appointment that Mr. Barr came there?"

"Answer. It was by appointment, so far as Mr. Cannon was concerned, I think; I met him almost every day, and he saw something of Mr. Barr almost as often as I did."

There is the fact of the establishment of a bargain made on the Sabbath day, the "Lord's day," as they call it in New England; a bargain driven with the Democratic candidate to keep in the field for $2,000; a bargain made on the Lord's day, and the money paid by a New England man through his friends, he being a professor of religion.

But he says, "I did not make the bargain; I did not drive that bargain." He cuts loose from his friends Cowden and Cannon, and throws them overboard. "I did not make the bargain; sinners they are, I admit, to make bargains on Sunday; I had nothing to do with it; I did not know it until a week or more after the election."

Now, let us see what connection he had with the bargain. We had Mr. Dodge as a witness on the stand. Here is his testimony on this subject:

"Question. When was your last payment to Mr. Cannon on account of the election?"

"Answer. I did not pay anything to Mr. Cannon except on election day."

"Question. How much was that?"

"Answer. Five thousand dollars. He returned me, after election, I think, $350."

"Question. For what purpose was that?"

"Answer. I don't know; it was some expenses for carriages, for hack-hire; he said he might want it in the course of the day."

"Question. When was your last payment to Mr. Cowden?"

"Answer. I have not the date; but my impression is that it was some three or four weeks after election."

"Question. And the amount?"

"Answer. It was exactly $2,000."

"Exactly $2,000!" Exactly the amount agreed upon in this bargain to be paid to keep Mr. Barr in the field.

"Question. Was any statement made at that time for what purpose that $2,000 was?"

"Answer. He wrote me that he had a bill to pay, and that Mr. Cannon had stated that funds had been put in my hands."

"Question. Do you know whether that $2,000 was for any special purpose?"

"Answer. I have heard since it was to pay Mr. Barr."

"Question. Did you know that at the time?"

"Answer. I suspected it, but didn't know it."

39TH CONG...1ST SESS.

Death of Senator Foot—Mr. Banks.

HO. OF REPS.

Well, suppose he did not know it at the time it was paid, but knew it afterward. It was a Sabbath-day's bargain; made upon the Lord's day. When he provided money to pay the bargain, did he not ratify and indorse the bargain? When he and I shall appear before the eternal Ruler of the universe, to give an account of our stewardships on earth, does he expect thus to escape from that injunction of the commandments, "Remember the Sabbath day and keep it holy," by saying, "I had nothing to do with the bargain that Cannon and Cowden made on the Sabbath day; I only paid the money some time after the election; although I paid exactly $2,000, and suspected what it was wanted for?" Does he suppose that the Almighty Ruler of the universe will elevate him, though a professor of religion, to a higher heaven than that to which I shall attain? Does he expect in his profession of religion to be a better man than I am, who have never made any professions?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's second hour has expired.

Mr. BROOKS. I am almost through.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I hope the gentleman will be allowed to proceed, as he says he is nearly done.

Mr. GRINNELL. How long does the gentleman from New York want?

Mr. DAWES. It is for the House to say whether the gentleman's time shall be extended.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I move that the gentleman's time shall be extended twenty minutes.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. BROOKS. I will not take time to read all of the laws of the States, among them those of New York, against the violation of the Sabbath. Here is the New York law for the rigid observance of the Sabbath:

"There shall be no shooting, hunting, fishing, sporting, horse racing, gaming, frequenting of tippling houses, or any unlawful exercises or pastimes, on the first day of the week; nor shall any person travel on that day, unless in cases of charity or necessity, or in going or returning from some church or place of worship, &c.

"No person shall expose to sale any wares, merchandise, fruits, herbs, goods, or chattels on Sunday, except meats, milk, fish," * * * "and the articles so exposed for sale shall be forfeited," &c.—Extract from Revised Statutes, note, vol. 1, p. 678.

The law of New York is rigid, but not so rigid as the laws of Massachusetts; and I call the attention of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts to the Sabbath law of his own State, and I ask him if he is going to establish the fact that it is right to buy and sell candidates for office on the Sabbath day. If so, and Massachusetts has any of that religion left which her fathers had, he will have an account to settle with her in November or December when he returns home.

MASSACHUSETTS.

"SEC. 2. Whoever trades on the Lord's day, or entertains any person not traveler, stranger, or lodger, shall be fined.

"SEC. 4. Whoever is present at any game, sport, or public amusement, except a concert of sacred music, upon the evening next preceding the Lord's day," * * * "shall be punished."

"SEC. 11. Any innholder, common victualer," * * * "keeping or suffering to be kept any place or implements such as are used in gaming," * * * "or who on the Lord's day uses or suffers to be used any implements of that kind, shall forfeit $100 or be imprisoned."

VERMONT.

"SEC. 1. Forbids all secular employment.

"SEC. 2. If any person shall between twelve o'clock" * * * "be present at any public assembly, except for religious or social service or moral instruction, and shall visit from house to house except it be from motives of humanity or charity, he shall pay a fine.

"SEC. 3. No person shall travel on the Sabbath day, or first day of the week, except for necessity or charity, and every person so offending shall pay a fine.

"SEC. 4. If any person shall after the setting of the sun preceding the first day of the week, until after twelve at night, hold or resort to any ball or dance, or exercise any games, sports, or play, or resort to any tavern, inn, or house of entertainment for amusement or recreation, he shall pay a fine."

Now, Mr. Cowden, the agent of Mr. Dodge,

39TH CONG. 1ST SESS.—No. 13.

"gambled" on the Lord's day, "played," "sporting," in reference to this election, and Mr. Dodge found the money for the play, and the gentleman from Massachusetts, a veteran on the Election Committee, gives his sanction to all that.

The laws of Maine are yet more rigid. All of the laws of the New England States are full of the severest penalties; contracts are vitiated made on the Sabbath, and process cannot be served. Yet here was this man, on the Lord's day, gaming for the contestant in this case, the contestant supplying the money. What preposterous impudence of the contestant to make charges against me, then, of fraud! If I had stood in his position, covered from beginning to end with bribery and money that must have been used for fraud, I would never have entered within the portals of this Chamber.

But, sir, the contestant in this case, while indulging in bribery, so pronounced by the law, and Sabbath breaking, does not hesitate to speak very disparagingly of his constituents in the fifteenth district, eighteenth ward:

"It is a river district," he says, "consisting of vacant lots, tenement houses, and puddles, in the midst of the most degraded population of the city, and is known as Mackerelville."

Sir, there is nothing done so degrading in Mackerelville as this Cannon-Cowden-Dodge bribery on the Sabbath day. And yet the complacent contestant, living on Murray Hill, looks down on Mackerelville with an unutterable contempt.

He reminds me again of my classics, as from his money bags he surveys the laborer below. It is Horace who says:

"Populus me sibilat, at mihi plaudo
Ipse domi, simul ac nummos contemtor in arca."

Which may be freely translated, "Let the Mackerelvillers hiss me; I am satisfied with myself on Murray Hill, while I am looking upon the money in my coffers."

And now, Mr. Speaker, I have stated my case, not as well, not perhaps as fully, as I could if time permitted. I ask of gentlemen of all parties nothing but justice. Justice! justice! justice! is what I want. Nothing less, nothing more.

If I am to be thrown out solely because I am not of the party in power, I say to my Democratic associates, "Be content; 'the blood of the martyrs is the seed of the church.'" But I appeal to my Republican associates, with whom I have served so long, for justice; I appeal to the Representatives of my own native State of Maine; I appeal to the Representatives of Massachusetts; I appeal to my colleagues from New York. If the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] is within the sound of my voice—he who is really the Government of this country now—I should not appeal to his mercy; I should hardly dare to crave his justice; but I would ask him what benefit would be gained for his party by the exchange of one species of copperhead for another. [Laughter.] Nothing at all. Nothing will be gained by any such exchange as that. You know what my record is. There it is, written out fair, plump, and honest. You know it all. I am in your hands. Do justice to me. Do to me as you would be done by in a case like this, and such cases will hereafter occur when you are defendants, and others plaintiffs; and above all establish no fearful precedent in election cases. Let it never be said that the majority of this House, by its mere power, disregards justice and truth at the cry of party, party, the party in temporary power. You have nothing to gain by such a proceeding. If you send me back to New York you increase the majority in that city two thousand votes or more in the district I come from. If you drive me out, the people will send me here again, and I beg and implore you not to establish such a precedent as you will establish by turning me out of this Congress and seating my contestant.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Death of Senator Foot.

REMARKS OF HON. N. P. BANKS,

OF MASSACHUSETTS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

April 12, 1866,

On the character and public services of Hon. SOLOMON FOOT, late a Senator from the State of Vermont.
